Pantomime Children's Tea Meeting.—Mr. Forbes, who has lately entertained numerous parties of ballet-dancers, chorus ladies, and theatrical dressers at tea at Exeter Hall, has taken a further step in this direction, and on January 9th he invited 200 or more of the children who are at present engaged at the London theatres to a tea-meeting at the same place at half-past four. The invitations were delivered in some instances with the assistance and co-operation of the managers of the theatres. The response was appreciative, and even grateful. The children, whose ages might range from five and six years to twelve or fourteen, came in for the most part very punctually, and were speedily ranged at four long tables. Some of them came alone, notably the little boys, and some were accompanied by their mothers or other relatives. It cannot be said that there was any appearance of want or hardship, or even discomfort, among these small persons. The behavior of the children was exemplary, despite the fact that no stern ballet-master was present to enforce discipline. Mr. Forbes's formidable threat, that the invitation would not be repeated unless the conduct of his little visitors warranted it, was quite sufficient to secure quiet and order, even when the tongues had been loosened and the spirits raised by the substantial meal that he had provided

Another noteworthy feature was the excellence of the singing of the hymns. This is explained by the fact that almost all of them attend either Board, Ragged, or Sunday schools. Several Gospel addresses were given by Mr. Forbes, who has a pleasant colloquial style, and who relates anecdotes in a manner well calculated to attract children, and, indeed, adults as well; by Alderman Sir R. Carden, Mrs. Eli Johnson, from America, and Miss Varney, of the Young Women's Christian Association. At seven o'clock the assembly dispersed, having previously received an invitation from Mr. Forbes to come again on another evening.

A Clown Converted.—A minister who was much in love with preaching in the open air, and who preached so pointedly as to incur the hostility of some hearers, whose special sins he denounced, once mounted the preaching-chair close to a show or caravan in the public marketplace, and was challenged to a wordy combat by the painted clown, who lavished upon him all his coarse wit and vulgar humor, the preacher, meanwhile, waiting patiently. At the right moment, in a most solemn tone, the preacher sonorously said, "A companion of fools shall be destroyed." The bow was drawn at a venture and the arrow was directed by the hand of the Lord. The clown became converted, and for many years was a most acceptable and useful minister of the Gospel. A word spoken in season, how good it is!

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE.

An Oration by J. B. Gough.

The Noblest Work of God—Man a Social Being—Our Influence—Andrew's Call of Peter—Power of Light—A Landd lord and Traveller—The Woodsman's Family Prayer anthe Infidel—Cato the Negro and Sunday Work—An Orange Girl, etc.

A GOOD old New England deacon once said, "Brethren, I should like to make a few remarks before I begin;" and I should like to make a remark or two before I begin, by informing you that I almost hesitated in coming before you, as I am laboring under a severe cold. I come to you to-night, not with stores of learning, not with power to interest you in the literature of the country or in science, but with an intense desire to benefit those who listen to me.

My aim is not just to make a speech or give a lecture, but to say that which I believe is calculated to benefit you; and to endeavor, by God's grace, to glorify Him by addressing you as a man to his fellow-men on an important and practical subject.

A celebrated writer has said, "An honest man's the noblest work of God;" it is a sentence which is quoted, and quoted as being a very fine one. Now, if we mean honesty in the common acceptation of that term, it is not true; an honest man—a merely honest man in the common acceptation of the term—is not the noblest work of God; but the man who is honest towards God and towards his fellow-men—in short, a Christian man—is the noblest work of God.

I believe that many of us are too much in the habit of looking at the duties of a Christian as confined to mere religious ordinances, and forget or lose sight of the fact that man is a social being, and that his religion does not render him less a social being. In the Bible, duties, commendations, promises, constantly refer to the social life, walking with God and before God, as having to live with and before men in all the necessary associations of life, family relations, business relations, the social compact in which the Christian is not to be a mere cipher, but to bring into society a new element, a power, leaven, salt, "Ye are the salt of the earth."

As Christian men, we are bound to make our religion the active governing principle of life, carrying it with us in the workshop, in the daily employment, in the social circle, in our politics, wherever we are called in the Providence of God to move or to act—being "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

I desire to speak to-night more particularly of the example of Christian men, and of the power of that example. Now, there are some persons who, if we talk to them about their influence, will tell us, "I have no influence." I have heard men say, "I do not think I have any influence; if I thought I had any influence, I would do thus and so." Now, the idea of any man or woman without influence is an absurdity. You exert an influence, and you cannot help it. If you stand still, fold your arms, shut your eyes, close your lips, you exert an influence by the position you occupy—you cannot help it.

Some persons have an idea that to exert an influence they must make a great noise, or they must do some great thing. We read in the Bible of Andrew, and we read that when Jesus called Andrew he followed Him; but we do not read of many things that Andrew did. We do not read that he preached long sermons, or gave magnificent speeches, or gathered large crowds about him; but we read of one thing he did, "Andrew went and called Peter," and Peter stood up, and three thousand were converted in one day.

I remember hearing that on the lake of Geneva they placed a bell on the surface of the lake, close to the water's edge, for some experiment, and at every stroke of the bell there was a ripple and a vibration on the other side of the lake. Just so it is with you. There is a moral electricity connecting heart with heart, as the electric wire connects island with island. You cannot make a motion without exerting an influence. It is not, I say, the noisiest of us who exert the most influence; it is not those who are the most prominent that exert the most influence; there have been silent quiet influences that have told more than all the force and power that could be put forth.

Professor Horsford tells us that the granite pile on Bunker's Hill, on a cloudy day, stands solid, upright, and immovable; but on a bright sunny day, by the expansive power of the light, that mighty monument moves. It moves slightly, but it moves sufficiently to be detected by the sweep of a pendulum hanging from the inner centre of its apex to the stone floors, something over two hundred feet below. Now I think we may use that as an illustration of your influence—quiet, silent influence, like the soft rays of light, will do that which a thousand men with heavy ropes, pulling and hauling with a great noise, never would have been able to accomplish.

A LANDLORD AND TRAVELLER.

We, I say again, cannot live without exerting an influence upon our fellow-men every day; and to exert a good influence, or set a right example, there must be Christian consistency. The world expects it—the world looks for it; and while it may despise your religion, honors those who are consistent in the practice of that which they profess. In the United States, in some portions of the West, on the steamboats, and at hotels, they reduce the charge upon ministers of the Gospel. Ministers who are travelling will go to the captain, sometimes, and say, "I am a minister of the Gospel," and they either refund his fare or take something from it. At the wayside inns, he will say, "I am a minister of the Gospel," and they will make him pay accordingly.

One minister travelling put up at a wayside inn, and when he came to pay his bill in the morning, he said to the landlord, "I am a minister of the Gospel." "What!" he said, "a minister of the Gospel!" "Yes," he said, "I am." "Well," he said, "when you sat down to your food, you gave no sign of being a Christian; when you retired to your bedroom you gave no sign of being a Christian by offering up a prayer. No, my friend, you have ate like a heathen, you have drank like a heathen, you have slept like a heathen—now pay like a heathen."

THE WOODSMAN'S FAMILY PRAYER AND THE INFIDEL.

Now I say that the world expects consistency, and when it does not find it, to all the hatred and bitterness against the principle is added a contempt for the professor. A young man, an infidel, was travelling in the western part of the United States with a very large sum of money upon him, and he was conveying it from one town to another, across a very desolate district. He was much in hopes of reaching a certain town before night;—night came on when he was five miles away. He saw a light, and went to a log hut, and asked if he could find shelter for the night.

A woman came, and said she guessed he could, that her old man was away, but that if he would put his horse up on the lee side of the cabin he might come in. He came in, looked about him, was very suspicious—thought of his money—"What a place to rob me in!—what a place to murder me, and nobody the wiser of it." And he sat there very uneasy till the man came in—a rough-looking woodsman, a pioneer, or trapper. He gave him a sort of rough welcome; but looking, as these men will, furtively out of the corner of his eye, he seemed to take the measure of the young chap, and then talked with him, and gave him something to eat.

He ate in fear and trembling, kept his hand on his treasure, very nervous, very anxious, very tremulous. The man said to him, "I will show you where you can sleep, sir." He rose, all timid and trembling; he did not like the looks of it. "What a place that would be to murder a man! Oh dear!—my money and my life are in danger." So he came and sat by the fire, and made up his mind that he would not go to bed that night. The man urged him to retire. "It's time to go to bed." "Ah!" he thought, "time for you, but not for me." He was going to sit up all night.

"Very well," said he, "young man, if you choose to sit here all night I shall not, and you certainly will have no objection to my doing that which I have been accustomed to do for many years—reading a psalm out of the best of all books, and asking God's blessing upon us." That very moment, infidel as he was, his fears were gone; he went to bed, and never thought of his money. And he was so impressed with it, that he wrote a letter to the newspapers renouncing his infidelity, because of the power of Christian example upon him on that occasion.

No amount of eloquence, talent, or profession will compensate for the want of a good example. Now I find a great many persons who engage in reforms, and consider that they are engaging in them heartily; but if you watch them you will find that they go into these reforms just so far as it does not touch them personally. Now we will take, if you please, the Sabbath question. There are those who are in favor of upholding the sanctity of the Sabbath day. But some of these men—Christian men, too—seem to me sometimes to be preparing—or you will allow me, if you please, to illustrate what I mean by an anecdote of a negro—and we get some of our best illustrations from homely life.

CATO THE NEGRO AND SUNDAY WORK.

A negro was hired by a Christian man as an assistant on his farm. This man was one of those who are always in favor of keeping the Sabbath, except when works of necessity demanded that there should be something done, and then he always quoted Scripture. But it was noticed that he was always preparing for Sunday work; and in haying time he would always cut down a lot of grass on Saturday night, so that he could have an excuse for tossing the hay about in the morning, and shaking the dew off it.

So he called this negro one Sunday morning. "Come, Cato, get up!" "Don't want to get up; Sunday morning, massa; always lay a-bed Sunday morning." "But get up, and get your breakfast." "Don't want no breakfast on Sunday morning, massa: rather lay a-bed than breakfast." "But you must get up, and help us shake the dew off the grass." "Don't do no work on Sundays, massa; I didn't hire out to work Sundays." "Oh! but this is a work of necessity." "Don't see that, massa, at all; don't see that it's no work of no necessity." "Well, but would you not pull your ox out of the pit on the Sabbath day?" "Oh yes! massa; but not if I shoved him in on Saturday night."

You know I am very much afraid there is a good deal of this shoving in on Saturday night. And let me tell you the world looks at this, and the world makes its comments upon it. Are there none of you who would speak out bravely against that man's using an excursion train to go into the fields on the Sabbath day, while you use the same agency to go from your own place of worship to hear a popular preacher? Now, is that consistent? You will oppose the general use of cabs on the Sabbath day; and yet you will take a cabman from one end of the city to the other to hear a favorite preacher. Is this consistent?

AN ORANGE GIRL AND. SUNDAY TRADING.

You are opposed to Sunday trading. So am I. I saw a poor girl selling oranges last night; she was crying very bitterly; she had spread her oranges out, and was wiping the tears from her eyes—you know it was bitterly cold last night. As I passed her, I thought to myself, "There is trouble;" so I turned and said, "Well, my girl, what is the matter?" She said, "I have lost eighteen pence, and it is all I have taken to-day." I said, "How much do you take generally?" "Sometimes I take half-a-crown; last Saturday I was out from nine o'clock in the morning till ten at night, and I took two and fourpence halfpenny."

I said, "How much did you make?" "I made sevenpence, sir." I said, "Do you make a shilling a day?" "Oh sir! I wish I did; a shilling a day, sir! I do not make sixpence a day." I said, "It is rather a hard case how did you lose your money?" She told me, and a very natural way it was. I gave her half-a-crown, and I said, "Have you had any dinner?" She said, "I never have any dinner; I never get any thing to eat from the time I go out till the time I come home; but I will have some dinner to-day," although it was about seven o'clock in the evening.

Now here is a girl twelve years of age, cold, shivering, and scantily clad, selling her oranges, buying them at three shillings a hundred and selling them at two for three-halfpence, and a halfpenny or a penny a piece. Now, shall we sweep these poor creatures out of the streets on Sunday while we do nothing to stop the traffic of the dram-shops, the gin-shops, and the beer-shops on Sunday? Now, to be consistent, if we would crush the one, we should seek with all the power we have to crush out the other.

The Consumptive; or, "I'm going to Jesus."—I called to see a little girl who was dying of consumption. She was sitting in an arm-chair. I reminded her of giving her some little books, and we spoke of her young companion having died since that time. "Well, I'm come as an ambassador to you to-day," I said. "You know when the Queen sends a message to the Emperor of China she sends an ambassador?" "Yes, sir," she replied. "Well, I am an ambassador from Jesus to-day, and His message is, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' Do you believe on Him?" "Yes, sir." "And are you willing that He should save your soul, and wash all your sins away?"—Yes, sir." She answered me in such artless, childlike sincerity, that I burst into tears. I then knelt beside her in prayer. Then, at my request, she repeated after me the following earnest words to the Saviour: "Dear Lord Jesus, do thou save my soul; wash all my sins away, and take me to glory when I die, for Jesus' sake. Amen." She sat in the chair all the time, very weak and still, with a sweet smile on her face—a real picture of waiting on the Lord!

Friends like Shadows.—The Rev. J. Wright, Rector of Falmouth, Cornwall, preaching on January 5th, referred to the failure of Tweedy's Bank. His text was Judges 24:15, "But as for me and my household, we will serve the Lord." He spoke of the value of a religious life amid the thousand cares and calamities of life, and referred to Job's conduct when afflicted as a bright example to those of our own day, and to the help under misfortunes which men had who lived a godly life. Then he traced the various calamities of the past year—the war, the explosions, the foundering of the Eurydice, the Princess Alice collision, by which so many lives were lost, then the late bank failures, and then the recent failure of Tweedy & Williams's Bank, founded 110 years since, the proprietors being men who were known for their strict attention to religious duties and their moral qualities, and who were now brought to sorrow, grief, and anguish, together with many of their neighbors; and he finished by observing that friends were like shadows—when the sun shone on a man, a shadow followed him, but when he was under a cloud the shadow vanished.

Preachers and Sunday-school Teachers anxious to keep their flocks together may take a suggestion from the following incident:

A Christian man, whilst travelling in Dorsetshire, England, overtook a large flock of sheep following, not preceding, their shepherd. Struck by the somewhat unusual incident, he accosted the man, asking how he accounted for the circumstance; to which he replied, "I lead them by their teeth." As this answer was unintelligible to the questioner, the shepherd explained, "I give them good fodder, and therefore find no difficulty in keeping them together." Let this be a hint to those who teach in the Sunday-school, or in more public and responsible positions, and we may then hear less complaint concerning the lack of interest in our various religious assemblies.

THE WAY OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 16th.—Psalm 1. Golden Text, Prov. 4:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day teaches us that "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." But every path must have a beginning, and so it is with this one. "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. 3:13, 14).

"The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way" (Prov. 14:8). Every sailor knows it is madness to steer without a compass on board, and yet, how many immortal souls are there who understand business, pleasure, science, art, literature, any thing which will end with time, but they do not understand their way.

Our Psalm begins with the word "Blessed." "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity" (Psa. 32:1, 2). So says David by the Holy Ghost, and so quotes Paul, Rom. 4:6–8. And in our Psalm we see the fruits of this blessedness. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly." Where then does he walk? "They shall walk, O Lord! in the light of thy countenance" (Psa. 89:15). "Nor standeth in the way of sinners," for they "stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God" (Psa. 135:2); "nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful," for God hath "made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:6).

Here we see the counsel, the way, and the seat of the wicked are all to be avoided by the man whom God calls blessed. O how many have erred through evil counsel! Solomon, although he was the wisest man who ever lived, fell away from God through the evil counsel of his wives; Aaron made the golden calf through the counsel of the people. Eve fell through the counsel of the serpent. What is the counsel of the ungodly? Don't go to extremes in your religion, don't make yourself peculiar. Keep your religion to yourself, and don't intrude it upon other people, and avoid, above all, committing yourself to a decision.

Such is the counsel of the ungodly, and what saith the Lord? As to extremes, he tells us, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind" (Luke 10:27). If this is not extreme, I don't know what is. As to peculiarity, he says (1 Pet. 2:9), ye are "a peculiar people," and, moreover, in Tit. 2:14, we read that Jesus gave Himself for us with the express object that He might "redeem us from all iniquity and purify to Himself a peculiar people." Instead of exhorting us to keep our religion to ourselves, He says, "Preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15); and, again, "What ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the housetops" (Matt. 10:27). God calls to a decision, and says, "The Holy Ghost saith, To-day if ye will hear His voice harden not your hearts" (Heb. 3:7, 8). And the Apostle John (1 Epistle 5:13) says, "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life." Here is the fullest assurance.

But not alone in following the counsel of the ungodly is there danger. To stand needlessly in the way of sinners is dangerous. When we are on a mission for the Master, then can we seek sinners without being contaminated; but when it is for the pleasure of their society, or for the honor or profit which may occur to us through such or such an unconverted person, we are on dangerous ground; the Word of God gives us no standing place there. We have a mission from God to sinners, but we have no warrant from God to better ourselves in an earthly sense by them, and when we do, sometimes we are let into sitting in the seat of the scornful before we are aware of it, and we have got into such a position of obligation to an ungodly man that it is out of our power to speak to him about his soul.

This is the negative side, the positive is very lovely. "But his delight is in the law of the Lord, and in His law doth he meditate day and night." Here is the safety of a true man of God, "The law of his God is in his heart, none of his steps shall slide" (Ps. 37:31). No man can be truly blessed who is not a lover of God's word, not of the letter, but of the Spirit. "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," etc. (Col. 3:16). A Christian who lives in his Bible is always full of fresh thoughts to help others; he can teach and admonish. What we know soon becomes exhausted if there is not a fresh supply from the fountain. Then, too, the Word of God is our means of communication with God.

"And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season." Now, what is fruit? It is the husbandman's reward for the labor which he bestows upon his trees, the fruit is yielded back to him. And our fruit is that which we yield to Christ, the outcome of what we have first received from Him. But does it mean Christian graces, or does it mean Christian work and the souls won thereby. Surely both. In Gal. 5:22 we read, "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Here it is distinctly the Christian graces ,and how lovely they are; the blessed man brings them forth, and they are ever riper, love becomes less fitful, and more universal towards man and more intense and deep towards God. Joy becomes a settled habit which is not dependent upon outward circumstances; peace, which was first peace with God, ripens into the peace of God which passeth all understanding; and thus God's character becomes reflected from him, and he learns to be longsuffering with others as God has been with him; a wondrous gentleness pervades a nature which was once rugged, and thus the fruit accumulates in the spiritual autumn of the blessed man's life. But "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit;" and Paul writes to the Romans, "I purposed to come unto you," "that I might have some fruit among you also, even as mong other Gentiles" (Rom. 1:13). This is the conversion of souls.

"His leaf also shall not wither." The child of God whose delight is in God's law shall be "like a green olive tree in the house of God" (Ps. 52:8). There is a freshness and verdure about those who draw their spiritual strength constantly from God, and when our prayers wither, or our strength to work for Him fails, then it is very clear that we are not at the source of our strength. And look, "Whatsoever he doeth, it shall prosper." So was it with Joseph in the most disadvantageous circumstances, "and his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hands" (Gen. 39:3); and it was so also with the keeper of the prison. He saw also that the Lord was with Joseph, and we have abundant evidence in the lives of Abraham, Moses, David, Daniel, Paul, etc., how God makes His people to prosper.

"The ungodly are not so." Were nothing more said about the ungodly this would be enough. They are "like the chaff which the wind driveth away," of no value and no weight. This is awful, but it is true. Therefore "the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment." When He sits upon the great white throne, from whose face the heaven and the earth shall flee away, where is there standing ground for such as have no foothold upon the Rock of ages? Oh that every reader would enter this day, if he has not done so before, in at the strait gate, which, blessed be God, is not closed yet! For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous—the shining, light-giving way—and the way of the ungodly shall perish. His hopes, his plans, his provisions, all come to nought.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Resignation of Marshal MacMahon, President of the French Republic, is another illustration of the paradox that "nothing is so likely to occur in France as the unlikely." Last week the vote of confidence in the ministry seemed to have settled political difficulties on a permanent and satisfactory basis. The President had yielded in the matter of certain administrative and judicial appointments, and it was supposed that the other questions in abeyance would be also harmoniously arranged. It was, however, considered by the Republican party in the Congress that certain important military appointments being in the hands of men who avowedly dislike the Republic constituted an element of danger to the stability of the Government. A demand was, therefore, made for their removal, but the President said he would rather resign than desert his friends, who were tried and able men. It was the alternative that had been offered MacMahon before—submission or resignation; he had chosen the former in the past, but now he has chosen the latter, and his resignation has been accepted.

Mons. Jules Grevy, who has been elected President of the Republic in the room of Marshal MacMahon, has, until his election, filled the post of President of the Assembly. He is a firm but moderate republican. He was a member of the House at the time of Napoleon's coup-d'état in 1851, and with difficulty escaped imprisonment. During the early years of the Empire he took no part in politics, but towards the close of that epoch he was elected to the House, and while there was a strenuous opponent of Imperialism. After Sedan he was a supporter of M. Thiers, and was in 1871 elected President of the Assembly by an almost unanimous vote, and he has held the post ever since. In choosing him as successor to MacMahon the Houses have displayed great wisdom and the appointment is popular throughout the country.

M. Gambetta succeeds M. Grevy as President of the Assembly, and in doing so has shown his moderation; there is no doubt that had he desired it he might have been chosen President of the Republic.

A Terrible Pestilence, resembling the plague or "Black Death" of the Middle Ages, is raging among the Cossacks of Astrachan, and seems to be spreading into other parts of Russia. Nearly all those who are attacked die. At a place called Stanitza, among a population of only six hundred, fifteen or twenty people have died every day. In one village two hundred and ninety-two persons were attacked up to January 6th, of whom two hundred and forty-six died. The Cossack population is described as in a state of complete panic; they will not approach the sick or bury the dead. It is supposed that the disease has been brought from Turkey in the clothes of soldiers returning home. It seems nearly the same plague as that which almost depopulated London in 1666.

The Afghan War.—The unopposed occupation of Candahar by the British troops under General Stewart on January 16th is the last news of importance from the seat of war. The entry took place about noon, the whole of the troops entering the city, escorted by the principal inhabitants, and the Ghilzai, Seistan, and other chiefs. All the shops were closed, and the people of the city collected together in great crowds to view the entry of the British, but their attitude was apathetic. The camp was pitched to the north-east of Candahar. Great quantities of powder, shell, and small-arm ammunition have been found, besides one howitzer and a gun. The rest of the artillery has evidently been carried off.

Thus it appears that whilst Sir Samuel Brown with his brigadiers, Macpherson and Tytler, have cleared their way to Jellalabad on the road to Cabul, General Donald Stewart has reached the former Afghan capital almost without the loss of a man.

Only eight weeks have elapsed since the British forces, in three columns, received orders to advance into Afghanistan, and already we are in possession of all the strategical positions on which the Indian Government had set their heart. With a list of casualties which do not reach two hundred we have established ourselves at Jellalabad and Candahar, while in front of us is a nation given over to anarchy, the ruler of which has fled. Surely never in our military history has a more satisfactory—shall we add a more inglorious—campaign been waged. From the present position of affairs it seems almost certain that little more can be done till spring, unless, indeed, Yakoob Khan should take the advice of the Ghilzie chiefs and make terms with the British.

Mr. Spurgeon.—The Spurgeon Bazaar Testimonial, which came to a close on Thursday, January 9th, has been a magnificent success. The sum accruing from sales at the Bazaar reached about 3500*l.*; while the amount received towards the Testimonial from private sources does not fall short of 3000*l.* Thus the entire proceeds will reach 6500*l.* The movement, which professedly started to compliment Mr. Spurgeon, has resulted in securing a permanent source of income to be devoted to the comfort and happiness of aged and deserving people. The entire amount goes in investment for the benefit of those of whom Mr. Spurgeon writes: "The objects of our care are not far to seek; there they are at our gates—widows worn down with labor, often pale, emaciated, delicate, and even consumptive—boys half famished, growing up neglected, surrounded with temptation. Can you look at them without pity? We cannot. We will work for them as long as our brain can think and our pen can write and our heart can love; neither sickness nor weariness shall tempt us to flag in this sacred enterprise."

Mr. Spurgeon, whose health we rejoice to learn has much improved, though he is still weak, has yielded to the earnest solicitations of his flock to take a repose of three months, and accordingly left home for Mentone on Thursday last. He was unable to preach the previous Sunday. His son Thomas, and Mr. Passmore, his publisher, accompany him.

The first sermon of his twenty-fifth volume, the 1450th of the whole series, was issued just before he left. Beside the fact of their continuance throughout each consecutive week for twenty-four years, the wonderful thing is their continued freshness and force. The last issued is "from the sick chamber of C. H. Spurgeon," and is marked by the wonted style and power. May our beloved friend soon be restored in health, and live in harness to celebrate his golden wedding!

Prince Leopold, the youngest son of Queen Victoria, is said to be anxious to enter the Christian ministry. He is said to be the most refined, and to bear most resemblance to his father in mental qualities of the whole family. He is popular with all who have met him on the continent, and great French ladies who found themselves in his society last year at Nice are never tired of speaking of this Prince Charming. He is an excellent musician, like his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, and has an agreeable tenor voice, which he is perfectly willing to exercise when asked to sing. But the latest rumor is that Prince Leopold desires to turn his powers to the singing of anthems, and is pressing his mother to allow him to take orders.

Lord Derby as a Temperance Advocate.—In a speech of considerable value and importance at Rochdale, England, recently, Lord Derby paid a well-deserved tribute to the "silent, uncomplaining endurance" with which the people had borne the sufferings caused by the present depression of trade, while acknowledging that "there was no use in denying the fact that we are face to face with an industrial crisis such as we have not seen since the days of the cotton famine." Lord Derby advises all to live as economically as possible in hopes of better times, and with respect to the drinking customs of the people said:

"I am not going to give you a lecture on what is called teetotalism. If that rule of life be a duty for one class it is equally a duty for all. I honor those who, for the sake of example and social usefulness, sacrifice a lawful indulgence But not the less the fact remains that if the quantity of liquor and tobacco consumed in the British islands were reduced by one half, besides all other incidental advantages, you would effect a reduction in taxation mainly for the benefit of the working classes to the amount of twenty million pounds sterling. You pay forty and a half millions of taxes in Customs and Excise for liquor and tobacco. If we could only manage that little reduction of one half—which, after all, does not imply the adoption of very ascetic habits by our people—do not you think that besides the gain in comfort and health, besides having fewer paupers and less work for the police, we shall have done something for public economy and something for the cause of peace?"

Mr. Sankey, who has been holding Gospel meetings at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, writes, under date January 13th: "We are having very interesting meetings here. Perhaps not less than eight thousand men attended two meetings yesterday (Sunday). We have had the Circus for the last two Sabbaths, it being the largest audience-room in the town. During the week we have the Chapels, and always an overflow, filling a second chapel. We have had some inquirers every service."

The Present Distress.—A Painful evidence of the wide-spread distress which at present exists, not only in the country, but London itself, is afforded by the poverty-stricken crowds which besieged the premises of the Tower Hamlets Mission in the Mile End Road, London, on an intimation that a piece of dry bread and cup of cocoa would be given to every applicant. Last week, on Wednesday evening, between five hundred and six hundred men, women, and children gathered in front of the mission premises, some of them neat and clean, though obviously poor—many dirty, ragged, and repulsive. Young mothers were there with infants in arms, and older matrons with squalid children at their feet. The great proportion of the visitors—at least ten to one—were men, of whom many wore no shirts, and probably not one had such a thing as a collar. For the most part they had the look of men dispirited by compulsory idleness, and strangers to a substantial meal. One mechanic said he had been idle for ten weeks, and he added, "there are plenty more of us." The crowd was as dense as at the door of a theatre, but an almost absolute silence prevailed. A weight as of lead seemed to hang on every head, and gayety would have seemed as much out of place as at a funeral.

An Italian Premier on the Hope of the World.—The recent utterances of Signor Lanza, who has been more than once Prime Minister of Italy, deserve to be recorded. He writes, in a popular newspaper: "I hold strongly that the Gospel contains the germs of almost unlimited progress, political and moral. The Divine Book which proclaims the abolition of slavery, universal brotherhood, peace on earth, the duty of giving to our poor brethren of our superabundance, etc., ought to have power to meet the utmost needs of our commonwealth, and to be the credo of our entire humanity. There is only wanting an apostle who would know how to bring back freshness to the holy dogmas of the Christian faith, and to revive the religious enthusiasm of the people for them. I am confident that when the time is ripe he will appear."

Stretch It.—A little girl and her younger brother were on their way to the store one windy, frosty morning. They were both poorly dressed, but the little girl had a sort of cloak over her. As they walked briskly along she drew the boy closer to her, and said, "Come under my cloak, Johnny." "It isn't big enough for both," said he. "Then I will try to stretch it a little." And they were soon closely nestled together. What a lesson! How many shivering bodies and sad hearts there are, just because people do not stretch their comforts beyond themselves.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, Bart., the Distinguished Promoter of Temperance.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, BART.

The Leader of the Temperance Party—The Design of the Permissive Bill—His Ancient Family—Early Years—Enters the House of Commons—First Introduction of the Permissive Bill—Extract from his Great Speech on the Liquor Traffic—His Denunciation of the Infamous Opium Trade—Sir Wilfrid's Wit and Humor—His Liberality in the Cause of Temperance.

THIS distinguished English Baronet holds the proud position of leader of the Temperance Party in Great Britain, and is the recognized representative of the United Kingdom Alliance in the House of Commons. He is an independent member, but usually votes with the Liberals on general questions. On all social topics and measures that have for their object the moral welfare of the people, his voice is always heard on the right side. But the principal object of his efforts is the passing of a bill through the houses of Parliament, which is known as the Permissive Bill, and to this object he may be said to have consecrated his life.

The aim of the Permissive Bill is to confer on owners and occupiers of property in any district the right of deciding by vote whether any intoxicating liquors shall be sold within that district. So that in any neighborhood where the majority of the inhabitants are total abstainers they would be enabled, should the Permissive Bill ever become law, to close all places licensed for the sale of alcohol in any form, and to exclude from their borders all dealers in intoxicants. The task of introducing this measure and fighting it in a house of which so many brewers are members, is no easy work, and that task has been voluntarily undertaken and enthusiastically pressed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

The family of this amiable and renowned champion of the Permissive Bill derive their name from John Lawson, who in the first year of Henry the Third (1216) was lord of the manor of Fawlisgrave, Yorkshire. One of his descendants was Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Kt., who acquired the estate of Isell, in Cumberland, by marriage with the widow of Thomas Leigh. Sir Wilfrid having no children, the estate passed to his nephew, William Lawson, whose son William was created a baronet by James the Second. Sir Wilfred Lawson, tenth baronet, died childless in 1806, when the title became extinct; but by Sir Wilfrid's will the estates were bequeathed to his wife's nephew, Thomas Wybergh, who thereupon assumed the name and arms of Lawson, and, dying childless in 1812, was succeeded by his brother Wilfrid, who thereupon likewise assumed the name and arms of Lawson; and in 1831 was created a baronet. He was an able advocate of the Temperance movement, and, dying in 1867, was succeeded in the baronetage by his son, the present Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

The subject of our memoir was born at Brayton Hall, near Carlisle, England, on September 4th, 1829, his mother being a sister of the late Sir James Graham. In 1857 he entered the electoral field as Liberal candidate for West Cumberland; and, though defeated, stood for Carlisle in conjunction with his uncle, Sir James Graham, at the election of April, 1859, when he was successful by a small majority.

In the following year he married Mary, daughter of J. Pocklington-Senhouse, Esq. For five years he made but little figure in the House of Commons, but on March 4th, 1864, first moved for leave to bring in the Permissive Bill. Mr. H. A. Bruce, on behalf of the Ministry, said: "The Government does not object to the introduction of the Bill, but, in taking that course they do not pledge themselves to assent to its further progress." Great meetings were held and petitions sent in, in favor of the measure; and on the day appointed for the second reading a deputation, among the members of which were Mr. Pope, Q.C., the Rev. W. N. Molesworth, and Prof. F. W. Newman, introduced by Lord Calthorpe, waited on the late Lord Palmerston, then First Lord of the Treasury, and used arguments in its favor. On that day, Mr. Lawson made an able speech in favor of the second reading of the Bill, the rejection of which was moved by Captain Jervis, and seconded by Mr. Roebuck in a sarcastic speech, the latter gentleman having ever since continued a bitter opponent of the Permissive measure; and after a three hours' debate the House divided, the numbers being 292 against, and 35 for the Bill.

Mr. Lawson also showed himself an able opponent of unnecessary warlike expenditure, and in March, 1865, moved for the reduction of the Yeomanry vote, which is a vote of money to support a species of mounted militia, composed principally of farmers and country gentlemen. The sum proposed to be voted was 91,000*l.* ($441,350), and he proposed to reduce it to 43,117*l.* ($209,118), but did not press it to a division; and about this time asked Sir George Grey, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government intended to introduce any public measure for remedying the evils produced by the Licensing Laws, since they refused to deal with them by any private Bill; on which Sir George curtly declined to do any thing of the kind during that session.

In the same year the rejection of the Liverpool Licensing Bill was moved by Mr. Lawson, and after a sharp debate the proposition was carried, and the Bill thrown out. In April of the same year, Mr. Cox, M.P. for Finsbury, moved an amendment to the Public House Closing Act, passed the previous year, which provided for the early closing of public-houses, asserting that various classes, such as market-gardeners, salesmen, compositors, etc., were inconvenienced by the provisions of the Act. He was opposed by Mr. Lawson, who contended that the Act had worked well on the whole, and had been productive of much good, though he admitted it was a grievance to those whose avocations took them out very early or very late to have ordinary refreshments classed with intoxicating drinks, and he thought that the sale of non-spirituous liquors might have been permitted; but this remark was met with loud cries of "No, no!"

In the same year he also opposed in the Committee of Ways and Means any reduction of the Malt Tax, suggesting in its place a reduction of the duty on tea.

At the election of 1865, Mr. Lawson was defeated by his Conservative opponent, Mr. Hodgson, and thus lost his seat for Carlisle, but continued with untiring zeal his exertions outside the House in favor of the good cause of temperance. In 1867 he succeeded to the title and estates on the death of his father, and at the general election of 1868 again stood for Carlisle, and this time with success.

Sir Wilfrid now resumed his able efforts in the House, and on May 12th, 1869, moved the second reading of the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill. He said: "I cannot tell the entire number of petitions which have been presented in favor of this Bill, but up to last night they amounted to no fewer than 2337, and that number has been greatly augmented during the last few hours. . . . . All the prominent speakers against the measure base their arguments for the repression of drunkenness upon education—and I also believe in that—but it must be education of the right sort; but whilst an army of clergymen and schoolmasters are engaged in instructing the people in what is good and virtuous, there is an army of 150,000 publicans and beer-sellers teaching the people to indulge in drinking habits—men who are paid by results, and who are licensed and empowered by the State to promote as large a sale of drink as possible, and by that means increase the revenue, of the National Exchequer."

He also commented on the fact that publicans' licenses are granted by the judges, notices having first been given to the overseers and chief constable of the parish, and also posted on the doors of the church, and of the house for which the license was applied, thus showing that it was the intention of the original framers of the licensing laws that the wishes of the inhabitants should be consulted. The motion was ably seconded by Mr. Bazley, M.P. for Manchester, while its rejection was moved by Colonel Jervis, M.P. for Harwich. Mr. G. O. Morgan ably supported the Bill, and the Home Secretary (Mr. Bruce) complimented Sir Wilfred on his manner of introducing the measure, observing, "I heartily join in the numerous congratulations which have been bestowed upon the honorable baronet on the manner in which he has introduced his Bill to the House. I have never heard so extreme a measure brought forward with so much moderation."

Sir George Grey appealed to Sir Wilfrid not to press for a division, but the latter considering that it was his duty to do so, the result was that 87 voted for the second reading, and 193 against it.

In the debate on the East India Revenue Accounts, on August 3d, 1869, Sir Wilfrid spoke out manfully on the question of the opium traffi in China; and, remarking that Mr. Grant Duf had said he would not allude to the moral aspects of the question, added, "He was right, fo there is no defence, on moral grounds, to th raising of revenue by such means. He told u that about 9,000,000*l.* ($43,650,000) of the India revenue (nearly one-fifth) was derived from opium What does that mean? It means that a larg portion of the most fertile soil in India is diverted from the production of food for the peopl and devoted to the production of a deleteriou drug. This drug is employed to pauperize an demoralize hundreds of thousands, if not mi lions, of the inhabitants of China.

Every year since 1868 Sir Wilfrid has presse for a division on his Bill. In 1871 the vote were, Ayes, 124; Noes, 196; and in 1872, Aye 81; Noes, 321. In that year Mr. Bruce, then Se retary of State for home affairs in Mr. Gladstone government, introduced the Intoxicating Liqu (Licensing) Bill, to which Sir Wilfrid gave hearty support, especially to what he consider "the very jewel of the Bill," by which the hou of the liquor traffic were shortened, observin "If he will stick to that we will stick to hi and carry the Bill through the House; but if wavers in this course we will throw him ove and never believe in him again." At the parli mentary election of 1874 Sir Wilfrid was succe ful, beating his highest opponent by 300 votes

Sir Wilfrid's speeches are strongly mark with wit and humor, as, for instance, when, i speech delivered in 1875, he said: "This cou try is in point of fact governed just now by t heathen deities—by Bacchus and by Mars— in other words, by the god of battles, and t god of bottles." In the same speech he fai convulsed the House by one argument advan with great apparent gravity. "England," protested, "had at that moment but two e mies—the Pope, and the Colorado beetle."

On September 1st, 1875, while addressing open-air gathering at Brayton Hall, compris some 12,000 persons, he said, "I don't bla the publicans. They are carrying on a law trade. The queen, lords, and commons h said to them, 'Go and sell drink, and m money by it,' and away they go. They are gent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the drink.

"Don't you people go away and imagine t I shall ever say a word against my good frie the publicans. They are the picked men of country. It has been decided by competent thorities that a man who has been convicte felony in former days may be returned to Pa ment and take his seat there, but he cannot k a public-house. We are far more strict at entering the public-house trade than we about entering Parliament. I will tell yo very curious thing that is going on, for aug know at this moment, in the town of Wi There is a clergyman applying for a license. he gets it, it will be a great day for the public and it will be a great day for them if he does get it, because it will show that they are s rior to the clergy, and that the magistrates w let a clergyman into their worshipful compa

In conclusion, we may notice the fact tha Wilfrid Lawson has subscribed 1000*l.* ($48 year for five years to the United Kingdom ance.

YOU have all heard of God's only-begotten n. Have you heard of God's daughter? She s born in heaven. She came down over the ls of our world. She had queenly step. On r brow was celestial radiance. Her voice s music. Her name is RELIGION. My text roduces her. "Her ways are ways of asantness, and all her paths are peace."

There has been some recent discussion in re- d to my theories of religion. Am I orthodox heterodox? In my sermon this morning, d in sermons at different times, I shall set be- e you what are my theories in regard to the ristian religion.

The fact is that theological study has had a dif- ent effect upon me from the effect sometimes duced. Every year I tear out another leaf m my theology until I have only three or four ves left. In other words, a very brief and in statement of Christian belief.

An aged Christian minister said: "When I s a young man, I knew every thing; when I to be thirty-five years of age in my ministry had only a hundred doctrines of religion; en I got to be forty years of age, I had only y doctrines of religion; when I got to be six- years of age, I had only ten doctrines of relig- ; and now I am dying at seventy-five years of , and that is, that Christ Jesus came into the ld to save sinners." And so I have noticed he study of God's Word, and in my contem- tion of the character of God and of the eter- world, that it is necessary for me to drop part of my belief and that part of my belief eing non-essential, while I cling to the one at doctrine that man is a sinner, and Christ is Almighty and Divine Saviour.

ow, I take these three or four leaves of my ology, and I find that in the first place, and inant above all others, is the sunshine of re- on. When I go into a room I have a passion throwing open all the shutters. That is what nt to do this morning. We are apt to throw much of the sepulchral into our religion, and close the shutters, and to pull down the blinds, it is only through here and there a crevice the light streams. The religion of the Lord s Christ is a religion of joy indescribable unutterable. Wherever I can find a bell I n to ring it.

there are any in this house this morning are disposed to hold on to their melancholy their gloom, let them now depart this ser- before the fairest and the brightest and the t radiant being of all the universe comes in. 's Son has left our world, but God's daugh- s here. Give her room! Hail! Princess of ven. Hail! daughter of the Lord God Al- hty. Come in and make this house thy ne-room.

setting forth this idea, the dominant theory eligion is one of sunshine. I hardly know re to begin, for there are so many thoughts rush upon my soul. A mother saw her lit- hild seated on the floor in the sunshine, and a spoon in her hand. She said: "My dar- what are you doing there?" "Oh," replied hild, "I'm getting a spoonful of this sun- ." Would God that to-day I might present a gleaming chalice of this glorious, everlast- Gospel sunshine!

rst of all, I find a great deal of

SUNSHINE IN CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.

I do not know of any thing more doleful than the companionship of the mere fun-makers of the world—the Thomas Hoods, the Charles Lambs, the Artemus Wards, the Charles Matthews of the world—the men whose entire business it is to make sport. They made others laugh, but if you will examine their autobiography, or biography, you will find that down in their soul there was a terrific disquietude. Laughter is no sign of happiness. The maniac laughs. The hyena laughs. The loon among the Adirondacks laughs. The drunkard dashing his decanter against the wall laughs.

There is a terrible reaction from all sinful amusement and sinful merriment. Such men are cross the next day. They snap at you on exchange, or they pass you, not recognizing you. Long ago I quit mere worldly society for the reason it was so dull, so inane, and so stupid. My nature is voracious of joy. I must have it.

I always walk on the sunny side of the street, and for that reason I have crossed over into Chrstian society. I like their mode of repartee better. I like their style of amusement better. They live longer. Christian people, I sometimes notice, live on when by all natural law they ought to have died. I have known persons who have continued in their existence when the doctor said they ought to have been dead ten years. Every day of their existence was a defiance of the laws of anatomy and physiology; but they had this supernatural vivacity of the Gospel in their soul, and that kept them alive. Put ten or twelve Christian people in a room for Christian conversation, and you will from eight to ten o'clock hear more resounding glee, see more bright strokes of wit, and find more thought and profound satisfaction, than in any merely worldly party.

Now, when I say

A "WORLDLY PARTY,"

I mean that to which you are invited because under all the circumstances of the case it is best for you to be invited, and to which you go because under all the circumstances of the case it is better that you go; and leaving the shawls on the second floor, and the hats on the third floor, you go to the parlor to give formal salutation to the host and the hostess, and then move around, spending the whole evening in the discussion of the weather, and in apology for treading on long trails, and in effort to keep the corners of the mouth up to the sign of pleasure, and going around with an idiotic he-he about nothing until the collation is served, and then after the collation is served going back again into the parlor to resume the weather, and then at the close going at a very late hour to the host and hostess and assuring them that you have had a most delightful evening, and then passing down off the front steps, the slam of the door the only satisfaction of the evening.

O young man! come from the country to spend your days in city life, where are you going to spend your evenings? Let me tell you, while there are many places of innocent worldly amusement, it is most wise for you to throw your body, mind, and soul into Christian society. Come to me at the close of five years and tell me what has been the result of this advice. Bring with you the young man who refused to take the advice, and who went into sinful amusement. He will come dissipated, shabby in apparel, indisposed to look any one in the eyes, moral character eighty-five per cent off. You will come with principle settled, countenance frank, habits good, soul saved, and all the inhabitants of heaven, from the lowest angel up to the archangel and clear past him to the Lord God Almighty, your coadjutors.

This is not the advice of a misanthrope. There is no man in the house to whom the world is brighter than it is to me. It is not the advice of a dyspeptic—my digestion is perfect; it is not the advice of a man who cannot understand a joke, or who prefers a funeral; it is not the advice of an old man, but the advice of a man who can see this world in all its brightness; and considering myself competent in judging what is good-cheer, I tell the multitudes of young men in this house this morning that there is nothing in worldly association so grand and so beautiful and so exhilarant as in Christian society.

I know there is a great deal of talk about the self-denials of the Christian. I have to tell you that where the Christian has one self-denial the man of the world has a thousand self-denials. The Christian is not commanded to surrender any thing that is worth keeping. But what does a man deny himself who denies himself the religion of Christ. He denies himself pardon for sin; he denies himself peace of conscience; he denies himself the joy of the Holy Ghost; he denies himself a comfortable death pillow; he denies himself the glories of heaven. Do not talk to me about the self-denials of the Christian life. Where there is one in the Christian life there are a thousand in the life of the world. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness."

Again (2), I find a great deal of religious

SUNSHINE IN CHRISTIAN AND DIVINE EXPLANATION.

To a great many people life is an inexplicable tangle. Things turn out differently from what was supposed. There is a useless woman in perfect health. There is an industrious and consecrated woman a complete invalid. Explain that. There is a bad man with thirty thousand dollars of income. There is a good man with eight hundred dollars of income. Why is that? There is a foe of society who lives on, doing all the damage he can, to seventy-five years of age; and here is a Christian father, faithful in every department of life, at thirty-five years of age taken away by death, his family left helpless. Explain that. Oh! there is no sentence that oftener drops from your lips than this: "I cannot understand it. I cannot understand it."

Well, now, religion comes in just at that point with its illumination and its explanation. There is a business man who has lost his entire fortune. The week before he lost his fortune there were twenty carriages that stopped at the door of his mansion. The week after he lost his fortune, all the carriages you could count on one finger. The week before his financial trouble began people all took off their hats to him as he passed down the street. The week his financial prospects were under discussion, people just touched their hats without anywise bending the rim. The week that he was pronounced insolvent, people just jolted their heads as they passed, not tipping their hats at all, and the week the sheriff sold him out all his friends were looking in the store windows as they went down past him.

Now, while the world goes away from a man when he is in financial distress, the religion of Christ comes to him and says, "You are sick, and your sickness is to be moral purification; you are bereaved: God wanted in some way to take your family to heaven, and He must begin somewhere, and so He took the one that was most beautiful and was most ready to go." I do not say that religion explains every thing in this life, but I do say it lays down certain principles which are grandly consolatory. You know business men often telegraph in

CIPHERS.

The merchant in Chicago telegraphs to the merchant in New York certain information in ciphers which no other man in that line of business can understand; but the merchant in Chicago has the key to the cipher, and the merchant in New York has the key to the cipher, and on that information transmitted there are enterprises involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now the providences of life sometimes seem to be a senseless rigmarole, a mysterious cipher; but God has a key to that cipher, and the Christian a key to that cipher, and though he may hardly be able to spell out the meaning, he gets enough of the meaning to understand that it is for the best. Now is there not sunshine in that? Is there not pleasure in that? Far beyond laughter, it is nearer the fountain of tears than boisterous demonstration. Have you never cried for joy? There are tears which are eternal rapture in distillation.

There are hundreds of people in this house who are walking day by day in the sublime satisfaction that all is for the best, all things working together for good for their soul. How a man can get along through this life without the explanation of religion, is to me a mystery. What! is that child gone forever? Are you never to get it back? Is your property gone forever? Is your soul to be bruised and to be tried forever? Have you no explanation, no Christian explanation, and yet not a maniac? But when you have the religion of Jesus Christ in your soul, it explains every thing so far as it is best for you to understand. You look off in life, and your soul is full of thanksgiving to God that you are so much better off than you might be. A man passed down the street without any shoes, and said: isn't it a hardship that I have no shoes? Other people have shoes; no shoes, no shoes," until he saw a man who had no feet. Then he learned a lesson. You ought to thank God for what He does, instead of grumbling for what He does not.

"I HAVE NO SHOES;

God arranges all the weather in this world—the spiritual weather, the moral weather, as well as the natural weather. "What kind of weather will it be to-day?" said some one to a farmer. The farmer replied, "It will be such weather as I like." "What do you mean by that?" asked the other. "Well," said the farmer, "it will be such weather as pleases the Lord, and what pleases the Lord pleases me."

Oh! the sunshine, the sunshine of Christian explanation. Here is some one bending over the grave of the dead. What is going to be the consolation? The flowers you strew upon the tomb? Oh no! The services read at the grave? Oh no! The chief consolation on that grave is what falls from the throne of God. Sunshine, glorious sunshine. Resurrection sunshine.

(3.) Again: I find a great deal of the sunshine of this Bible and of our religion in the climacteric

JOYS THAT ARE TO COME.

A man who gets up and goes out from a concert right after the opening voluntary has been played, and before the prima donna sings, or before the orchestra begins, has a better idea of that concert than that man has who supposes that the chief joys of religion are in this world. We here have only the first note of the eternal orchestra. We shall in that world—we get an antepast of it now.

We shall have the joy of discovery. We will in five minutes catch up with the astronomers, the geologists, the scientists, the philosophers of all ages, who so far surpassed us in this world. We can afford to adjourn astronomy and geology and many of the sciences to the next world, because we shall there have better apparatus and better opportunity. I must study these sciences so far as to help me in my work; but beyond that I must give myself to saving my own soul and saving the souls of others, knowing that in one flash of eternity we will catch it all. Oh! what an observatory in which to study astronomy heaven will be—not by power of telescope, but by supernatural vision; and if there be something doubtful ten million miles away, by one stroke of the wing you are there, by another stroke of the wing you are back again, and all in less time than I tell you, catching it all in one flash of eternity.

And geology! What a place that will be to study geology, when the world is being picked to pieces as easily as a school-girl in botanical lesson pulls the leaf from the corolla! What a place to study architecture, amid the thrones and the palaces and the cathedrals—St. Mark's and St. Paul's rookeries in comparison!

Sometimes you wish you could make the tour of the whole earth, going around as others have gone; but you have not the time, you have not the means. You will make that tour yet, during one musical pause in the eternal anthem. I say these things for the comfort of those people who are abridged in their opportunities—those people to whom life is a hum-drum, who toil and work, and toil and work, and aspire after knowledge but have no time to get it, and say, "If I had the opportunities which other people have, how I would fill my mind and soul with grand thoughts!" Be not discouraged, my friends. You are going to the university yet.

DEATH WILL ONLY MATRICULATE YOU into the royal college of the universe.

What a sublime thing it was that Doctor Thornwell, of South Carolina, uttered in his last dying moments! As he looked up he said, "It opens; it expands, it expands." Or as Mr. Toplady, the author of "Rock of Ages," in his last moment, or during his last hours, looked up and said, as though he saw something supernatural, "Light!" and then as he came on nearer the dying moment, his countenance more luminous, he cried, "Light!" and at the very moment of his departure lifted both hands, something supernatural in his countenance as he cried, "Light!" Only another name for sunshine.

Besides that, we shall have all the pleasures of association. We will go right up in the front of God without any fright. All our sins gone, there will be nothing to be frightened about. There our old Christian friends will troop around us. Just as now one of your sick friends goes away to Florida, the land of flowers, or to the South of France, and you do not see him for a long while, and after a while you meet him, and the hollows under the eyes are all filled, and the appetite has come back, and the crutch has been thrown away, and he is so changed you hardly know him; you say, "Why, I never saw you look so well." He says, "I couldn't help but be well. I have been sailing these rivers and climbing these mountains, and that's how I got this elasticity. I never was so well." O my friends! your departed loved ones are only away for their health in a better climate, and when you meet them they will be so changed you will hardly know them; they will be so very much changed, and after a while, when you are assured that they are your friends, your departed friends, you will say, "Why, where is that cough? Where is that paralysis? Where is that pneumonia? Where is that consumption?" and he will say, "Oh! I am entirely well; there are no sick ones in this country; I have been ranging these hills, and hence this elasticity. I have been here now twenty years, and not one sick one have I seen; we are all well in this climate."

And then I stand at the gate of the celestial city to see the processions come out, and I see a long procession of little children with their arms full of flowers, and then I see a procession of kings and priests moving in celestial pageantry—

but no black-tasselled vehicle, no mourning group; and I say, "How strange it is! where is your Greenwood? where is your Laurel Hill? where is your Westminster Abbey?" And they shall cry, "There are no graves here." And then I listen for the tolling of the old belfries of heaven, the old belfries of eternity. I listen to hear them toll for the dead; but they toll not for the dead: they only strike up a silvery chime, tower to tower, east gate to west gate, as they ring out, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Oh! unglove your hand and give it to me in congratulation on that scene. I feel as if I could shout. I will shout. Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Dear Lord, forgive me I ever complained about any thing. If all this is before us, who cares for any thing but God and heaven and eternal brotherhood? Take the crape off the door-bell. Your loved ones are only away for their health in a land ambrosial. Come, Lowell Mason; come, Isaac Watts; and give us your best hymn about joy celestial.

What is the use of postponing our heaven any longer? Let it begin now; and whosoever hath a harp, let her thrum it; and whosoever hath a trumpet, let him blow it; and whosoever hath an organ, let him give us a full diapason. They crowd down the air, spirits blest, moving in cavalcade of triumph. Their chariot wheels whirl in the Sabbath sunlight. They come so near, perhaps they wish us to shout out, "Halt armies of God! Halt! until we are ready to joi the battalion of pleasures that never die."

O my friends! it would take a sermon as lon as eternity to tell the joys that are coming to us I just set open the sunshiny door. Come in, all y dicsiples of the world who have found the worl a mockery. Come in, all ye disciples of the danc and see the bounding feet of this heavenly gla ness. Come in, ye disciples of worldly amusemen and see the stage where kings are the actors, an burning worlds the footlights, and thrones tl spectacular. Arise ye, dead in sin, for this is tl morning of resurrection. The joys of heav submerge our soul. I pull out the trumpet sto In Thy presence there is fulness of joy; at Tl right hand, there are pleasures forever more.

"Blessed are the saints beloved of God,
Washed are their robes in Jesus' blood;
Brighter than angels, lo! they shine,
Their glories splendid and sublime.

"My soul anticipates the day,
Would stretch her wing and soar away;
To aid the song, the palm to bear,
And bow, the chief of sinners, there."

Oh the sunshine, the glorious sunshine, t everlasting sunshine!

The sight was a novel He had never seen an Englishman preach bef He stopped to listen. There was an earnest in the "preaching colonel's" manner which rested his attention, but as he heard the exp sion "Son of God" his anger was arou against one who could boldly assert a doct so contrary to the teaching of the Koran. invited discussion, but the good old col told him that he was not a man educated in schools, nor used to discuss the sacred myst of God's Eternal Being, but that he would him a book in which the verities of our were carefully explained. He gave him Pfander's "Mizan-ul-Haqq," or "Balanc Truth."

Soon afterwards Dilâwar Khan went wit regiment to the siege of Delhi. During th dian Mutiny his bravery was conspicuous. manliness of Dilâwar's demeanor and his doubted loyalty to the English made him a favorite amongst the British officers of his ment. Some days after the capture of the Dilâwar came to the Adjutant and told him he thought of leaving the service. The officer took the trouble to make inqu and was able to assure Dilâwar that the case of this kind that happened was a w dressed in man's clothes, who was killed bullet. The comparative purity of the Europeans, their honesty and love of justi served to convince Dilâwar of the superior the claims of Christianity to that of Mohan anism. NE JACKSON ; or, THE BROKEN HEART.

By a Clergyman.

isit to Cornwall—Meeting Jane Jackson on the Cliff—er Evident Sorrow—Conversation and Walk to her Cot- ge Home—Her Crippled Mother—Sad Story of Jane's isnarement while in Domestic Service—Her Former ety.

URING my visit to the little watering place o —, a brother clergyman who was suddenly ed away on urgent business invited me to e Sunday duty for him. His church was iated in the neighboring village of E——, ong the wild and romantic scenery of Corn- l.

he day from which my narrative commences been one of unusual warmth and brilliancy, after the conclusion of the afternoon service as returning home, and leisurely pursuing my along the beaten track, which skirted the rocky cliffs, thankful to have escaped the re and heat of a dusty road in the middle of y for the pleasant turf and cool breezes of wide ocean.

iewed from that dizzy height,—

> "Calm as a crystalline lake the sea lay, > Stretching in measureless vastness away."

re and there white sails, scarcely distinguish- e in the distance from sea-fowl, relieved the from the unbroken expanse of blue, and drew th a wondering conjecture as to their mission destination.

ttracted by the still beauty of this scene, ich seemed in unison with the sacred day of t, I almost forgot the lapse of time, and lin- ed at each step to enjoy the prospect, and nk in fresh draughts of the invigorating sea . Never had I beheld such a Sabbath evening, ended with all the glad accessories of charm- scenery and fair weather. Every thing und seemed to kindle admiration, and to par- e of a Sabbath spirit, affording a painful con- st to the dull lethargy of human devotion,— nced by the scantily-attended church in which had been conducting the service,—and recall- forcibly the words of Bishop Heber's mis- nary hymn,—

> "While every prospect pleases,
> And only man is vile."

ickening my steps, I was reluctantly about to n from the sea, and to pursue a branch path ich would, I believed, lead me again in the di- tion of the main road, when my attention was oused by the figure of the lower rank of life, reclining on a ledge of ck at a little distance. I was about to pass on, ien it occurred to me that it would be well to in some information as to the direction of the ad I was in search of.

Her face being turned from me, and resting on r hand, she was wholly unconscious of my ap- oach, and started, apparently much confused, I inquired whether the path before me would ad to R——. As she rose from her seat, and rned her head to reply to my question, I was ruck by the expression of deep suffering on her untenance, which consorted strangely with her uthful appearance, but told too plainly of some ward struggle or heavy affliction. Unwilling to se the opportunity of throwing out a word of nsolation, and having thanked her for the in- rmation she had afforded me, I said, "You em unhappy. Will you tell me what has dis- essed you? Perhaps I may be able to help you."

She raised her head, looked at me for a mo- ent, as if striving to frame a reply, and then, vering her face with her hands, burst into a od of tears. Long she wept, at times almost nvulsively; and, thinking that this effort ight perhaps relieve her and restore calmness, waited till her grief had a little subsided before suming the conversation. "Do you live any- here near here?" I inquired, wishing to di- rt her thoughts into another channel. "Yes, r, just over those fields," pointing to a small hite cottage in the distance. "And is not ur home a happy one?"

My inquiry appeared to recall her former train thought, for she turned away her head, and I observed that she struggled to suppress her tears, as she answered hastily, "Not now, sir; it was once." "And what," I asked, "has occurred to make your home an unhappy one?" I waited for an answer, but as she appeared to hesitate, I added, "Are your parents living?" "Yes, sir." "And are they not kind to you?" I asked, fearing that the cause of her grief would soon be explained. "Oh, yes, sir!—too kind." "Parents both living and too kind!—why, surely you cannot have much cause for unhappiness at your early age?" I said. "It is not that, sir," she answered, "but I can't bear to see father and mother grieving so about me, and to know that I have done it! Oh, I wish I were dead and buried!"

"To murmur, and to wish yourself dead, is not the way to find peace," I replied. "Your troubles may be very heavy, but you must pray for grace to bear them patiently; and you know the Lord Jesus has promised to give rest to the weary and heavy laden, who come to Him?" "O sir!" she said, as a thought seemed to strike her, "if you would only come and talk to father a bit, and tell him that, it might help him to bear it better." "Certainly," I said, "if you wish it; I will see your father, and have some conversation with him. Shall we find him at home now?" "Yes, sir; father has just got back from church."

We now descended from the cliff, and crossed some fields in the direction of the cottage. "Do your parents attend the church at E——?" I asked. "Mother is a cripple, sir, and can't walk; but father and me used to go there before I went to service." "And your father, what occupation has he?" "He used to be a miner, sir, but now he works for Farmer Stephenson."

We had now approached the cottage, a small thatched building, prettily surrounded by trees, and inclosed in a small patch of garden. As we drew near the door, my companion stopped, and seemed reluctant to advance; then added, "Perhaps, sir, it would be best for you to see father alone, if you would please to walk in." To this I readily assented; and having reached reached the door, and knocked, it was opened for me by an elderly man of quiet and respectable appearance, whom I immediately recognized as one of the most attentive members of my afternoon's congregation.

Having invited me in, and requested me to be seated, he commenced the conversation thus: "A stranger, sir, in these parts?" "Yes," I replied; "I am on a visit to R——, and have engaged to help your minister for a few weeks during his absence." "Indeed, sir; very glad to see you, sir. Our clergyman is in bad health, sir, and does not often get up as far as this." "I should scarcely have found my way to your cottage now," I said, "but for your daughter, whom I met upon the cliffs, and it is by her wish that I have called to see you."

As I mentioned his daughter, I noticed an expression of sadness steal over his face as he answered quietly, "Poor Jane! has she told you then, sir?" "No," I said, "your daughter has told me nothing; but I found her apparently in great distress, and put some questions to her, which ended in her wishing me to call and see you."

"Ah! sir, hers is a sad story for one so young, —such a promising, well-spoken girl, too. I never thought I should ha' lived to see the day when my child would come home to her father a poor, ruined, broken-hearted creature. I can't a bear to look on her now, sir,"—the tears trickling down his furrowed cheeks,—"and think of what she was, and what she is now. I would rather ha' seen her dead beneath my feet than see her as she is. O sir!" he added, "it is not for a poor man like me to complain against the laws; but it is very hard, sir, that there is no justice for such as me!"

I was enabled to gather from what followed that, two years ago, his daughter had been permitted to accompany a lady to London as nurse to her children. Her new home not proving a comfortable one, she was anxious to leave, and in an evil moment she was persuaded, by a gentleman then visiting the family, to go away under the deceitful protection which he offered. Child as she was, and unskilled in the base deceptions of the world, she fell an easy victim to his wiles; and after being cruelly deserted at the end of a few months, and turned out of doors to seek a livelihood, she had wandered about, erring, homeless, and friendless, and not daring to communicate with her parents, until a kind lady, hearing her sad story, undertook to write to her friends, and had her restored to them.

It was some moments before I could sufficiently regain my composure to be able to answer. I felt as though any mere expression of human sympathy would be out of place while listening to details so intensely painful and distressing. It was one of those occasions when the earthly comforter is at fault, and where the minister of Christ, feeling his own inability to meet the case, is glad to have recourse to that unfailing treasury for every broken heart—the Word of God.

Taking from the cupboard a large family Bible, I opened almost mechanically at the thirteenth chapter of John, and my eye fell upon the words, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." Pointing to the passage I said, "Here is the explanation which God gives us of His dealings with us." "Sir," said the man, "that was our minister's text the Sunday afore our Jane left her home. She found it when she came from church for her poor old mother, and put a mark again it, as she said it might help to cheer her up a bit when she was all alone."

"Yes," I said, "these words have been the comfort of many a perplexed and troubled servant of God, and they should prevent our repining under what appears to us a grievous and overwhelming chastisement. God's ways are often dark and mysterious; but if, like Job, we can learn to say, 'Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him,' He will in the end make it plain. Yours has, indeed, been a heavy affliction, but God has, I hope, given you strength to bear it patiently."

"Well, sir, I don't know but what He has. At first it seemed as though I were all for murmuring, and then I was for seeking out and bringing in that villain to justice; ay, and I would ha' spent every penny I had saved to ha' done it. Sir, what right had he to mislead my poor little daughter? Was there no grand folks like hisself bad enough to please him, but must he needs go and rob a poor man of his only treasure, and break an old woman's heart by stealing away the peace of her child, and then to turn her away as he did just when the poor little thing had begun to trust him like?

"She, who was the best-conducted girl at the Sunday-school, and used to come home and tell her old mother how the minister had praised her for saying her verses so pretty. A quiet modest girl she was too; and then to think that she ha' come to that. But, then, we know that arn't enough to keep any one safe.

"How old is your daughter?" I inquired. "She appears very young." "Sixteen come next August, sir. She was fourteen when she went to place, and as been gone near two years." "And how," I asked, "does she seem to feel her position? Is she, do you think, truly sorry for the past? or is she merely distressed at the trouble she has brought upon herself and her friends?"

"Well, sir, you see the first night she came home her poor mother and me could say nothing to her for crying. Ah! sir, you might ha' heard us, all that long night through, sobbing over our poor lost Jane. I often think it wasn't right for us to treat her so, and a few kind words might ha' cheered her up a bit; but it seemed like such a blow to us—and even now I'm so weak, I ain't able to look her straight in the face without the tears starting up. She ha' never forgotten that night, and I fear she never will. She keeps on so fretting and worrying that we think it will be almost too much for her.

SHADOWS OF COMING NIGHT.

By Thomas W. Greenwell, M.R.S.L.

The Apocalypse and its Expositors—Mr. Guinness's Book—A.D. 1882—Futurist and Year-Day Interpretations—666—Signs in the East—Lord Beaconsfield—Rome's Dying Struggles.

THE prophetic intimation, which Professor Piazzi Smyth believes he has discovered in the Egyptian Pyramid, as to the end of the present age about or soon after 1882, agrees with the deductions of expositors from Daniel and the Apocalypse.

The Apocalypse was no doubt originally intended to be a guide for the true Church of Christ in all ages, and it will not fail when most required. At the era of the Reformation, such writers and thinkers as Luther, Zwingle, Melanchthon, Calvin, Bale, Foxe, and, after them, Brightman, Mede, Sir I. Newton, Bishop Newton, Vitringa, Daubuz, Whiston, Cressener, all adopted what has since been termed the historical year-day system of interpretation. During the struggles of the sixteenth century, the solemn denunciations of the Book of Revelation respecting Antichrist, Babylon, and Papal Rome were found to be the most powerful weapons in the hands of the Reformers.

The cry raised at the Reformation against the Church of Rome has never died away. The most conspicuous Protestant commentators of the present century are Faber, Scott, Cunninghame, Frere, Birks, Garratt, Elliott, Dr. Seiss, Dr. Cumming, and B. W. Newton, not to mention many others who adopt the Futurist system of interpretation.

Mr. Grattan Guinness's last book, entitled "The Approaching End of the Age," is a most valuable exposition of the historical interpretation. It brings out many singular facts, such as that the wonderful period of the 1260 years is an accurate astronomical soli-lunar cycle. M. de Cheseaux, the Swiss astronomer, first discovered this, and the fact goes far to confirm the truth of the year-day system of interpretation.

The eleventh chapter of Revelation informs us that the "holy city" is to be trodden under foot for forty-two months, i.e., 1260 days, which in the yearly historical fulfilment is 1260 years. This period, dated from the Saracen conquest, A.D. 637, would—if Jewish months are to be understood—run out about A.D. 1880. It is probable that the two great apostasies commence as follows: The Papacy, A.D. 533—606—621–2; and the Mohammedan, A.D. 621–2. If we add 1260 years to these dates, we get 1793—1866—1881–2. This agrees with the Pyramidal theory, as we showed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for January 30th.

At this juncture the reader may be inclined to ask, What is expected to happen at the close—or partial close—of the dispensation in 1881–2?

The Futurist school of expositors expect, when the "times of the Gentiles" shall be fulfilled, the complete accomplishment of Daniel's seventieth, or last, week of years, and the literal fulfilment of the Book of Revelation—the breaking of the seals, the sounding of the trumpets, the outpouring of the vials, together with the silencing of the witnesses for the three and a half years. Moses and Elijah are to appear at Jerusalem to warn mankind against worshipping Antichrist—supernatural men as against a supernatural man. Antichrist will endeavor to restore the apostate Jews, rebuild the temple, change times, laws, and seasons, and thus set up a false or counterfeit Millennium.

The historical or year-day school of expositors see in past history the partial or complete fulfilment of the three great septenaries. In the present year of grace (1878) it is assumed that the sixth vial is nearly finished. The Euphratean stream or Ottoman Empire is wellnigh dried up; the "unclean spirits" (Rev. 16 : 13) are already in the world on their Antichristian mission; and the Second Advent is believed to be at the doors.

We think that both the Historical and Futurist schemes of interpretation contain the elements of truth.

It is probable that the sixth seal, the sixth trumpet, and the sixth vial are all three in their historical fulfilment now in action. Six is always the number of incompleteness, seven of completion.

Again: 666 is the number of Antichrist or the "false prophet." This singular triad of incompleteness, mystery, and sin (Dragon, Beast, and False Prophet united) seems also intended to give us a hint as to the solution of the three septenaries. Antichrist arises whilst the sixes (the sixth seal, trumpet, and vial) are in operation. The sevens, or mystery completed, contain, concentrated as it were in epitome, the whole of the previous judgments.

The solemn warning under the seventh vial, "It is done," points to a closing dispensation, whilst the contents poured out on the "air," or atmosphere, would lead us to expect an accession to the Powers of Darkness—a fearful augmentation to the "Prince of the Power of the Air."

If we turn to the world around us, what a galaxy of signs of the approaching end of the age it affords! In the East we behold the dying struggles of what was once the great Ottoman Empire, the stronghold of the Mohammedan apostacy, which, like the rival apostacy of Rome, has waned, step by step, until to-day but a shred of former grandeur remains. In these events the hand of Divine Providence is distinctly visible; and whilst kings, statesmen, and congresses are meeting, events outstrip diplomacy, and the world hurries on to its destiny.

Under the statesmanship of Lord Beaconsfield—a man raised up apparently for the important mission of emancipating his race—England, as it is now generally considered, has assumed the Protectorate of a great portion of Asia Minor. With a Jewish Prime Minister at the head of affairs, an influential portion of the press in Jewish hands, and a Jewish family controlling the moneyed interests of the world, what is to prevent the setting up of a "Jewish Republic," or "United States of Judea," by the favored people? If, as some persons think, the British people in any sense represent the literal or spiritual Israel, they have an additional incentive for facilitating the return of our elder brother. Some who hold the opinion that the English are representatives of the Ten Tribes think that they should take possession of Palestine for the purposes of colonization; it is thought that if this were done a step towards the Millennium would at once be made. Looking at the matter from a practical point of view, it would seem that in the present overcrowded state of Great Britain an exodus of such a kind would have a very beneficial effect in clearing out the redundant population.

The events occurring at the close of the last century (French Revolution) probably bear but a faint analogy to what the world is yet to witness. Prophetic students are constantly insisting, and rightly, that this was the mere first outbreak of an era of convulsion and change; the curtain only rose and fell, as it were, on the great drama of events, in order to let the nations have a foreshadowing of a far greater outbreak that is yet to come.

During the present century Europe has, more or less, been in a constant state of agitation. To-day western Christendom presents a similar aspect to the eastern world. Lawlessness is rife; this is exemplified alike in Church and State. It is a fact that cannot be too often insisted upon—viz., that the temporal power of the western apostacy (the Papacy) stands at this moment wasted and consumed. The last Pope-king has passed away, and his successor is a mere priest—a king without a kingdom.

It is a knowledge of this portentous fact that is at the bottom of the terrible struggles now being made by the spiritual power of the Church of Rome for supremacy. During the last decade three distinct formations have been observable in European politics, and these point to a tri-partition; Pan-Latinism, or the amalgamation of the Latin nations; Pan-Teutonism of the German States; and Pan-Slavism, as exemplified in the action of Russia and the nations of the Slavonic world. Thus the "great city" seems "dividing into three parts" preparatory to the pouring out of the seventh and last vial and the end of the age (Rev. 16 : 18).

ENGLAND AND EZEKIEL'S PROPHECY.

By the Rev. J. R. Purcell.

The Land of the Sails of Ships—Meaning of Cush—What Country does Tarshish Represent—Sir E. Tennant's Opinion—Two other Remarkable Passages—England's Possession of Cyprus—Are the Afghans part of the Ten Lost Tribes—Turkey Irreclaimable.

WE find in Isaiah 18 a call to a maritime power. The word translated "Woe" ought to be rendered "Ho to the land shadowing with wings." Scholars are much puzzled about this rendering. Lowth renders it, "Ho to the land of the winged cymbal," explaining that the winged cymbal is given in a medal of Adrian as the proper attribute of Egypt.

Such is Bishop Lowth's idea of the passage Others translate it thus: "Ho to the land o the winged tsetse," the gad-fly spoken of by Dr Livingstone and others as so injurious to cattle It is worthy of remark that the Septuagint which so rarely helps one in a difficulty, translates thus, "The land of the sails of ships." I need not be remarked how close this renderin comes to that of the Authorized Version. Supposing it to stand, it will agree entirely with th other references to this maritime nation "sending ambassadors by the sea," in vessels of papyrus on the waters: "Go ye swift messengers. These allusions to some maritime power canno be misunderstood.

The great difficulty is the word "cush," tha borders on the rivers of Cush. Dr. Keith, in recent contribution to the Sunday at Hom says: "The name of Cush survives only in Hi du Kush, where the Oxus has its source.' Whether, then, India or Egypt be pointed seems to me of little moment. England is no the power that controls India, and sooner later must control Egypt. This power is i trusted with the mission of restoring the Jew "Go ye swift messengers to a nation scatter and peeled." This verse is parallel with Isai 61 : 9: "Surely the city shall wait for me a the ships of Tarshish, first to bring thy so from far, their silver and gold with them."

The question thus forces itself upon us, whe is and what country does Tarshish represen for remember we are dealing with a country the latter days described under an ancient nam I cannot help thinking that there are three d ferent localities of the name of Tarshish point out in the Bible: 1st. In Spain, not far fr the English fortress Gibraltar. 2d. Cornwa England, to which the Phenicians sailed for t 3d. As has been suggested by Sir Emerson T nant, Ceylon and the Coromandel coast. It w be observed that all three localities are conne ed with England; and, as perhaps India is t most likely, I shall make no apology for quoti at length the remarks of this industrious auth

He says, in his "History of Ceylon" (vol. p. 109): "It seems more probable that the lo sought locality of Tarshish may be found to identical with that of Point de Galle. Boch was not the first who rejected the idea of Tar ish having been a Phenician colony, situated the mouth of the Guadalquiver; and intimat that Ophir must be sought for in the directi of India; but he was the first who conjectu that Ophir was Kondramalie, on the north-w of Ceylon, and that Tarshish must have be somewhere in the vicinity of Cape Comorin.

"Subsequent investigations have served establish the claim of Malacca to be the gol land of Solomon (Ophir, in the language of Malays, is the generic term for any 'gold mine and Tarshish, which lay in the track betw the Arabian Gulf and Ophir, is recognizable the great emporium of Ceylon. The ships tended for the voyage were built by Solomon Ezion-Geber, on the shores of the Red Sea. T voyage occupied three years in going and retu g from the Red Sea, and the cargoes brought ome to Ezion-Geber consisted of gold and sil-er, ivory, apes, and peacocks. Gold could ave been shipped at Galle from the vessels hich brought it from Ophir. 'Silver spread to plates,' which is particularized by Jeremiah an export of Tarshish, is one of the sub-ances on which the sacred books of the Sin-halese are even now inscribed. Ivory is found Ceylon, and must have been both abundant nd full-grown before the discovery of gunpow-er led to the wanton destruction of the ele-hants. Apes are indigenous to the island, and eafowl are found there in numbers.

"It is very remarkable, too, that the terms y which these articles are designated in the Hebrew Scriptures are identical with the Tamil ames by which some of them are called in Cey-on to the present day. Thus tukeyim, which is endered 'peacocks' in our version, may be re-cognized in tokei, the modern name for these irds. Kapi, apes, is the same in both lan-uages; and the Sanscrit iblia, ivory, is identi-al with the Tamil ibam. Thus by geographi-al position, by indigenous productions, and by he fact of its having been from time immemo-al the resort of merchant ships from Egypt, Arabia, Persia on the one side, and India, Java, nd China on the other, Galle seems to present combination of every particular essential to etermine the problem so long undecided in Biblical dialectics, and to establish its own iden-ty with the Tarshish of the sacred historians, he mart so long frequented by the ships of Tyre nd Judæa."

There are two more passages to which I would all the attention of my readers: one is to be ound in Ezekiel 38 : 13, the other in Dan. 1 : 30. The first of these refers, no doubt, to he great Russian onslaught against Palestine—n onslaught quite distinct from that of the Antichrist. "Sheba, Dedan, and the merchants f Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, hall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a poil? Hast thou gathered thy company to ake a prey, to carry away silver and gold, to ake away cattle and goods, to take a great poil?" It will be remarked that in this verse he same power is spoken of, viz., the mer-hants of Tarshish in alliance with Dedan and Sheba. Dedan is probably the modern Aden, which is now a British possession. It is not quite certain where Sheba is—whether, as some hink, in Abyssinia, or, as others, in Arabia; but at any rate, the alliance is an Eastern one, made with reference to that special danger which the Anglo-Indian and English press have been so ong discussing—the advance of Russia on Asia Minor.

It is most remarable that just at this very ime, when "the signs of the times" all point to some imminent crisis, there should be found one at the head of the English Council who, both by his policy and by his nationality, has placed Great Britain exactly in the position she is destined to occupy with reference to the great crisis about to break upon the world. Cyprus has been acquired by England, and, as a watch-tower over Palestine, is destined to play a part in the conflict with the Antichrist. "The ships of Chittim shall come against him" (Dan. 2). Was this the great conflict that Balaam scanned on the prophetic horizon when he exclaimed, "Alas! who shall live when God doeth this? Ships shall come from the coast of Chittim"? It may be so, but at any rate it is no work of chance that in the same year England should lay one hand on Cyprus and the other on Afghanistan.

Are the Afghans, as some imagine, part of or a remnant of the lost tribes?

"The whole race of the Afghans," says Stanley Faber, "denominate themselves 'Melchini'—in English, kings. If, then, they be of Hebrew extraction, the drying up of the mystic Euphrates or the subversion of the Ottoman Empire would undoubtedly prepare a way for them both naturally and morally; a power would be removed whose dominions now stretch between Persia and Palestine; and one great branch of that false religion by which the Afghans are at present deluded would be broken off."

"Sahib," said a young Morlah to an Indian officer, "this is not a matter in which there can be any doubt. The English Government has no choice in its future action, for it is written that you have to go to Cabul." Again have the words been heard, "regeneration of Turkey." That cabalistic phrase, "the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire," has vanished forever. Whatever gloss statesman may put upon recent transactions, the Treaty of Berlin has been at once the partition and death-knell of the Ottoman Empire.

The regeneration of Turkey! One might as well imagine that a corpse could be called back to life by a process of galvanism. The thing is impossible. The handwriting is on the wall; nothing can arrest the process of disintegration. There may come a lull for a very few years. Palestine under English auspices will recover in some measure her fertility, and the Jews gather one by one; but when that is done the Eastern Question will be still undecided. It can only be resolved finally when Jesus appears in glory, and when "the name of the city shall be called from that day forward Jehovah Shammah, the Lord is thine." And in the mean time it is no small privilege for us to believe that God has called the English nation to a high and honorable mission, and that He has given her unbounded commerce and Eastern possessions, that her arms may become a backwater to His people against the swarms of their invaders, and that she may bring in her vessels from the uttermost ends of the earth—"from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, his suppliants even the daughters of His dispersed, a present to the Lord in Mount Zion."

"Yet, ere the vision fades before my eyes,
See the regenerating dawn arise!
Before the radiance of the gospel beam
Down baffled Crescent! shrink Euphrates' stream.
Return, ye ransomed, to your promised home!
Feet that are beauteous on the mountain come!
Foul Bigotry avaunt! fierce Discord cease!
Earth, sea, and sky be glad before the Prince of Peace!"

THE JEWISH DOCTOR AND RICH MERCHANT.

NOT many years ago there lived in a large city in Holland a Jewish doctor who, like Paul, had lived a Pharisee. Like Paul, too, he had been, by the power of the Holy Spirit, turned from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan to God; and, like Paul, his heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel was that they might be saved.

With this object the doctor went day after day into the part of the city inhabited by the lowest class of Jews, and from house to house did he preach and teach Jesus Christ. In reaching this suburb he had to pass the magnificent house of a rich Jewish merchant, who had a house of business also in the mercantile part of the city.

It had often happened to the doctor to pass this house; but it was not until he had done so many times that a new thought struck him. Why was it that he was ready to go day after day and speak of the Lord Jesus to the poor Jews in the back streets, and yet he had never felt how accountable he was to God for not making Christ known to the rich Jew in the great house? The doctor was not one of those who could assent to a matter as being right without at once proceeding to act upon his conviction.

He knew that the merchant was often engaged in the city till a late hour, and he therefore determined to call upon him one evening at about ten o'clock, thinking that by that time he would be sure to find him at home. He was surprised at being at once admitted and shown upstairs, just as though he had been expected. But this was explained when he was ushered suddenly into a large ball-room, already filled with company. The music was playing and the dancing had begun. The appearance of the little doctor, so unlike the rest of the company, caused many eyes to be fixed upon him. He at once made out the master of the house, and, advancing towards him, apologized for his untimely visit. "I was not aware," said he, "that you were engaged this evening, but as I have called upon a matter of great importance, I would ask if you would kindly appoint a time when I may call again without inconvenience to you."

"Certainly," replied the merchant. "May I ask if the business is pressing?"

"It is a matter of life and death," replied the doctor. "I will call again at your earliest convenience."

"Allow me to ask one more question," said the merchant. "Whom does the business concern?"

"It concerns the Lord Jesus Christ, Jesus of Nazareth," replied the honest doctor. "It is concerning Him and Him only that I came to speak to you, and I am glad that you will kindly allow me the opportunity of doing so another day."

"Stay," said the merchant, with a strange expression of joy and astonishment. "This is wonderful," he continued, now speaking so as to be heard by the doctor only. "My friend, I have been miserable for many months past. How or why I know not; but one thought has continually haunted me by day and by night. Whether in business or at home it has never been absent from my mind. I have tried to put it from me, but I could not. It is a thought which left me no peace, and it was this, 'Who and what was Jesus of Nazareth?' I have asked God in His mercy to help me, and to send me some one who could speak to me and tell me the truth about this great question. Now He has heard my prayer. I cannot let you go. There is no time like the present."

Then calling for the music to stop, the merchant addressed his astonished visitors: "This gentleman," he said, "has kindly come to speak to us on a matter of great importance—a matter in which each one of us is personally concerned. May I ask you to take your seats, and to give him your attention? And you, dear sir," he said to the doctor, "will you now speak fully and plainly? Tell us all you have to say, and keep back nothing."

And at once, standing in the middle of the ball-room, the doctor began to preach that wonderful Gospel of God concerning His Son, which is indeed the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

It was not long after this memorable evening that the merchant made a public confession of Christ, and remained a consistent believer, helping forward the Gospel he had once blasphemed. I cannot now remember whether others in the ball-room also received the truth into their hearts. It is my impression that some of them did; but as this story is strictly true, it is well to add nothing which is of doubtful authority.

And now, reader, what are your thoughts of it? Was the earnest doctor wrong or right in his characterizing this as a matter of life and death? And if it was so for this man and his guests, what is it for you?

Farinaceous Food is recommended by an English scientist as a counteraction to intemperance. The experiment was tried upon twenty-seven liquor-drinking persons, with results substantiating the theory. Among the more striking instances of reform brought about by a change of diet was that of a gentleman of sixty, who had been addicted to intemperate habits for thirty-five years, his outbursts averaging once a week. His constitution was so shattered that he had great difficulty in insuring his life. After an attack of delirium tremens, which nearly ended fatally, he was persuaded to enter upon a farinaceous diet, which, we are assured, cured him completely in seven months.

He seems to have been very thin at the beginning of the experiment, but at the close of the period named had gained twenty-eight pounds, being then about the normal weight for a person of his height.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week, and the American readers of his sermons, by helping to circulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be co-operating in rendering assistance to these institutions. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Our readers will share our regret that Mr. Joseph Spurgeon, the Manager of the office of this journal, has returned to England on urgent domestic affairs. Remittances should therefore be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The cipher-telegram inquiry has been removed to New York, where the committee is now taking evidence. The most important witness so far has been Colonel William T. Pelton, who, according to the reports in the Tribune, was the principal person implicated by the cipher telegrams. In his evidence he acknowledged that he had treated with agents in Florida and South Carolina for the purchase of the Presidential vote of those States. According to Colonel Pelton's statement, the vote of Florida was offered to him, as the representative of Mr. Tilden, for the sum of $200,000, and subsequently for $50,000, which latter offer he accepted. The vote of South Carolina was also offered for money, the sum asked in that case being $80,000, which offer he also accepted. As a matter of fact, he said the money was never paid, and the negotiations for the purchase of the votes fell through.

Colonel Pelton stated that Mr. Tilden was not cognizant of the proposed purchases, and had he known of them he would at once have stopped the proceedings. When asked the source from which he expected to obtain such large sums of money, he said he had made no arrangements to raise them, but had they been needed he should have laid the whole matter before the Democratic National Committee, and have adopted whatever course was there decided npon.

A Serious Blot on our political character, which has lowered us as a nation in the estimation of the whole world, is the subject of comment in a contribution to a contemporary by a writer under the non de plume of "Freeman." He describes a recent election to an office worth less than five hundred dollars, in which the successful candidate expended more than ten thousand dollars. The defeated candidate early in the contest offended a very influential politician, a man of considerable property, by refusing to give him a bribe of five dollars, and to that conscientious act, in all probability, was to be attributed his defeat at the polls. Many other cases of a like character are mentioned, showing that the evil is not confined to one city or State, but is extended over the entire nation. This is not a question of politics: it belongs to a higher sphere; it is a question of morality. The candidate who buys votes at the polls is a man prone to sell his vote after he is elected, and with his vote sell the interests of his constituents. Such practices drive out of public life the men we can least afford to spare—men of honor, principle, and integrity. No patriot would be willing to see the conduct of his country's affairs handed over to men who would accept a bribe as the reward of treachery. Yet this is the result which inevitably follows from the venality of the constituency. It is time Christian men spoke out on this subject, for the best interests of the country are staked upon the increase or suppression of this gigantic evil.

Dr. R. W. Dale, who recently visited this country, has expressed in strong terms his admiration of the American people, and especially the people of New England. In a lecture delivered at Harecourt Chapel, London, he said:

"The New England farmer had from the first adopted the belief that the way to fight the devil was by the school and the Church, and that belief had been thoroughly and consistently acted upon. The influence of this vigorous race upon the United States, as a whole, had been immense. It was they who had been the great pioneers in the development of the resources of the country. It was they, chiefly, who had built Chicago, and who rebuilt it, after it had been destroyed by fire, with a quickness and splendor which rivalled the achievements described in the pages of romance.

"From the farmhouses of New England had sprung many of America's noblest orators, most learned theologians, and greatest statesmen and philanthropists; and in the future the same people would contribute largely to the stability and greatness of their country. The history of these colonies, as contrasted with the history of other colonies, was an illustration of the true path of national greatness.

"America had many great problems to solve, but he trusted, by God's good help, these problems would receive a wise and equitable solution. He trusted that the great Republic on the other side of the sea, with all its vast material wealth, intellectual vigor, its matchless courage and indomitable energy, might preserve through all generations the spirit and traditions of the noblest of their fathers."

The Pope intends to establish several new bishoprics in the United States, instituting at the same time a new Catholic hierarchy different from that already existing. The Pope has sent a circular to the bishops holding sees beyond the confines of Europe, with the view of collecting Peter's pence in all countries of the world. According to the Italie, the serious decrease in Peter's pence is attributed by the bishops in France and other countries to the Antonelli litigation, and the fear that other scandals may exist among the Vatican functionaries. Another reason is, that people rebuked by the priests for niggardliness reply that the Pope and the Cardinals must retrench their expenditure, as they themselves are forced to do in these hard times.

Novel Express Freight.—A contemporary says: "It is becoming common to send children by express, and a number of boys and girls in different parts of the country have been transferred safely in this novel way. The express agents care for their human freight, giving them meals at hotels along the road and accommodations in the express car. When a transfer is made from one line to another, the lad or lassie, properly billed, is handed over to the expressman of that line. A girl was last week thus transferred from St. Paul to a village in Northern Michigan, and she made the trip safely."

Testifying for Christ often brings a blessing when it is least expected. An instance occurred very recently which was used of God. A young factory-girl had found the Saviour, and on going to her work her companions marked the change, inquired the reason, and on learning the cause a titter ran through the large work-room. The foreman, who was in the room, asked the reason of the merriment, and was told that "Mary has turned religious." He came up to the girl, and said, "Is it true that you have found Christ?" "Yes, it is." "Ah!" he said, "I knew Him once; will you pray for me?" This she did and had eventually the joy of seeing him restored to his God and Saviour. The same girl had to bear the most bitter persecution at home on account of her Christianity.

There's the Lord's Answer.—A devoted minister in Scotland recently related the following in cident as an illustration of the way our Father answers prayer: "Many years ago, when in m country charge, I returned one afternoon from a funeral, fatigued with the day's work. Afte a long ride, I had accompanied the mourners t the churchyard. As I neared my stable doo I felt a strange prompting to visit a poor wido who, with her invalid daughter, lived in a lone cottage in an outlying part of the parish. M natural reluctance to make another visit wa overcome by a feeling which I could not resis and I turned my horse's head towards the co tage. I was thinking only of the poor widow spiritual needs; but when I reached her litt house I was struck with its look of unwont bareness and poverty.

"After putting a little money into her hand began to inquire into their circumstances, an found that their supplies had been utterly e hausted since the night before. I asked the what they had done. 'I just spread it out befo the Lord!' 'Did you tell your case to a friend?' Oh no, sir; naebody kens but Hi sel' and me! I kent He wadna forget, but didna ken hoo He wad help me till I saw you co riding ower the brae, and then I said, "Ther the Lord's answer!"' Many a time has the r ollection of this incident encouraged me trust in the loving care of my heavenly Father

Bribed by a Kiss.—A temperance lecturer who has been at work in the towns up the Hudson has been giving a reporter of the Kingston Courier a page from his early experience in Michigan. Previous to his arrival in a small town where he intended to do some work, the boys had agreed among themselves to go to the meeting, but not to sign the pledge. He appealed in vain for recruits in the temperance cause. Not a man would move. At this stage of the proceedings the belle of the town sprang to her feet and cried out: "Boys, this is really too bad. Won't you sign the pledge?" Not a soul moved from his seat. Again the fair belle appealed to the men's better nature, but it was of no avail; they had promised they wouldn't sign. Finally the lady said: "Boys, I'll kiss the first man who signs the pledge." At this juncture up jumped a tall backwoodsman and drawlingly exclaimed: "Whar's yer pledge?" The brave girl kissed the fellow, and the cheering which followed was loud and enthusiastic. This incident broke the ice, and before the reformer had left the town nearly every one had donned the ribbon.

The pursuit of evil ending in death (Proverbs 11 : 19) was sadly illustrated in Brooklyn last week. One short year ago a young gentleman held an honored position in society, and down to the day of his suicide but few knew of the one false step which caused his sudden fall. With commanding presence, and with more than an ordinary share of manly beauty stamped upon his features, he was looked upon as one destined to fill some high position in the future; but in an evil hour, when idleness was pressing heavily upon him, he sought the companionship of the dissolute, and fell a victim to vicious courses, and in a short time drank the cup of vice to the dregs. Then in satiety he saw his ruin, and he was so appalled by his condition that he became a prey to despair, and in a moment of unbearable anguish and remorse he committed suicide. So terrible an end is a warning that cannot be too loudly sounded in the ears of the young.

The Variety Theatre, that fruitful source of evil to the morals of the young, is being vigorously dealt with in Philadelphia. The proprietor of one of the worst class attempted to open it lately on Sunday evening on the pretence of a necessary "dress rehearsal." Mayor Stokely, who years ago declared that two thirds of the juvenile criminals in the prisons of that city were sent there by the influence of these shows and the flash literature of the day, and who has waged an incessant and energetic war against both, promptly ordered the arrest of the proprietor.

Among the witnesses against him was a leading politician, who, in great distress, stated that his only son, a young lad of sixteen, had been led to visit this infamous theatre, and in consequence had become a drunkard, vicious and dissolute in every way. The Mayor heard him in silence, and then replied:

"I am sorry for your son, but I have small sympathy for you. Five years ago I introduced into our Legislature a bill to utterly abolish these places. It passed the Senate, and was defeated in the House—by your single interposition."

When this man interfered in behalf of these vile resorts, his own son was but a child. "He made a pit," says David, "and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch that he made" (Ps. 7 : 15).

The Bitter and Sweet Apples of Religion.—A gentleman said to a friend, "I wish you would come down to my garden and taste my apples." He asked him about a dozen times, but the friend did not come, and at last the fruit-grower said, "I suppose you think my apples are good for nothing, so you won't come and try them." "Well, to tell the truth," said the friend, "I have tasted them. As I went along the road I picked up one that fell over the wall, and I never tasted any thing so sour in all my life; and I do not particularly wish to have any more of your fruit." "Oh," said the owner of the garden, "I thought it must be so! Those apples around the outside are for the special benefit of the boys. I went fifty miles to select the sourest sorts to plant all around the orchard, so the boys might give them up as not worth stealing; but if you will come inside, you will find that we grow a very different quality there, sweet as honey."

Now, you will find that on the outskirts of religion there are a number of "Thou shalt nots," and "Thou shalts," and conviction, and alarms; but these are only the bitter fruits with which this wondrous Eden is guarded from thievish hypocrites. If you can pass by the exterior bitters, and give yourself up to Christ and live for Him, your peace shall be like the waves of the sea; and you shall find that the fruits of "this apple-tree among the trees of the wood" are the most delicious fruit that can be enjoyed on this side of our eternal home.

Where Wages Go.—The following incident was related at a revival service, and the principal actor is a gentleman now living in New York: "A laboring man, coming out of one of the gin-shops of London, a few years ago, saw a carriage and a pair of horses standing near the door, and two women richly dressed came out of the building and were handed into the carriage. The laborer stepped back into the bar-room and asked the owner:

"'Whose is that establishment?'

"The man of gin replied:

"'It is mine, and my wife and daughter have gone out to ride.'

"The laboring man bowed his head for a moment, and then he looked up and said with an energy that made the man of gin think his customer had a sudden attack of delirium:

"'I see it! I see it!'

"'See what?'

"'See where my wages for years have gone. I helped pay for that carriage, and for those horses, and for the silks and laces and jewelry for your family; the money that I have earned, that I should have used to furnish my wife and children a good home and good food and clothing, I have paid to you, and with my wages and the wages of other laboring men you have supported your family in elegance and luxury. Hereafter my wife and my children shall have the benefit of my labor, and I will endeavor to persuade my fellow-workmen to do as I intend, with the help of Heaven, to hereafter give up entirely the use of intoxicating liquors and care for my own; remove them into a comfortable home as soon as possible, and save my wages. I see it! I see it! The curse and the remedy, the poison and the antidote.'

"And that poor drunkard of the past is living in his own house to-day, blessing the day when he and the poisoned cup parted forever."

Bishop Simpson in his recent Yale lecture said: "Last summer I passed over the great mountains and plains which lie between us and the Pacific Ocean. I frequently watched the shepherds, with their immense flocks, and marked their constant diligence and care. I saw the herders, with their numerous herds of cattle, and was surprised to observe the constant vigilance which they exercised. The herder was always in the saddle, his eyes were continually on the cattle. If one wandered toward a precipice or became separated from the herd, it was immediately followed and brought back in safety. How much more responsible is the office of the Christian pastor? If he expects to gain the affection of all the members of his congregation, if he desires to realize the full fruit of his sermons, his eye must be upon them, and he must exercise over them a sleepless vigilance."

A Home for Dipsomaniacs, called the Spelthorne Sanatorium, for the reformation of women who have fallen into habits of intemperance, was opened in England on New Year's Day, and a large number of ladies and gentlemen were present. The house, situated about a mile from the Feltham station between Hounslow and Staines, is well suited for the object for which it has been secured. An adequate and experienced staff for the management of the establishment has been engaged.

THE RIDER ON THE WHITE HORSE AND THE ARMIES WITH HIM.

A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written, that no man knew, but he himself. And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood; and his name is called The Word of God. And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean. And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS."—REVELATION 19 : 11–16.

St. John more Familiar than any one else with the Saviour—Through Heaven's Open Gate John had a View of the Scene as God sees it—I. He Saw our Captain—His Glorious State—Mounted on a White Horse—Denoting Honor—Power—Swiftness—Victory—John noticed his Master's Person—His Eyes like a Flame—His Head Crowned with Many Crowns—His Vesture Dipped in Blood—His Name Faithful and True—II. John saw the Saviour's Followers—A Great Number—All Mounted—Armed with Purity—III. The Warfare—The Gospel the Sword of Christ—He has a Hand to Rule—An Instance of his Power seen in the Present Condition of Spain.

THE beloved John was, above all other men, familiar with the humble Saviour. He had leaned his head upon his bosom, and better knew than any other of the apostles the painful beatings of his Lord's sorrowful heart. Never from his mind could be effaced the likeness of Christ, the visage more marred than that of any man. He had seen the dear sufferer on that dreadful night when he was covered with gory sweat in Gethsemane; he had seen him after he had been buffeted and scourged in Herod's palace and Pilate's hall; he had even stood at the foot of the cross and seen his divine Master in the extreme agonies of death; and therefore the tender, affectionate heart of John would never permit his Master's suffering image to fade from his memory.

Truly, if he had spoken to us in vision—in symbolic terms—concerning what he had seen of his Lord and Master here below, he would have described him as a footman going forth to the fight alone, with no armies following him, for all his disciples forsook him and fled; himself wearing no glittering armor, but with his garments dipped in blood and with his face smeared with shame. He would have told you how the solitary champion fought alone amid the dust and smother of the battle, and how he fell, and bit the dust, so that his foe set his foot upon him, and for a moment rejoiced over him. He would have told you how he leaped again from the grave, and trod down his adversaries, and led captivity captive. Such would have been, only in far nobler terms, John's description of his first sight of his wrestling warrior Lord.

But now in the passage before us a door was opened in heaven, and that disciple whom Jesus loved saw what else he had never seen—what else he had never imagined. He saw the same warrior Lord, but after quite another fashion. If John had continued to look with the eye of sense at Christ and his followers even to this day, and had viewed the battle as it is to be seen in history upon earth, he would have said that he saw the same despised and rejected One at the head of a band equally despised and rejected leading them to prison and to death. He would have told you how to this very day the banner of the Gospel is borne aloft amid smoke and dust, and Christ crucified is proclaimed amid contention and ridicule. He would have drawn in black colors the scene of the battle, the great battle which is raging among the sons of men at this very hour.

But now a door was opened in heaven, and John saw

THE SCENE AS GOD SEES IT.

He looked upon it from heaven's point of view, and saw the conflict between good and evil, between Christ and Satan, between truth and error; saw it in heaven's own clear view, and he then wrote the vision that we also might see it. Oh! if we are sharers in this conflict, if we are following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, if we are pledged to the truth and to the right, if we are sworn to the precious blood of atonement, and to the grand doctrines of the Gospel, it will do us good and stir our blood to stand on one of the serene hill-tops of heaven, above the mists of earth, and look upon the battle which rages still upon the earth, and will rage on till Armageddon shall conclude the war. If we can behold the scene, God strengthening our eyes, it may strengthen our hands for the conflict, our hearts for the fray.

When the door was opened in heaven, the first thing that the seer of Patmos noticed was our Captain: let us look at him, first. Afterwards he saw his followers; and then he marked the mode of warfare, and caught a glimpse of the great defeat of the foe.

I. First, then, JOHN SAW OUR CAPTAIN, the King of kings.

Let us notice his glorious state. He says, "I saw, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him." Whilst Jesus was here, as we have already said, he was a foot-soldier; he had to plunge knee-deep through mire and dirt, and walk as wearily as any of the rest of the warrior company; but now that he has ascended, though he continues still to fight, it is in another fashion. Of course, the terms are symbolical, and none will take them literally; but our Lord is here described as sitting upon a gallant steed, charging his foes upon a snow-white horse. This means that Christ is honored now. He is no weary, dusty, fainting footman now, I warrant you.

Time was when Solomon said that he saw servants upon horses and princes walking in the dust: and so it was with Christ; Pilate and Herod rode the high horse, and Jesus must walk in pain and dishonor. But now, like a greater Mordecai, he rides on the King's horse, for this is the man whom the King delighteth to honor. In royal state our Jesus goeth forth to war, not as a common soldier, but as a glorious prince, royally mounted.

By a horse is denoted, not only honor, but power. To the Jews the employment of the horse in warfare was unusual, so that when it was used by their adversaries they imputed to it great force. Jesus Christ has a mighty power to-day, a power which none can measure. He was crucified in weakness, but where is the weakness now? He gave his hands to the nail, and his feet to be fastened to the wood, but he does so no longer. Now has he mounted on the horse of his exceeding great power, and he ruleth in heaven and in earth, and none can stay his hand, or put him to dishonor, or dispute his will. O you that love him! feast your eyes upon him this day. It is not for me to speak; to do so were but to hold a candle to the sun; but gaze upon him for yourselves, and let your eyes be satiated with the image, as you see him, once despised and rejected, now taking to himself his great power.

Here is symbolized swiftness, too. Christ must walk when he was here, and go from city to city, scarcely getting through them all till his time was accomplished; but now his word runneth very swiftly. He has but to will it and the voice of his Gospel is heard to the utmost ends of the earth; their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. Everywhere is the Gospel preached, if it be but for a testimony against them, and to-day is fulfilled before your eyes the words of the prophet Zechariah, "The Lord of hosts hath visited his flock, the house of Judah, and hath made them as his goodly horse in the battle, and they shall fight because the Lord is with them."

The color of the horse is meant to denote victory. The Roman conqueror, when he enjoyed a triumph, on returning from a campaign, rode up the Via Sacra on a white horse, and the Romans crowded to the house-tops to gaze upon the hero as he exhibited his spoils. Now Jesus Christ is admired of angels and elect spirits, who throng the windows of heaven to gaze upon him who is glorified by his Father. There is a pale horse, and his name that sits on him is Death, and there is a horse red with blood, and yet another black with judgment; but his is a white horse, significant of comfort and of joy to all that know and love him. He comes to fight, but the fight is for peace; he comes to smite, but it is to smite his people's enemies; he comes as a conqueror, but it is as a delivering conqueror who scattereth flowers and roses where he rides, breaking only the oppressor, but blessing the citizens whom he emancipates.

Again, I say, I scarcely like to speak upon this theme; it seems too great for me, but I would bid the saints of God who have wept at Gethsemane now lift up their eyes and smile as they see that same Redeemer who once lay grovelling beneath the olive-trees now riding on the white horse. Your Lord at this moment is no more despised, but all the glory that heaven itself can devise is lavished upon him.

John looked into the open vault of heaven, and he had time, not only to see the horse, but to mark the character of him that sat upon it. He says that he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True. By this you may know your Lord. He has been a faithful and true friend to you. O soldiers of the cross, when has he ever deceived you? When has he failed you, or forgotten you? Faithful? Ah! that he is, faithful to every word that he has spoken.

And true? Do you not recognize him, for is he not the truth—the very truth of God? Has he not kept every promise that he has made you, and have you not found his teachings to be everlastingly settled upon divine veracity? And faithful and true has he been to the great Father. The work he undertook to do he has accomplished. He has in nothing drawn back from the covenant engagements under which he laid himself of old. He stood as the surety of his people, and he has been faithful and true to that smarting suretyship. He came to be the deliverer of his elect, and he has wrought the deliverance.

He has not turned either to the right hand or to the left, but he has been faithful and true to every pledge which he gave to his Father for the deliverance of his chosen. Ay, and even his enemies, though they give him many a black word, cannot say that he is not faithful and true. He has not played false, even to the basest devil in hell, nor has he deceived, in any respect, the basest man that lives. Nor will he, for when the day comes to keep his word of terror, he will make the penalty tally to every syllable of the threatening, and mete out vengeance with a line and judgment with a plummet, and even his adversaries, though they shall forever rue the fact, shall confess that his name is Faithful and True. They called him many ill names when he was here: they said he had a devil and was mad; but now it is acknowledged that his name is Faithful and True. We acknowledge it with intense delight, and are glad to think that he leads the troops of heaven to the fight.

John still looked, and as he gazed with opened eye he marked which the Champion employed, for he says, "In righteousness he doth judge and make war." Jesus is the only king who always wars in this fashion. There have been brilliant exceptions to the general rule, but war is usually as deceitful as it is bloody, and the words of diplomatists are a mass of lies. It seems impossible that men should deliberate about peace and war without straightway forgetting the meaning of words and the bonds of honesty. War still seems to be a piece of business in which truth would be out of place; it is a matter so accursed that falsehood is there most at home, and righteousness quits the plain. But as for our King, it is in righteousness that he doth judge and make war. Christ's kingdom needs no deception: the plainest speech and the clearest truth—these are the weapons of our warfare.

The Jesuitical craft which speaks not what it means, the priestcraft which undermines the faith of men in God to teach them faith in their fellow-men, the falsehood which does not teach a doctrine at the first but gradually insinuates it into feeble minds, the craft which creeps into houses and leads astray silly women, who are in bondage to their lusts—this has nothing to do with the kingdom of Christ. "In righteousness doth HE judge and make war."

He bids his champions come forth with nothing but his word, and speak that word faithfully, as they receive it, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear. He tells his people, wherever they are, to live righteously, soberly, and in all integrity, and he himself shakes off, as a man shakes off a viper from his hand, any thing that is unrighteous, every thing that is contrary to truth and holiness. This is our champion, and I warrant you are right glad that he sits on the white horse, and has the upper hand. Since he fights after this fashion, the more of such warfare the better for mankind.

John, gazing still into the open door, saw a little—not much—of

THE PERSON OF HIS BLESSED MASTER.

And, of course, he looked, first, into those eyes, those dear eyes which had so oft been filled with tears, and that at the last were even red with weeping. John gazed into them, or wished to do so, but he had to cover his own eyes, for they were dazzled. He says, "His eyes were as a flame of fire."

Think of your Master on the white horse with such eyes as these to-night. Why are they like flames of fire? Why, first, to discern the secrets of all hearts. There are no secrets here that Christ does not see. There is no lewd thought, there is no unbelieving scepticism, that Christ does not read. There is no hypocrisy, no formalism, no deceit, that he does not scan as easily as a man reads a page in a book. His eyes are like a flame of fire to read us through and through, and know us to our inmost soul. Oh! think of this, and if ye have aught of deceit tremble before him in whose spirit there is no guile.

Those eyes like a flame of fire belong to our Champion that he may understand all the plots and crafts of all our foes. We are sometimes alarmed; we say that the machinations of Rome are very deep, and that the plots of infidelity dive very low. But what mattereth it? His eyes are like a flame of fire: he knows what they are at. He will confound their politics, he will expose their knavish tricks, and still lead on his host conquering and to conquer. Let us never fear while he is on the white horse with such eyes as his.

It was natural that John should carry his glance from the eyes to the brow; and as he looked at our champion on the white horse he saw that on his head were many crowns. The last he had seen there was a crown of thorns; but that was gone, and in the place of the one crown of the briars of the earth he saw many crowns of the jewels of heaven. There rests the crown of creation, for this Word made heaven and earth; the crown of providence, for this man now rules the nations with a rod of iron; the crown of grace, for it is from his royal hand that blessings are bestowed; the crown of the church for be it known to all men that there is no head of the church but Christ, and woe unto those who steal the title. He is head over all things to his church, and king in the midst of her.

Yes, on his head are many crowns, placed there by individual souls that he has saved. We have each one tried to crown him in our poo way, and we will do so as long as we live. Al power is given unto him in heaven and in earth and therefore well may multitudes of diadem fillet that august brow which once was belte with thorns. Glory be unto thee, O Son o God! Our hearts adore thee to-night as w contemplate thee on thy white horse.

Looking at him still, John saw one thin more, namely,

HIS VESTURE.

He says that his vesture was dipped in blood

Oh ! but this is the grandest thought about our Master wherever he may be, that he is ever a red man wearing the bloody garment. As the atoning sacrifice he is at his best. We love him as we see the white lily of his perfect nature, but the rose of Sharon is the flower for us, for its sweet perfume breathes life to our fainting souls. Yes, he bled, and this is the greatest thing we can say of him. His life was glorious, but his death transcends it.

A living Christ, a reigning Christ—we are charmed as we think of this ; but oh, the bleeding Christ, the bleeding Christ for me ! As the blood is the life, so is his blood life to us—the life of the Gospel, the life of our hopes : and one delights to think of him that, though he rides the white horse, he has never stript off the bloody shirt in which he won our redemption. He looks like a Lamb that has been slain, and wears his priesthood still. Whenever he goes out to conquer it is with this harness on, this vesture dipped in blood. Oh ! preach him, ye his servants, preach him in his blood-red vesture. Ye shall never see souls saved if ye portray him in any other kind of coat. Ye take his own garment from him, and put on that of another, and ye pretend that ye are making him more illustrious as ye put on him a scarlet robe ; but his own blood is his beauty and his triumph. Let him come before us in thatl, and our hearts shall crown him with loudest acclaim.

One other thing John saw, and that was

HIS NAME.

But here he seems to contradict himself. He says that he had a name which no man knoweth ; yet he says that his name was the Word of God. Oh ! but it is all true ; for in such a one as our Master there must be paradoxes. No man knoweth his name. None of you know all his nature. His love passes all knowledge ; his goodness, his majesty, his humiliation, his glory, all these transcend your ken. You cannot know him. Oh, the depths ! If you plunge deepest into the mystery of the incarnate God you can never reach the bottom of it.

"No man knoweth the Son but the Father." And yet you do know his name, for you know that he is "the Word of God." And what means that ? Why, when a man would show himself, he speaks. "Speak," said the philosopher, "that I may see you." A man's speech is the embodiment of his thought. You know his thought when you hear his word, if he be a truth-speaking man. Now, Christ is God's word. That is his heart, spoken out to you. His inmost thoughts of love are printed in great capital letters, and set before you in the living, loving, bleeding, dying person of the incarnate Son of God. Thus is he called the Word of God, and in that capacity it becomes us to delight ourselves exceedingly in him, and to exult because he is now riding triumphantly upon his white horse.

II. Thus have I bidden you gaze at what John saw. Time chides me, however, and I can only ask you next, if you have seen the brightest One of all upon the white horse, just to look at

HIS FOLLOWERS.

"The armies whch were in heaven followed him upon white horses."

See, then, that Christ has a great following—not one army, but "armies," whole hosts of them—numbers that cannot be counted. My Lord is not the chief of a small band, but he has a great host. There be some who think that all Christ's followers go to their little Bethel, and so they all sit down on the top of their own Mount Zion, and sweetly bless the Lord who shuts out the rest of mankind. But I tell you your little Bethel would not make a stable for the horses of his lieutenants. He has great armies following him, for a countless number out of every people and nation and tongue has he redeemed with his most precious blood.

And these that follow him, you notice, are all mounted. They followed him on white horses. They are mounted on the same sort of horses as himself, for they fare as he fares : when he walks, they must walk ; when he bears a cross, they must carry crosses, too ; but if ever he gets a crown, he cries, "They shall be crowned, too." If ever he gets on horseback, he will have his saints on horseback with him, for it is not like him that he should ride and they should walk.

Remember Alexander, and how he kept up the spirit of his soldiers. Whenever the troops were thirsty, Alexander would not drink ; and when they marched on foot, Alexander footed it with them. So it is with our Master—he has been marching here in the rough ways with us, and he will let us ride in the glory-ways with him when the time shall come.

The armies of Christ followed him on white horses. Look ye a little steadily at these white horses, for I want you to observe the armor of their riders. Cromwell's men wore at their side long iron scabbards, in which they carried swords, which oftentimes they wiped across the manes of their horses, when they were red with blood. A dreadful story that to read, brave as were those Ironsides. But if you look at these troops there is not a sword amongst them. Not a scabbard dangles ; not a piece of metal flashes back the sunlight. Neither helmet nor cuirass is there, nor does there seem to be a pistol at the holster.

They are not armed with lance or pike, and yet they are riding forth to war. Do you want to know the armor of that war ? I will tell you. They are clothed in white linen, white and clean. Strange battle array this ! And yet this is how they conquer, and how you must conquer, too. This is both armor and weapon. Holiness is our sword and our shield. This is pike and gun. If we but live as Christ lives and follow him, we shall conquer, for no sword can come at him that lives to God,—since, should it slay his body, it cannot touch his soul : he lives and conquers still. Think of this, and never ask for any other harness but this in the day of battle.

Yet I have said they were all on horses, which show you that the saints of God have a strength that they sometimes forget. You know not that you ride on a horse, O child of God ! but there is a supreme invisible power which helps you in contending for Christ and for his truth. You are mightier than you know of, and you are riding more swiftly to the battle and more rapidly over the heads of your foes than ever you dream. When a door shall be opened in heaven to you, and you get to the battle's end, you will say, "Bless the Lord, I, too, rode on a white horse. I, too, conquered when I thought I was defeated. I, too, by simple obedience to his will, and keeping the faith, and walking in his truth, have been more than conqueror through him that loved me."

And is not this a grand sight, this man—this bonny man,as Rutherford calls him—on his white horse, and all these bright ones following after him in all their glorious array.

III. And now we must close, for the bell has tolled just now to show that the hour is up, but we cannot end till we have spoken of

THE WARFARE.

What is this warfare ? There cannot be war without a sword, yet if you look all along the ranks of the white-robed armies there is not a sword amongst them all. Who carries the sword ? There is one who bears it for them all. It is he, the King, who comes to marshal us. He bears a sword. But where ? It is in his mouth ! Strange place ! A sword in his mouth. Yet this is the only sword my Lord and Master wields. Mahomet subdued men with the scimetar, but Christ subdues men with the Gospel.

We have but to tell out the glad tidings of the love of God, for this is the sword of Christ with which he smites the nations. Be his mouths, my brethren ; be his mouths, my sisters. Tell to your children in your Sunday-school classes, tell to the poor in the corners of the streets, tell by your little printed pamphlets if you cannot by your voices, all the story of how he loved us and gave himself for us ; for this is the sword of our warfare ; it goeth forth from the mouth of Christ. Let us be content to fight with this and nothing else.

But for those who will not yield to it, our Leader has a hand as well as a tongue, and he says that he will rule the nations with a rod of iron ; and if you will read history through you will find that all nations that reject the Gospel have to suffer for it. I select one instance. The gospel came to Spain years ago, and multitudes of the nobility were converted ; but they had their auto-da-fés, and burnt the saints, and the accursed Inquisition stamped out the Gospel in Spain ; and to this day the nation cannot rise. It will, I trust, by God's forgiving mercy ; but for centuries she that ruled the nations and covered the deep with her armadas has been sitting grovelling in her poverty and sloth, for Christ has ruled her with a rod of iron, and so will he rule all nations that reject the testimony of his mouth. If the sword of his mouth be not heeded, then cometh the last of this dread warfare—and may God grant that we may never know it—when his foot shall do it, for he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God.

Ah ! what a crush must that be which will come upon the clusters of Gomorrah from the foot which once was nailed to the tree ! Who stamped that sinner's soul and crushed it down ? Was he an angry angel with a sword of fire ? It was the Christ of God, the man of love ; rejected and despised. Fiercer than a lion on his prey is love when once provoked. When love turns to jealousy its fires are like coals of juniper, which have a violent flame. Beware, ye despisers, lest ye continue to despise. Submit to the sword of his mouth, lest ye be smitten by his hand. Be wise when once his hand begins to smite you lest you have to feel his foot, for it is all over then.

May you and I have a white horse each with which to follow Christ ! But we never shall, unless we are his followers here. We must put on the snow-white garments now. Here they are ready for you. The righteousness of Christ will be given to any man who accepts him and believes on him ; and when your snow-white garments once are on, he will give you the horse of his sacred strength, and you, even you, following in the track of your gallant leader, shall ride on shouting "Victory, victory, victory, through the blood of the Lamb." The Lord bless you, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

Italian organ-grinders in England do not always deserve the pity lavished on them by people who look upon them only as foreigners in a strange land. In a case on January 2d, in London, an inspector said, the place where the prisoners lived was a regular colony of Italian organ-grinders, where proceedings were carried on of the most degrading and disgusting description. It was the practice of the elder Italians who resorted to this den of infamy to inveigle amongst them young English girls of from thirteen to eighteen years of age, who had been previously engaged as domestic servants, and then send them about the streets, dressed up as Italian peasants, with organ-men. The girl in this case had been enticed away from service in this manner about two years ago. The public sympathized with the girls, believing them to be foreigners, instead of which they were all English girls, who sometimes obtained as much as 10*s*., 14*s*., or 16*s*. a day. There were about thirty Italians at this place, and they and the girls were all mixed up together. Mr. Serjeant Cox, the presiding judge, sentenced the Italian organ-grinders to four months' hard labor. It is well that these facts have been published, both to warn young girls against the organ-grinders, and to make the public less liberal with their pennies.

WAS LOST AND IS FOUND; OR, THE STORY OF FELICIA CUFFE.

The Young Priest, Father Kirby, Affected by Chalmers' Discourses—A Protestant Unconsciously Betrays Him—Summoned by his Bishop—Their Interview—Father Kirby Suspended—Recants and Joins the Anglican Church.

THE oratory of Father Kirby produced an immense sensation in the parish; the people talked about him both in public and in private, were morally and spiritually moved, and felt proud of their "clargyman;" increasing throngs each time he preached pressed into the sacred building, and hung spell-bound upon his lips.

Observing all this, Father Kirby's own mind became somewhat excited, and his inquiry was more intently drawn to the truths which Chalmers had written. It was the glowing and gorgeous style of Chalmers which had, in the first instance, caught his attention. Now his mind kindled at the subject-matter itself of his discourses. What Chalmers himself used to call "the jurisprudence of the Gospel scheme," or "the science of salvation," dawned upon his mental perceptions, became more clearly seen, and was, measure by measure, more completely grasped by his awed conscience and consenting intellect. Doubtless, too, the Spirit of God moved over the depths of his soul—long, as vexed with error, the home of chaotic darkness. "God, who commandeth the light to shine out of darkness, shined into his heart to give him the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

About the same time, suspicion began to be aroused in the minds of some of Father Kirby's clerical coadjutors. His utterances did not sound in their ears as in harmony with what they had been taught to consider as alone genuine Catholic doctrine—it had an unaccustomed flavor about it, did not fit in nicely with their other accepted principles, jarred upon their sacerdotal claims and assumptions. There was a smell of heresy about the fervid declamation of their talented brother which they could not stomach, and they resolved they would keep their eye upon him.

An incident which shortly afterwards occurred proved that their suspicions were justified. A Roman Catholic gentleman, delighted with the oratory of the young priest, boasted of it to a Protestant acquaintance, and invited him to test with his own ears his matchless power. "I tell you what it is, my friend," he would say; "it beats all the telling; never was heard the like." And when the Protestant friend on his side would have it that no priest could preach as well as a parson, his words were warmly resented, and he was challenged to come next Sunday to the chapel himself and find out with his own ears the ridiculousness of his statement.

The Protestant friend, Mr. MacAlpine, a sober elder of the Presbyterian Church, did not relish the idea of entering what he rather rudely named "a Popish chapel." Schooled in the crystallized system handed down from John Knox, he had a good deal of John Knox's dislike of the whole Romish confraternity. Several well-known and unflattering epithets from the Book of Revelation were often on his lips as descriptive of the poor old Pope and his hierarchy.

Besides, it would not do for him, an elder of his Church, to be seen patronizing a "mass house." What would his brother elders say?—and as for his Roman Catholic neighbors, it would be soon buzzed about that "Sandy MacAlpine had got sick o' the kirk," and was about to turn Papist. "No, no, Mr. O'Keefe," he said to his Roman Catholic friend; "it will never do. It's against my principles, sir—and you're not going to get me, if I know it, into a hornet's nest from an incensed Presbytery."

Mr. O'Keefe, however, did not give up his point. "To enter a chapel once," he said, "could not do even Satan himself any harm." As to his Roman Catholic neighbors, he would be unnoticed in the crowd, for the crush was "just awful," and Father Kirby was going to deliver his next sermon in the evening; it would be dark, therefore, for the time of the year was October. "The short and the long of it is," he added, "you know your words can't hold true. Your scruples are all bosh, my man, and you want to escape havin' your Protestant pride tuk out o' ye."

Mr. MacAlpine, of course, would not admit a particle of all this—stoutly stood up for what he called his principles. Yet the result of the controversy was that he consented to accompany Mr. O'Keefe on the next Sunday evening, to hear the highly-lauded Roman Catholic preacher. It was arranged, however, that they should not go to the chancel, where, upon paying a fee, the respectable Roman Catholics of the town would be seated, but that, wearing a disguise, they would press in with the general crowd into a meaner part of the chapel.

Many things at the beginning of the service that evening struck elder MacAlpine as strange and unedifying. It was not mass that was sung—that is a service which belongs to an early part of the day—but muslin-robed and tawdry tinselled priests postured and flitted, intoned and chanted before a richly-ornamented altar. "It was like a play-house," he said afterwards, "or a pantomime; and I began to feel awful queer, for it was the Sawbath."

The people around him, however, were steeped in religious emotion. The chapel floor was covered inch deep with a coating of unsavory mud, carried in by the feet of the thronging worshippers, and Mr. MacAlpine saw, with a half-sick feeling, many poor creatures around him, whenever the shelter of a pillar or other obstruction gave opportunity, kneel down and, in their superstitious reverence for the consecrated ground, bend their heads to the very earth and passionately kiss the black and unctuous compound. The words of Hamlet, as he handled Yorick's skull, came to Mr. MacAlpine's mind as he witnessed it—

> "My gorge rises at it."

When Father Kirby ascended the pulpit (when ever he preached earlier in the day he spoke from the altar), Mr. MacAlpine noticed the hushed suspense and suppressed excitement of the people. The young priest's ringing voice and graceful mien also struck him. But as the preacher went on he made a discovery. Dr. Chalmers had been a favorite author of his; he had read most of his books, especially his discourses, and he at once detected the source of Father Kirby's most telling passages. As they were delivered his Roman Catholic friend beside him would nudge his arm and give a knowing wink, and at the close of a more than usually powerful oratorical burst would ask, in a whisper, "Isn't that your style—and what do ye think of it?"

The friend interrogated, however, kept during the time of the discourse his counsel to his own bosom; but when the two friends reached the street it need scarcely be told how the exultant Mr. O'Keefe was totally unprepared for the information given him. It was a rude shock to his triumphant condition of mind. He got into a temper, declared the elder's speech a "confounded heretical libel," and when Mr. MacAlpine repeated his assertion and said he was prepared to prove its truth, Mr. O'Keefe, in high dudgeon, turned on his heel, and without even a "Good-night," walked off in another direction.

Happening, however, on the following day to receive a visit from a certain Father Delany, resident with Father Kirby in the chapel-house, he poured into his ear the statement which his Protestant friend had made to him. It was listened to with a secret throb of malicious pleasure. Father Delany was a far different type of man from the eloquent young priest. He took no pleasure in books, professed a holy dread of all intellectual activity, spent his leisure hours in cards and dice, and when he could get it, which was often at the table of well-to-do parishioners, indulged in good living. He was jealous of the popularity of Father Kirby, hated his self-devouring zeal in his sacred office, and despised his devoutness.

Communicating his tidings to some brother priests in the chapel-house like-minded with himself, they resolved to watch both the reading and the utterances of the young priest, to take down what savored of heterodoxy, and make their report to the bishop.

It was not long before that "most reverend father in God" had a matter put before him which seemed to call for the most serious exercise of his episcopal powers. In a couple of days Father Kirby, to his surprise, had a mandate to appear before his diocesan. The bishop was really sorry to hear of any thing disparaging to the young priest. His fame as a preacher had reached his ears; powerful orators were scarce in his see, and he had hoped for great things to "Holy Mother Church" from the talents of Father Kirby. He therefore resolved, before taking severe measures, to have a little private talk between himself and his under shepherd, who it too plainly seemed had become tainted with heresy.

The interview between the bishop and his subordinate took place in the bishop's library. "Is it true, Father Kirby," said his so-called lordship, "that you have been a student of heretical books, and not only so, but a preacher of heretical doctrine? I am told as much; and some of your poisonous words have even been reported to me. Take care, young man, take care! The Church is rightly jealous over the teaching of her pastors, and, as you know, I am responsible to the Holy Father at Rome for what is taught in my diocese."

Father Kirby, as may be supposed, was taken quite aback at these words of his bishop. He had no idea that his utterances in his public ministrations had been so watched, and conscious of the use he had made of Dr. Chalmers's writings, he felt no little confusion in the presence of his ecclesiastical superior.

He had, however too sacred a regard for truth to prevaricate, or to deny that there was some ground for the bishop's accusation; and at the moment the book of Chalmers's, which on a former occasion he had seen among the bishop's own books, flashed upon his remembrance. "My lord," he said, "I am not conscious of having uttered any thing in non-accordance with truth to my part of the flock in your lordship's diocese. What I have spoken I believe. I admit, however, that of late I have been a student of writers beyond the circle of our Church's theologians. I have read some of Dr. Chalmers' works, which surely cannot be very wrong, as I see that you, my lord, yourself have given a book of his a place among your literary treasures;'" and as he said this he pointed to the volume of Dr. Chalmers's "Astronomical Discourses" on a shelf near him.

It was now the bishop's turn to feel confused. The blood rushed to his face, he fidgeted uneasily in his chair, blew his nose, hummed and hawed, looked a little fiercely at the young priest standing in front of him, and then stole glance at the unlucky volume which had bee referred to.

"Oh, ah, yes," he at length said, with hesitating voice and broken syllables; "but my having pestiferous books, young man, and you studying and uttering them, you will please understand, are quite different things. It's my dut Father Kirby, to know what the enemies of o Holy Church have to say against her. I ca thus find out the fitting antidote, you know, their poison. But you, young man, should ke at a safe distance—at a safe distance, I repeat from these deadly swamps. As King Solom says of the wicked, 'Avoid them, pass not them, and turn away.'

"As to the book you have pointed to on yo der shelf," he added, "a moment's thoug would enable you to perceive that it gives warrant at all for your conduct. See the natu of its contents, Father Kirby—'Astronomi Discourses'—that is, of course, it has nothi whatever to do with religion, but is taken with dissertations upon the sun and stars, comets' tails and moonshine."

Whether the bishop said this from ignorance or craft, who can tell? It is certain, however, that his description of Dr. Chalmers's book was absurdly and laughably incorrect. Let us suppose, however, that his words were a shot in the dark; and if so, he is not the first person who has given a fine work a place on his bookshelves, but who has only given it a place there. To have the material book is deemed enough by many persons—it looks studious to one's friends, you know, but—a plague upon the notion of mastering it.

After considerable stroke and fence upon either side—on the bishop's part in a style proud and authoritative, and on the young priest's part modest and respectful—the bishop endeavored to get from Father Kirby a solemn promise to burn every Protestant book in his possession and to make a sworn engagement never again to utter any sentiment he had found in them, and also publicly to recall and repudiate any anti-Catholic notion he had been tempted to enunciate.

Had Father Kirby known the words of Luther before the Diet of Worms at this moment, he no doubt would have uttered them. "Jesus Christ said (spoke the reformer),' If I have spoken evil, bear witness against Me.' How much more should I, who am but dust and ashes, and so prone to error, desire that any should bring forward what he can against the doctrine I have preached? As soon as I shall be convinced that they are erroneous, I will seize my false books and commit them to the flames. But if I am not convinced by proof from Holy Scripture or by cogent reasons—if I am not satisfied as to the texts I have cited—if my judgment is not brought into subjection, I neither can nor will retract any thing, for it cannot be right for a Christian to speak against his conscience."

These, however, were not his words, but others their equivalent. "Bishop," he said, "truth is truth, wherever it may be stated or found, and nowhere has it come home to my soul with such demonstration as while perusing the writings you forbid me. My conscience tells me that it is light, light from Heaven, which from thence has beamed upon me, and by no possibility can I bring myself now to call it darkness. The reason God has given us cannot ignore itself: the very attempt would degrade and debase it. Once grasping truth, the mind must hold to it forever."

"Very well, young man," said his lordship, and in a very lordly way; "you have declared the course you mean to take, and now I will declare mine. I suspend you from your office as priest this hour, and I silence you from preaching in my diocese." With this deliverance he haughtily waved his hand, and dismissed the young man from his presence.

It was not to be supposed, however, that Father Kirby would consent to be thus extinguished. The light which had come into his soul was not only an illumination, but a fire: he felt that God had intrusted to him mental and moral gifts for the benefit of his fellows, and that he was responsible for their exercise. Were he in Spain, the Inquisition, no doubt, could bury him and his talent fathoms deep in a dungeon; but under the banner of British freedom none could do him personal violence. The Protestant Episcopal Church would, perhaps, afford him a sphere for uttering the truth that was in him. Primate Beresford, at Armagh, was, he had heard, a princely, liberal-minded, and thoroughly Christian man; he would make his case known to him, and offer himself for orders in the Anglican Church.

His application was received with all the consideration and sympathy that he could wish. Strict inquiry, of course, was made into the young priest's antecedents and character. But as even his worst foes, though eager to do so, could not point to a single stain upon his life, after a public recantation of his early religious errors he was accepted to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and that with open arms, for it was hoped his oratorical powers would much subserve the cause of scriptural truth among his countrymen.

The primate was anxious to give him an important sphere, but as at the time none such was vacant, he placed him pro tem. in a country parish—one, however, not distant from the primatical city, so that on extraordinary occasions his services there would be available

MR. SPURGEON'S FIRST VISIT TO LONDON.

A Sunday Walk—Invitation to London—A Supposed Mistake—A Bloomsbury Boarding-house—A Cupboard Bedroom—First Sight of Park Street Chapel—A Small Audience—Grateful Recollections.

THE following account of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's first visit to London, from his own pen, will be read with interest by his friends on this side the Atlantic:

"Twenty-five years ago we walked on a Sabbath morning, according to our wont, from Cambridge to the village of Waterbeach, in order to occupy the pulpit of the little Baptist chapel. It was a country road, and there were four or five honest miles of it, which we usually measured each Sunday foot by foot, unless we happened to be met by a certain little pony and cart which came half way, but could not by any possibility venture further because of the enormous expense which would have been incurred by driving through the toll-gate at Milton.

"That winter's morning we were all aglow with our walk, and ready for our pulpit exercises. Sitting down in the table-pew, a letter was passed to us bearing the post-mark of London. It was an unusual missive, and was opened with curiosity. It contained an invitation to preach at New Park Street Chapel, Southwark, the pulpit of which had formerly been occupied by Dr. Rippon—the very Dr. Rippon whose hymn-book was then before us upon the table, the great Dr. Rippon, out of whose Selection we were about to choose hymns for our worship. The late Dr. Rippon seemed to hover over us as an immeasurably great man, the glory of whose name covered New Park Street Chapel and its pulpit with awe unspeakable.

"On the following Monday an answer was sent to London, informing the deacon of the church at Park Street that he had fallen into an error in directing his letter to Waterbeach, for the Baptist minister of that village was very little more than nineteen years of age, and quite unqualified to occupy a London pulpit. In due time came another epistle, setting forth that the former letter had been written in perfect knowledge of the young preacher's age, and had been intended for him, and him alone. The request of the former letter was repeated and pressed, a date mentioned for the journey to London, and a place appointed at which the preacher would find lodging. That invitation was accepted, and as the result thereof the boy preacher of the Fens took his post in London.

"Twenty-five years ago—and yet it seems but yesterday—we lodged for the night at a boarding-house in Queen Square, Bloomsbury, to which the worthy deacon directed us. As we wore a huge black-satin stock, and used a blue handkerchief with white spots, the young gentlemen of that boarding-house marvelled greatly at the youth from the country who had come up to preach in London, but who was evidently in the condition known as verdant green. They were mainly of the Evangelical Church persuasion, and seemed greatly tickled that the country lad should be a preacher. They did not propose to go and hear the youth, but they seemed to tacitly agree to encourage him after their own fashion, and we were encouraged accordingly.

"What tales were narrated of the great divines of the metropolis and their congregations! One, we remember, had a thousand City men to hear him; another had his church filled with thoughtful people, such as could hardly be matched all over England; while a third had an immense audience, almost entirely composed of the young men of London, who were spellbound by his eloquence. The study which these men underwent in composing their sermons, their herculean toils in keeping up their congregations, and the matchless oratory which they exhibited on all occasions, were duly rehearsed in our hearing, and when we were shown to bed in a cupboard over the front door, we were not in an advantageous condition for pleasant dreams.

"Park Street hospitality never sent the young minister to that far-away hired room again, but assuredly the Saturday evening in a London boarding-house was about the most depressing agency which could have been brought to bear upon our spirit. On the narrow bed we tossed in solitary misery, and found no pity. Pitiless was the grind of the cabs in the street, pitiless the recollection of the young city clerks whose grim propriety had gazed upon our rusticity with such amusement, pitiless the spare room, which scarce afforded space to kneel, pitiless even the gas-lamps, which seemed to wink at us as they flickered amid the December darkness. We had no friend in all that city full of human beings, but we felt among strangers and foreigners, hoped to be helped through the scrape into which we had been brought, and to escape safely to the serene abodes of Cambridge and Waterbeach, which then seemed to be Eden itself.

"Twenty-five years ago it was a clear, cold morning, and we wended our way along Holborn Hill towards Blackfriars and certain tortuous lanes and alleys at the foot of Southwark Bridge. Wondering, praying, fearing, hoping, believing, we felt all alone and yet not alone. Expectant of Divine help, and inwardly borne down by our sense of the need of it, we traversed a dreary wilderness of brick to find the spot where our message must needs be delivered. One word rose to our lips many times, we scarce know why,—'He must needs go through Samaria.' The necessity of our Lord's journeying in a certain direction is no doubt repeated in His servants, and as our present journey was not of our seeking, and had been by no means pleasing so far as it had gone, the one thought of a 'needs be' for it seemed to overtop every other. At sight of Park Street Chapel we felt for a moment amazed at our own temerity, for it seemed to our eyes to be a large, ornate, and imposing structure, suggesting an audience wealthy and critical, and far removed from the humble folk to whom our ministry had been sweetness and light.

"It was early, so there were no persons entering, and when the set time was fully come there were no signs to support the suggestion raised by the exterior of the building, and we felt that by God's help we were not yet out of our depth, and were not likely to be with so small an audience. The Lord helped us very graciously, we had a happy Sabbath in the pulpit, and spent the intervals with warm-hearted friends; and when at night we trudged back to the Queen Square narrow lodging we were not alone, and we no longer looked on Londoners as flinty-hearted barbarians. Our tone was altered, we wanted no pity of any one, we did not care a penny for the young gentlemen lodgers and their miraculous ministers, nor for the grind of the cabs, nor for any thing else under the sun. The lion had been looked at all round, and his majesty did not appear to be a tenth as majestic as when we had only heard his roar miles away.

"These are small matters, but they rise before us as we look over the twenty-five years' space which has intervened: they are the haze of that other shore between which rolls a quarter of a century of mercy. At the review we are lost in a rush of mingled feelings. 'With my staff I crossed this Jordan, and now——.' Our ill-health at this moment scarcely permits us either to hold a pen or to dictate words to another; we must, therefore, leave till another season such utterances of gratitude as the fulness of our heart may permit us. Common blessings may find a tongue at any moment, but favors such as we have received of the Lord throughout this semi-jubilee are not to be acknowledged fitly with the tongues of men or of angels.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE.

The Frenchman in the Omnibus on Sabbath Observance—An English Distiller—Condemning Parisian Sabbath-breakers—Avoid Levity about Holy Things—Dr. Armstrong in the Storm at Sea—A Brave Volunteer in a Shipwreck — A Dangerous Bridge — Following a Moderate Drinker's Example — Difference of Temperament Illustrated.

I WAS riding in an omnibus from Edinburgh to Dunfermline one day, and a city missionary took his seat by my side. I said to him, "Now, please don't say any thing to me—please don't talk to me, for I am tired. I spoke in Edinburgh last night, and I have to speak in Dunfermline to-night; please don't talk to me or introduce me to anybody." A Frenchman came in; it was no use to tell him not to talk. So he began, and his conversation was about religion, and I saw at once that he was a sceptic. The missionary said, "But you must acknowledge that now we are emphatically in a religious country." "Yes," he said, "there is very much religion, very much religion, but very little Christianity." "Why, what do you mean by that?"

"Oh! I will tell you, sare. You have associations, you have ragged school—very good! You have missionary associations—very good! You have association for the better observance of the Lord's Day. Oh! now, sare, I go to the meeting for the better observance of the Lord's Day, and there was one very big large gentleman there, very big large he was, and he made one very big large speech, sare; and I will tell you what he said"—and I saw the Frenchman began to get excited—"he said, 'Ladies and gentlemen, look at France!' Now France is my country, sare, and what for he tell the people look at France?

"He said, 'Look at France; God has trod France under His foot.' What for he say that? He say He have trode him under His foot, sare—what for he say that? Because he say France have trod under his foot the Sabbath-day. I know very well the people of Paris go for their amusement; they go for their recreation, they go to theatre, to ball, to Versailles, and go into the garden; they go to dance, they go to have their grand amusement and enjoyment, sare. I know that; but what business had that man to tell the people that because the Frenchman seek his enjoyment on Sunday that God had cursed him, sare; when that very man that say that keeps twelve men to work in his distillery all day Sunday? You may call that man very religious, but I do not understand it; in my opinion, sare, he is one very, von vare big hypocrite.

"Because he says it may be very bad to go into the fields on Sunday; it may be very bad to go to the theatre; but which is the worst, to take God's beautiful grain, what He give us for nourishment, and kill him, and take all the good out of him, and make him all rotten, and then when he putrefy, make an agency, sare, that burns men's bodies and souls? Sare, I am not a teetotaler, I drinks my wine; but whiskey!—and he make whiskey on Sunday—any man that do that, and then tell the people that France is trod under foot because it does not keep the Sunday, is, in my opinion, a very great hypocrite."

AVOID LEVITY ABOUT HOLY THINGS.

Now the world will judge of these things; what we want, then, as Christian men, is consistency. There is another point that I should like to bring before you. It is just this. As Christian men we should be careful that we use no levity in speaking of the Word of God. The world expects that the Christian man will treat the Word of God with reverence, and all jesting and joking on passages of Scripture are exerting an influence that will work perhaps when you have forgotten all about them. When I was a boy I remember this:

I was thrown into the society of those who I won't say ridiculed the Bible, but who related such comical stories and made up such curious conundrums out of the Bible, that there are many passages to-day that I cannot read without the whole thing being brought before me, and making me feel uneasy and annoyed at it. If the Bible is God's revelation to man, let us handle it reverently, let us handle it tenderly. Young men, whatever you may do, treat not the Word of God with levity, nor make a joke on sacred things. This point I mention as it might be by the way.

My address was to be, as you know, upon the power of example, and you may say, perhaps, "Well, you have not spoken much about that; you have been talking to us about the power of our influence." Well, it is the power of influence, or the influence of example, that I would speak upon. Who is the hero? Who, in trouble, in disaster, is the hero? It is the Christian man; and there his example shines out. It is the Christian man.

DR. ARMSTRONG ON BOARD THE "ATLANTIC."

In the steamer Atlantic, plying between Norwich and New York, whilst tossed about one long night between Norwich and New London, with the steam-chest exploded, and all in confusion, the rudder-ropes burnt away, and she drifting without a particle of sail on board, or any thing to help her—there were sceptical men there; there were ungodly men there; there were men of business there; wealthy men were there, and some of them were offering thousands and thousands of dollars to any who would save their lives—they gave no comfort to any; they gave no strength to any.

But there was one gray-haired man there, a feeble man, Dr. Armstrong, of the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and while he worked with all his might when there was any hope, when they felt that they must drive on shore and the ship must go to pieces, that gray-haired man stood calm and quiet, not like a Stoic, but with the strong faith of the Christian. And they came to him for comfort; every eye was fixed on him; he was the example; they clung to him in that hour of danger.

And when he said, "Let us pray," women sobbed, and strong men bowed themselves, while the Christian hero, who had been first in working for safety while hope remained, lifted up his voice in prayer, and then, as a noble example of an heroic faith and confidence, waited the dread result with the patient quietness of a Christian. It is the Christian man that the infidel looks to in time of trouble or in time of distress. It is he—ay, look to him; he becomes the hero. Why?—by the power and force of his example.

A BRAVE VOLUNTEER IN A SHIPWRECK.

Let us suppose a shipwreck; a terrific sea, a mighty hurricane; and those in the village are full of alarm; they hear the gun that tells of the distress; they go down to the beach, it is an awful night—it is a terrific night; they see the blue lights, that reveal to them the ship in distress, with men clinging to the masts and to the shrouds, and hear the cry of passengers upon the deck. They bring down the boat, but it such a terrific surf that no one will venture: one thinks of his wife and children, another of his old mother, another thinks of his brothers and sisters. There is the boat—there is the wreck—no one dares to launch that boat, there is so much danger.

Another gun—another blue light—there! there! It is too much for them; one young man steps forward and leaps into the boat. "I will go—who will follow me?" At that moment there is a press forward, and every man is ready to take the oar. Who is leader of those men? The volunteer. The volunteer by the tacit consent of all stands at the helm; he orders them to pull at the starboard oars and at the larboard oars; his eye is fixed upon the wreck. He is the master of the expedition, and when the passengers are safe, and all brought ashore again, he, the hero in that fearful strife with the elements, is the most modest man of the company. Just so with the Christian man; he is the hero in the struggle, he is the modest man when earthly rewards are to be showered upon those who have done services for their fellow-men.

There are some persons who think they set a good example when they are setting an example that other men cannot follow. Now to illustrate the point, if you please. With regard to intoxicating liquor as a beverage, there are a great many good men who say they are setting a good example by their moderation. People generally, who are not fully acquainted with the philosophy of the temperance movement, do not understand, or they seem to be troubled by this fact, that drunkenness is a moral evil, but it is produced by physical agency.

A DANGEROUS BRIDGE.

Now you may say to me if you please as a man, "Mr. Gough, I am a moderate drinker; I use these things in moderation, and therefore I set you a good example." I say at once, "Sir, you do not." "Well, but if I drink one glass and there stop, is not that an example for others?" "No, sir; no, sir; no more than if there was a bridge built over a gulf, to fall into which was utter ruin, and that bridge will bear 150 lbs., and you weigh 150 lbs., you say to that young man (and he weighs 200 lbs.), 'Follow my example.' 'I don't like the look of that bridge.' 'Don't be a fool. I have walked it forty years; proved it perfectly safe; it is a good example; perfectly safe; never cracked with me; never sprung with me; perfectly safe.' 'But I don't like it.' 'Don't be foolish; you can do that which I can do; now I am setting you a good example; follow me step by step.'

"That young man attempts to follow it; he sets his foot on the centre; crash! crash! down he goes, with a shriek, into destruction. Now, did you set a good example? No, because you didn't take into consideration the difference of weight." Before you can say to a young man, "I set you a good example," you must take into consideration the difference between his temperament and yours, his susceptibility and yours. There are some men who cannot drink moderately, who never did and never will. Well, you say, "They are weak-minded if they cannot." I say you cannot judge of a man's strength of mind by his ability to take large quantities of intoxicating stimulant. Why, is it any evidence of strength of mind, that a man can get up in a morning a beer-barrel, and go to bed a barrel of beer? Is it any evidence of strength of mind that a man can drink large quantities of beer?

The stupidest dolt of an agricultural laborer I think I ever saw in my life, they told me could drink fifteen quarts of cider in a day—and stand. It is no evidence of a man's strength of mind that he can stand the influence of intoxicating drinks. To make it a little plainer I will give you an illustration. You say you set a good example. Do you set a good example to the drunkard? Some persons say they do, because if he drinks just as they do he will never become a drunkard—he will be a moderate drinker.

FOLLOWING A MODERATE DRINKER'S EXAMPLE.

Now we will take the drunkard, if you please. Here he is. "Follow my example." "Very well, sir." "I take it twice a day." "Very well, sir." "I take it at noon and I take it at my dinner at four or five o'clock." "Very well, sir." "Now follow my example." "Yes, sir." "You drink just when I do, and only when I do." "Yes, sir." "Well now, we come together at twelve to take the first glass—you and I." "Yes, sir." "Pour it out. I drink it; you drink it." The moderate drinker has drunk it, and this poor man has drunk it. They go away. You go to your business; you have no thoughts about the wine or the drink—not at all. You attend to your business, go and see your business connections—here you are.

Four o'clock comes—you have been spending your time as usual. What has he been doing? He has been getting nervous; he could not help it. He has felt strange sensations—cannot help it. Those sensations have grown into a longing—he cannot help it. He has been thinking there never was such a long afternoon; he has been looking at his watch—if he has got one; he is irritable, he is going to get a certain good when four o'clock comes. You quietly come to your glass; there stands the nervous man; he looks at it; his eye gleams like a tiger's that has once tasted blood, and sees it again. You take yours, sip it quietly; he takes his, clutches it, looks at you, looks round wildly, drinks it at a draught, and before you are ready to go to bed he is drunk.

He cannot help it—to save his life he cannot help it. Why? Because his system is diseased, and it is utterly impossible for that man to drink moderately—as impossible as it is to blow up a powder-magazine moderately, or fire a gun off a little at a time. You might as well undertake to wash a negro white as to make a moderate drinker out of a drunkard. Now there is one case where I deny that you set that man a good example. There are some so exceedingly susceptible to the influence of drink, and these are cases where you do not set men a good example. What is moderation, and what is excess? You do not judge of excess by the quantity a man drinks—not at all. It is by the effect of that quantity upon the brain and nervous system.

One gentleman may come upon this platform who has drunk a bottle of wine, and he may sit there and he may talk to me and talk to you, and it would be a libel to say he is drunk. Another shall come up on that side who has drunk half-a-bottle, and he shall reel and stagger, and look at you with a laugh—"Ha! ha!" There is a man that is absolutely drunk with half the quantity of the other man, who it would be a libel to say was drunk. Now, while drunkenness is a sin against God, a sin against man's body, a sin against his intellect, while it is belittling and lowering and debasing and degrading, it is produced not by the quantity a man drinks, but by the effect of that quantity upon the nervous system.

I believe there are some men in this assembly who cannot drink moderately in the strictest sense of that term. If I give you a glass to-night you will say what you would not say without it, and do what you would not do without it, and go where you would not go without it. It has affected your brain so slightly, yet enough to disturb your self-control, to weaken the power of the will, and warp the judgment.

Annie Gale.—In a sweet spot in one of the Western States lives little Annie Gale. Not long ago she was led to embrace Christ as her Saviour. The news of her conversion soon spread through the place. One day a friend called on her father, and said, "It's all nonsense for your Annie to think she has been converted. She was just like a little angel always; she was good enough before. If Dan Hunter, now, could be turned around and made a Christian of, I'd believe in it." Annie heard the conversation, and her heart beat with pity for poor Dan. She knew him to be one of the worst and vilest of characters. Impelled with love for his soul, she went to his wretched dwelling and began to talk to him in tender tones about Jesus, and God's love to the chief of sinners. After referring to her own conversion, she asked him if he was not a sinner, and if he did not need the same Saviour whom she had found? Poor old Dan's heart was touched; he wept, he fell upon his face, and cried, "Lord, ha' mercy on the worst of sinners!" God heard that earnest, penitent cry, and Annie left the old man praising the mercy which could save a wretch like him. It was Dan's business now to tell to all the story of God's love. He would say, "It's the same Gospel, the very same Gospel, that so blessed little Annie Gale. You wouldn't think it could be, such a dreadful sinner as I've been; but the same good Lord who takes little children in His arms and blesses 'em, saves the chief of sinners too. It's true! Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out" (John 6 : 37).

THE KING IN ZION.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 23d.—Ps. 2. Golden Text, Acts 2 : 36. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day is a part of Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, when he said by the Holy Ghost, "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." This is God's declaration to every man. God demands allegiance to Him, "Whom He hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also He made the worlds" (Heb. 1 : 2). He tells us all things were created not only by Him, but for Him (Col. 1 : 16), and thus the Father claims our homage to His Son. But God has given us His only-begotten Son to be our Saviour, and the majority of mankind neither believe in nor accept this "unspeakable gift" (2 Cor. 9 : 15). God has given Him also to rule over us, and the majority of men say by their independence of God in every-day life, "We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke 19 : 14).

The wide-spread insurrection against God, which is prevalent everywhere, will culminate soon in the last great struggle, when the future Antichrist will be developed for whom all the antichristian element in this dispensation has been making way. Then there will be open war declared against Christ Himself. "These" (the ten kings) "shall make war with the Lamb" (Rev. 17 : 14). "And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against Him that sat on the horse, and against His army" (Rev. 19 : 19). And it is this time of "great tribulation" of which the Psalmist says, "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against His anointed" (or His Christ), "saying, Let us break their bands asunder and cast away their cords from us."

What do the kings and rulers? They set themselves "and take counsel against the Lord and against His Christ." So did Herod when he sent into all the coasts of Bethlehem and slew all the infant children with the intent to destroy the new-born Son of God. So did Pilate when he gave sentence that Jesus should be crucified.

"He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision." We do not often hear of God laughing. Once in the Book of Proverbs (1 : 24–26): "Because I have called and ye refused; I have stretched out My hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all My counsel, and would none of My reproof: I will also laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh." When the God of love, of patience, and consolation has exhausted all His resources with sinners, then, and then only, can He laugh at their calamity; it is a side of our God that we do not know, but there fore is it all the more awful. "Then shall He speak unto them in His wrath, and vex them in His sore displeasure" (Psalm 2 : 5); and again, verse 9, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces as a potter's vessel." It is then that the last great prayer-meeting of unheard prayers shall be made. "And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of His wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" (Rev. 6 : 15–17).

"Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion." The Son of God is anointed King by God His Father, although, like David of old, He is rejected by the world. His sceptre is a sceptre of love to all who do not force Him to make it a sceptre of judgment. What, then, is our position relative to God's anointed? Are we taking the part of the world and doing as most men do, i.e., repudiating the rightful claims of Christ? Or are we taking the place He has left us to keep for Him, "not of the world, even as He was not of the world" (John 17 : 14–16); hated, persecuted, enduring evil, suffering wrongfully, pleasing not ourselves and seeking not our own—is this our true position?

In business, for instance, are you ever a party to a transaction which, although it is become a custom with the world, could never have been transacted by Christ? Is the ring of truth in your advertisements, or do you exaggerate because others do, and then excuse yourself upon the plea that it is customary, and every one will understand? Is this according to the laws of Christ's kingdom? "Let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil" (Matt. 5 : 37). Is He king in your shop and office? Then do you sometimes give invitations when you are not able to bear the expense, because you say, "It is expected of me"? Who expects it—Christ? Do you sometimes seek in dress to imitate those who are in another station of society because, as you say, they will think I am nobody if I do not dress better? Is this according to the laws of Christ's kingdom, where we learn, in lowliness of mind, each to esteem others better than themselves? (Phil. 2 : 3.) Alas! how little is Jesus known as King!

But God has anointed Him, and either willingly here, out of love and gratitude, or by force hereafter, "at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth; and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Philipp. 2 : 10, 11). Lord, but not their Lord; Jesus, the Saviour, but they everlastingly unsaved—such is the future acknowledgment of those who in this life own not willingly Christ as Lord. Like Balaam, who said by the Spirit of God, "I shall see Him, but not now: I shall behold Him, but not nigh" (Num. 24 : 17).

"I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto Me, Thou art My Son; this day have I begotten Thee." Paul tells us (Acts 13 : 32, 33) that this prediction was fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ. "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that He hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, "Thou art My Son; this day have I begotten Thee." It is He who is "the first begotten of the dead and the Prince of the kings of the earth" (Rev. 1 : 5). The Father says, "Ask of Me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." And the promise is repeated Isa. 49 : 6, "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the end of the earth." Yes, our King shall reign, and He who with His followers is now despised and rejected shall "be great unto the ends of the earth" (Micah 5 : 4).

Our Psalm next gives a counsel, "Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed, ye judges of the earth." Now is ever God's time, to-morrow is that of our great enemy. "The Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts" (Heb. 3 : 7, 8). "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6 : 2). Therefore, "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord" (Isa. 1 : 18). "Come, for all things are now ready, saith the Lord" (Luke 14 : 17). "Kiss the Son lest He be angry." Come to Him while His arms are open, and while He invites sinners. "Kiss the Son lest He be angry, and ye perish from the right way, when His wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him." Yes, blessed, for "He knoweth them that trust in Him" (Nahum 1 : 7).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Mons. Grevy, the new President of the French Republic, has announced in his first message to the Chambers the principles by which he intends to conduct his administration. On the crucial question of his own position in relation to the Assembly, he speaks unequivocally, and with a wise recognition of the principles of Republican Government. He announces that he is "sincerely submissive to the great law of Parliamentary Government, and shall never enter into conflict with the national will conveyed through its constitutional organs." Such a resolution so emphatically stated is a good augury for the peace and prosperity of the Republic, and will do much to establish confidence in the stability of the government. By his statement Mons. Grévy acknowledges himself the servant of the people, and the executive officer of their behests as expressed by their representatives. If he adhere to that line of conduct, France will be spared the spectacle of the executive jarring with the legislative authority, and will probably make a rapid advance in national prosperity.

The expenses of the Afghan war the English Government propose to defray out of the Indian revenue. Lord Cranbrook, the Secretary of State for India, states that this estimated surplus, £1,245,000, will accrue from extra receipts from opium. This is startling news. Of late years the opium revenue has fallen more than $5,000,000 short of what it realized in 1871–72. The sudden increase now announced is probably due to drought having cut off the supply from the poppy-fields of Shansi. But, whatever its cause, the fact deserves the most serious attention.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, in the House of Commons, put the case in plain English, telling the country that "that surplus was derived from the opium monopoly; and, having got the money by poisoning the Chinese, they were going to spend it in killing the Afghans."

Invitations to a Prophetic Conference at Mildmay Park, London, have been issued. They are signed by Dr. Horatius Bonar, J. Denham Smith, Captain Moreton, and others. The following is an extract from them :

It was, we believe, generally felt that our gathering together last year was a means of much blessing to many, and that it was graciously used of our God both to cheer those who are waiting for the dawn of day, and to spread more widely among His servants the hope of our Lord's speedy return.

Certainly, His hand was upon us for good. There was vouchsafed to us a real unity of heart, and a true spirit of forbearance and brotherly love; and those who differed widely in their method of interpretation of prophecy were thoroughly of one mind in seeking to stir up each other to more believing hope, and to prayer for the hastening of the day of God.

As the lapse of another year brings our blessed Lord's advent so much the nearer, as "on earth perplexity and distress of nations" seem to grow more intense, as new doors open for the preaching of the everlasting Gospel which is to precede "the end," and as in Christendom the voice of infidelity waxes louder and bolder, it cannot but be right that the servants of God should "speak often one to another," and "so much the more as (they) see the day approaching."

Whatever views of prophetic interpretation are held, it is felt by most who look for our Lord's pre-millennial advent that the signs of the times are such as to encourage His servants to "look up, and to lift up (their) heads, for (their) redemption draweth nigh;" and that it is both the privilege and duty of the Church, while the taunt, "Where is the promise of His coming?" is in the lips of a scoffing world, to testify that "the Lord is at hand."

And if it be indeed true, if our once crucified and now glorified Saviour is on the point of fulfilling His parting promise to return to claim His bride, and to close this dispensation, what a solemn responsibility rests upon those who believe that they almost hear His footfall to sound a word of comfort to their waiting brethren, and a startling note of warning to the perishing multitude around.

Beloved brethren, we do believe (and our belief is shared by many) that "the time of the end" is upon us, that the Bridegroom will speedily come, and the door be shut. Thus believing, is it not ours to speak, and, so far as in us lies, to help each other and our fellow-Christians to realize more and more distinctly our privileges and duties at such an unspeakably solemn period?

The following subjects are set down for discussion: The duty of taking heed to the more sure Word of Prophecy; Christ's own testimony with regard to His Second Coming; Old Testament saints always waiting—trace from the patriarchs up to Simeon and Anna; The two Advents often combined in Scripture; The teaching of the Apostles concerning the Second Coming of Christ; The Conversion of the World—is it to be accomplished by the preaching of the Word in this dispensation, or subsequently to the coming of Christ? The Times of the Gentiles; The Gathering of Israel; The Millennial Reign of Christ; The Two Resurrections; The Two Judgments; The Present Dispensation (Acts 15); the Eternal State—Rev. 21 : 5, "Behold I make all things new;" Practical Influence of the Blessed Hope.

Reports of these meetings will appear in this journal.

The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, passing through Paris on his way to Mentone in the South of France, wrote thence the following letter to the church at the Tabernacle. It was read from the pulpit by the Rev. Jackson Wray, a Wesleyan minister who conducted the services in Mr. Spurgeon's absence.

"Beloved friends,—By God's gracious care I have journeyed thus far, and feel already that pain and sickness are losing their dominion over me. The weather has been extremely favorable, and if it continues so a few days longer I hope I shall reach my destination with comparative ease. This is enough about myself. Now, may every blessing rest upon you all in my absence, and may the esteemed brother, who in an emergency so generously consented to fill my place, have your hearty prayers, that his ministry among you may win many souls to Jesus. You have just lately brought all the tithes into the store-house, and now you may look for a great blessing. Does not the promise so run? My love with you all.—Yours, for Christ's sake, C. H. SPURGEON."

Mr. Sankey's work in England is being widely felt. A correspondent writes: "In the religious effort which is at present in progress in Newcastle, Mr. Sankey is, of course, only the central figure of a large number of workers. Ministers of various denominations are assisting him in his labors, and the Rev. T. Champness, of London, has been brought down for the purpose of filling the place which on a previous occasion was occupied by Mr. Moody. Mr. Champness does not cultivate the graces of oratory, nor sacrifice effectiveness to beauty of method. Starting from the very intelligible principle that men have souls to be saved, he lays himself out in an earnest way to assist in the work of saving them. A clear-minded, plain-speaking man, he enforces religious truths by homely illustrations, and uses language 'easily understood of the people.'

"The influence of the singing of Mr. Sankey and the preaching of Mr. Champness was to be seen in the fact that some hnndred and fifty persons remained for a prayer-meeting when the ordinary service was over, and in the further circumstance that, when the question was asked, many young men held up their hands in token that they were desirous of a change of life. Mr. Sankey proposes after leaving Newcastle to continue his labors in the North of England, and intends visiting nearly all the principal towns. He has received invitations from the ministers of the various Evangelical churches.

"A Hardworking Woman."—A gentleman writing to the Times of January 9th gives the following account of "A Gloucestershire woman, whose life was well-known to his family and himself. She married at eighteen, her husband being about the same age. His wages as an agricultural laborer were 15*s.* ($3.75) a week. She worked in the fields from 8 till 6, earning 10*d.* (20 cts.) a day. She brought up nine children, made and mended all the clothes worn by them, her husband, and herself, until her sons and daughters were old enough to get their own. She was always up at five; on washing days at four. Went to bed between nine and ten. In harvest time she would get the children up at two, be off with them to any field within walking distance, and begin gleaning as soon as it was light. On Saturdays her field work was over at one, after which she would walk to Bristol, three miles, carrying often a basket of clothes for a neighboring laundress, buy her 'marketing,' as she called it, and carry home, with the rest of her little parcels, two pecks of flour. On Saturday evenings she baked, and would sometimes make a pair of trousers or a smock-frock, besides washing and ironing a few things that the children wanted for Sunday, and often working till midnight. She was a very regular attendant at the church services, which were a real pleasure to her. There were few gifts in her days; her only ones were, on the 30th of January in each year, a loaf of bread and material for one shirt. Her children began to work 'almost as soon as they could toddle.' She was a strong, handsome, cheerful woman to the last, and lived to a good old age. Her children grew up respectable men and women, and her now numerous grandchildren are some of them in good positions, and all with a great capacity for work."

Giving Brandy in Hospitals.—On Jan. 8 an inquest was held in London, on Honorah Rock, aged sixty-four. The deceased had amassed a large amount of money by keeping over one hundred lodging-houses in different parts of London, but, drinking to excess, she lost nearly all her money. Her sister and her husband took her to live with them, and after a time, as they were both total abstainers, the deceased was induced to become so also. For four years she continued so, when for a time she became an inmate of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. There she was given some brandy, the old appetite revived, and she took to habits of intoxication again in spite of all her kind relatives could do. On the evening of the 7th she went out and bought two bottles of gin, the whole of one of which she drank before going to rest. The nex morning she was found dead in her bed. Th medical man in attendance said that death resulted from a rupture of a bloodvessel on th brain, accelerated by drink, and the jury returne a verdict in accordance with the medical evidence.

Another terrible example of the ruinous effect of drink was mentioned recently by Mr. Josep Weatherley at a "Sunday Morning Breakfast" given to a number of poor people. He had som time ago picked off the streets, in rags, a youn man whose father was a man of enormou wealth, and willing to do any thing for his son he would but live respectably, while his sister wa the wife of an Earl; this young man had sinc died horribly, a victim to intemperance.

"Take your Seats for Jerusalem," or its equivalent in Arabic, will soon be heard at Jaffa fro railway guards, for at last there seems to be chance for a railway between those two place The French company which obtained a firma several years ago for its construction has ju sent out four engineers to go over the final su vey. Travellers say that the line will not on be a great comfort, but that something of th kind is rendered absolutely necessary by th present wretched state of the road. The journ from Jaffa to Jerusalem now occupies ten hou on horseback. All merchandise is carried eith on camels or mules. Ten thousand strange including the Eastern pilgrims, now annua visit Jerusalem.

THE REV. JOHN ANGELL JAMES.

The Influence of a Pious Mother—The Example of a Fellow-Apprentice—The Anxious Inquirer in the Shoemaker's Shop—Studies for the Ministry—His First Services in Birmingham—Great Success—Failing Health—His Last Literary Labor—His Death—Extract from his Addresses—His Testimony about Total Abstinence.

It may be said without exaggeration that no Christian preacher of this century has achieved so wide a reputation as the late John Angell James, pastor of Carr's Lane Church, Birmingham, England, the author of "The Anxious Inquirer" and a large number of religious works of a like valuable and useful character.

His name is written on the hearts of the British churches, along with the names of Wickliffe and Latimer, Ridley and Hooper, Owen and Flavel, Baxter and Howe, Henry and Doddridge, Watts and Whitefield, and a long list of illustrious men of whom the world was not worthy.

John Angell James was born at Blandford, England, on the 6th of June, 1785. His father was an honorable and an upright man, but did not till late in life profess faith and love toward the Lord Jesus Christ. His mother was a woman of eminent godliness, and to her care and her prayers, to his very latest years, he constantly expressed the most grateful acknowledgments. His mother used to take the children one by one to her chamber and pray with them there, and earnestly beseech God to take them into His family, and make them forever His own. The blessed result of this maternal piety was, that all her children who lived became truly Christian people.

When school life was over John was apprenticed to a Mr. Bailey, a draper at Poole, in Dorsetshire. This was a trying hour for

"THE YOUNG MAN FROM HOME."

Under the influence of a false shame, he discontinued the habit of morning and evening prayer. A new apprentice, however, came, who slept in the same room with him, and the first night the newcomer knelt by his bedside before retiring to rest. The susceptible heart and conscience of John were struck with self-reproach ; and that solitary act of fidelity in a fellow-apprentice, without a single word to sustain it, was made by God to sink into his heart, and become the spring of all his future usefulness.

There lived in Poole at that time a humble but most useful Christian, an old shoemaker, who was always on the watch for the appearance of religious thoughtfulness in young people, and was accustomed to invite them to his house. Night after night the young apprentice went to the shoemaker's shop, an "anxious inquirer." In that cottage were first heard the tones of that voice in prayer, which has since awakened the devotions of thousands. At this time one of John's elder sisters was visiting some relations at Romsey, and as she had already been brought to Christ, she and her brother used to correspond on religious topics.

She showed some of his letters to Mr. Bennett, afterwards Dr. Bennett, of Falcon Square Chapel, London ; and he, being struck by the evidence they presented of the fervor and ability of the writer, thought he might become an effective minister of the Gospel. This was followed by correspondence, and, through Mr. Bennett's influence, John was led to look to the ministry as his future calling. His father was extremely unwilling that his son should abandon business ; but at length these difficulties were surmounted, and the youth became a pupil of Dr. Bogue, at Gosport.

He was there received into the Christian church ; his mother being a Baptist, none of the children had been baptized in infancy, and he was therefore baptized while there. Dr. Bogue's academy was supported by Mr. Robert Haldane and the London Missionary Society ; some of the students were destined for missionary work, and some for the ministry at home. It was on this foundation that Mr. James received his education. Among his associates at Gosport was Morrison, the famous Chinese missionary.

The urgent demand then existing for Evangelical preaching induced the conductors of Dissenting colleges to encourage early attempts at public speaking. Mr. James was accordingly much engaged in such services, and before the termination of his studies several churches sought his permanent settlement with them, and amongst these was

THE CHURCH AT CARR'S LANE,

Birmingham, of which Dr. R. W. Dale is now the pastor. In August, 1804, Mr. James, then only nineteen years of age, entered Birmingham to preach to the church temporarily, and with no conception that he would be chosen its pastor. He had not, however, preached to them more than four times, when a deputation waited upon him with a request that he would become their minister as soon as he might be permitted to leave Gosport.

He returned to the academy, and, after another year spent there, came back to Birmingham to enter upon the duties of the pastorate. On the 8th of May he was ordained, the Revs. Drs. Bogue and Jay (of Bath), and other eminent ministers, taking part in the services of that auspicious day. Mr. James said of this day of his ordination : "It was a solemn and delightful day. The church had gone through much trouble, but now seemed to see happier days approaching. The old men wept for joy ; the young men rejoiced in hope."

At that time Carr's Lane congregation was far from being the numerous, wealthy, and influential body it now is. It consisted of not more than 200 persons, and the church itself of only about forty members. The pulpit ministrations of the young minister for nearly seven years did not increase the number of his hearers, and this season was one of trial and anxiety, but evidently also one of spiritual improvement ; for to such a minister it could not fail to prove a season of self-examination and earnest wrestling with God.

If already he had learned to preach, now he learned to pray—to pray in faith, and wait for blessing. The answer to those prayers was not long delayed ; for in the eighth year of his pastorate an alteration and improvement of his chapel was needed and effected ; and when, at its reopening, he returned to it with his congregation, it proved insufficient to hold the numbers that gathered there. Six years only elapsed from this period before it was determined to take this chapel down, and erect another which should seat 2000. The new building continued to be crowded Sunday by Sunday till the day of his death, and is so still under the Rev. Mr. Dale's ministry.

After a ministry of fifty-four years over this congregation, marked by many interesting experiences, and varied by occasionally preaching and speaking in other places, Mr. James's health began to fail, chiefly through accelerated, no doubt, by a long course of constant labor, and intensified by the wearing force of the "care of all the churches." His own consciousness of an exhausted constitution had been often betrayed by declared anticipations of coming death during his more recent public appearances. When the Evangelical Alliance, of which he was the first President, met in Belfast, he, by the following letter, requested an interest in the prayers of its assembled members :

"I shall be with you in spirit at the holy gathering this week ; but, instead of being with you as God's active servant, I must remain at home God's suffering one. Perhaps the dear brethren will think of me as they approach the Throne of Grace ; and, that it may not be forgotten, I will enclose in this letter a written supplication to that effect, which you will be kind enough to present at one of your devotional meetings. Such a prayer from such an assembly will perhaps have power with God and prevail: 'Mr. James sends his fraternal love to the brethren assembled at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, and, while praying that the great Lord, who is the centre of Christian unity, may be in their midst, earnestly solicits their prayers on his behalf, that, if the cup of personal and relative suffering, which is now put into his hand, may not pass from him, he may be favored with bright manifestations of the presence and power of Christ, and be enabled to bear present and future affliction with all long-suffering and joyfulness, and be thus assisted to glorify God in the fires.' " was, at the last, very sudden and unexpected. He had been indisposed and feeble for some ten days, and his physical infirmities were perceptibly and rapidly increasing. But on the Sunday morning previous to his death he had preachec an eminently characteristic and vigorous discourse at Edgbaston Chapel ; and in the evenin he was present at Carr's lane. Indeed, in th midst of all his physical weakness, his ment power seemed to remain unimpaired, and h wrote and studied as usual up to the hour of h last seizure. The sermon he intended to preac at Carr's Lane Chapel on the next Sunday eve ing was prepared. He was cheerful and happ under the consciousness that his end was a proaching. He talked much of heaven, ar seemed to anticipate, with great satisfactic "the rest that remaineth for the people of God.'

The gloom which had previously sometim clouded his mind, especially when he thought leaving his afflicted daughter, had been who dissipated. During the week his friends we struck with the elevation of his religious j and were not without their fears that the e could not be far off. On the Friday, howev he seemed stronger, and a lady, who happen to be staying with him, read to him in the ev ing the whole of the Missionary Chronicle the month, to which he listened with great terest, as it referred largely to China. He th wrote to his brother :

"My condition just now is very low, not spirit. I thank my Heavenly Father I peaceful, I may say happy, quietly and cont edly waiting to see how it will go with me. appetite entirely fails. Through mercy I tolerable nights ; but I believe it is the beginr of the end."

On that day, also, Mr. James corrected proofs of a review of the life and labors of the Rev. Ric Knill, and forwarded it, accompanied by the lowing letter :

"I think it probable that with these few r on dear Knill's life and labors I shall lay my pen, which has written much ; would G had written better! But, while I say this, I not without hope, yea, I may add convic that it has in some degree written usefully. some humble degree I have aimed at usefu both in my preaching and writing, and Goc to an amount which utterly astonishes an most overwhelms me, given me what I sought. Usefulness is within the reach all : the man who intensely desires to be u and takes the proper means, will be useful. will not withhold His grace from such d and such labors. Oh ! my brother, how de ful is it, notwithstanding the humbling an rowful consciousness of defects and sins, tc back upon a life spent for Christ. I tha sovereign God I am not without some deg this."

As he was about to retire to rest he becar in- disposed, having apparently been attack indigestion, and Dr. Evans was called his aid. He prescribed for his venerable frienc and assured his family there was no need for a When Mr. James was about to go to his room, Dr. Evans wished to assist him upst a trouble which Mr. James was very unwill to give ; but when the doctor persisted in prof ring his aid, he turned to him affectionatel and quoted the text, "Inasmuch as thou hast unto one of the least of these, thou hast unto Me."

During the night he was restless, and freq sick, but slept from half-past four till six c in the morning. Then he awoke, and plain that the time of his departure was at

He lay calmly for a little while, held out his hand o his son, who, with his medical advisers, was tanding at his bedside, and then again sank into a slumber which in a few minutes became the sleep of death. So peacefully passed away this honored servant of Christ.

Had he lived much longer, it is almost certain hat he would have been destined to protracted martyrdom, as latterly he had been afflicted with a most distressing malady, which time would have aggravated to torture. All this he was mercifully saved. A post-mortem examination disclosed partial ossification of the heart, and proved that death was actually caused by the rupture of a small vessel in that organ.

A few hours before he died, which was at seven o'clock in the morning, the previous hours of the night had been much disturbed. His servant, Ann ——, who heard the violence of his cough, went into his room to offer assistance, which he declined, unwilling that anybody should lose rest on his account. Before he died, he engaged in prayer, and repeated portions of Scripture and hymns. He was heard to utter,—

"Though dark be my way,
Since He is my guide,
'Tis mine to obey,
'Tis His to provide.
His path was much rougher
And darker than mine:
Did Christ, my Lord, suffer,
And shall I repine?"

In one of his last pastoral letters he said: "When I became pastor of the Carr's Lane Church, more than fifty-three years ago, the only object of congregational benevolence and action was the Sunday-school, which was then conducted in a private house hired for the purpose. There was nothing else we set our hands to. But there are now nearly 2000 children in our Sunday and day schools. We also raise annually about 500*l.* for the London Missionary Society and 200*l.* for two town-missionaries, and have helped to form six other Independent churches, and have ninety tract-distributors." There were, besides, a Dorcas, Maternal, Female Benevolent, Village Preachers', and Young Men's Christian Societies in connection with his church.

HIS ELOQUENCE AND EARNESTNESS.

Mr. James's literary labors were most abundant. Besides his "Anxious Inquirer," by which his name is best known, and of which more than half a million copies have been sold, he published "Pastoral Addresses," of which one million copies have been sold, and the "Young Man from Home" (about 100,000 copies).—"Christian Progress," the sequel of "The Anxious Inquirer"—"The Family Monitor"—"The Young Man's Friend"—"Christian Father's Present to his Children"—"Female Piety, or the Young Woman's Friend"—"The Earnest Ministry," and several other books, besides numerous essays and articles in periodicals. More than a million copies of various tracts by him have also been circulated. The following are brief speciments of his style:

IN A SPEECH ON THE BIBLE SOCIETY,

he said, "There are a few persons who would have this Society dissolved, and its supporters out of various denominations act only each within the pale of his distinct and separate communion. No! Let them dissolve the Hallelujah chorus of Handel, and send the performers each to sing his own part in his own separate abode; this, though an outrage upon harmony, would be a venial offence compared with the breaking up of an Institution which, to the delight of angels and the joy of God's own heart, is performing the noblest concert that ever rolled its sublime tones from earth to heaven. Let them speculate with gratification upon the scene that would present itself, were the rainbow divided, and the heavens striped with its distinct and separate colors; but let them not attempt to persuade us to separate the mingled beauties of this interesting Society, which now throws its noble arch across the hemisphere of Christendom, the symbol of retiring storms and the fair pledge of future tranquillity."

IN AN ADDRESS TO STUDENTS,

he said: "Preach Christ, my brethren, and for Christ's own sake. Exalt Christ, not yourselves. Exhibit Christ in the divinity of His person, the efficacy of His atonement, the prevalence of His intercession, the fulness of His grace, the freeness of His invitations, the perfection of His example; in all His mediatorial offices, and Scripture characters; and as the Alpha and Omega of your whole ministry. Let your sermons be fragrant with the odors of His name: carry this precious unguent to the pulpit, break the alabaster box, and let the precious perfume fill the house in which you minister.

Christ has Himself told you the secret of popularity and success, where He said, 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me. With this divine loadstone magnetize your sermons: here lies the attraction. Preach as in full view of all the wonders of Calvary, and let it be as if, while you spoke, you felt the Saviour's grace flowing into and filling your soul, and as if at that moment you were sympathizing with the apostle in His sublime raptures—'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.' When Popery and Puseyism are lifting so extensively the crucifix, or at any rate a mere ceremonial religion, let us exhibit the Cross in all its grandeur and attraction."

Mr. James earnestly recommended as follows: "Begin life, young men, with an extreme dread of intoxicating drink. There is ground for alarm. Drunkenness is fearfully prevalent. Myriads and myriads sink every year into the drunkard's grave, and, lower still, into the drunkard's hell. One half of the lunacy, two thirds of the pauperism, and three fourths of the crime of society are said to spring from this desolating habit. Beware, then, of this dreadful appetite and propensity. Be afraid of it. Consider yourselves liable to it. Abandon all self-confidence. Avoid every thing that leads to drinking.

Abjure tobacco in every shape. Shun bad company. Never cross the threshold of the tavern for the purpose of conviviality. Practise total abstinence. All the drunkards that are, or ever have been, were moderate men once. I do most earnestly entreat you to abstain from all intoxicating drinks. You do not need them for health, and to take them for gratification is the germ of inebriety. Total abstinence will conduce to health—to economy—and to prosperity.

I reflect with unutterable grief upon many young men who entered life with the brightest prospects. But they went to the tavern and theatre, and then to the brothel. They became dissipated, extravagant, idle. Unhappy youths! I know what they might have been—respectable tradesmen, prosperous merchants, honorable members of society. I know what they are—bloated rakes, discarded partners, uncertificated bankrupts, miserable vagrants, a burden to their friends, a nuisance to the community, and a torment to themselves."

Teaching a King.—Lately King Humbert of Italy, who is a Roman Catholic, received a deputation of members of the Evangelical Alliance. After the address had been read, the King asked them to what Church they belonged. Each one answered for himself. His Majesty, on hearing certain names, exclaimed, "I don't understand what that means. What a number of different shades!" It was explained to his Majesty that as in his army there were various uniforms and many regiments, but only one standard and one chief. The King then asked the pastor who was first presented to him who he was, to which he replied, "I am a pastor of the Waldensian Church, your Majesty." "Now," said the King, "I know where I am," and with this gave the pastor a hearty shake of the hand. Joyous and hopeful this, though strange, as occurring on Italian soil.

THE WORLDLY STUDENT AND THE LEFT-HAND LETTER.

A STUDENT in a college one day received a letter, and as he glanced at the postmark and the handwriting, he was startled. He had been expecting a letter from his mother, but the one he received, although it bore the postmark of home, was certainly not directed in his mother's familiar hand. Had anything happened to his dearly loved parent? In that moment of suspense, it seemed as if all her incessant love and many admonitions had rushed to his mind. Through his whole life he had been surrounded by her influence and her prayers.

His mother had, with deep earnestness, told him, when he was leaving home, that she believed the crisis of his life had come, and she implored him to choose Christ for his portion. But his heart was full of worldly ambition. His studies engrossed his whole attention, and he turned a deaf ear to religious truth. She continually wrote lettter after letter to him at college, urging him, with all the intensity of her love, not to make the fatal delay; but the letters were put carelessly aside, and he turned to his absorbing studies. Her faithful pleadings were unheeded. There was a revival in the school, but he did not attend the meetings. His classmates went, and were saved; but he had no time to spare, so completely was he immersed in his books. Would anything arouse him? It would seem as if everything had failed. But God's ways are not our ways. That letter did the work. The question, Has anything happened to mother? Is she dead, and all her tearful prayers unanswered?—the inquiry, so full of fear, prepared the heart for what was to follow.

With trembling fingers he tore open the envelope. No, his mother was not dead; but a serious accident had deprived her of her right hand. The hardest thing for the mother was the thought that she could not write to her absent son, and still entreat him to be wise in time.

Immediately she began a letter with her untaught left hand. But when the awkward hand had finished its unaccustomed task, it was so different from the fair writing of former days, that the poor mother could not restrain her tears over the crooked, miserable-looking letter. But it was the best that the faithful mother could do, and, weeping, she knelt and implored God to accept her offering and "make the crooked straight."

How little she thought that even the address that she penned with her trembling left hand was to awaken conscience. Slowly and thoughtfully her son deciphered the contents of the scarcely legible letter. It was full of the one theme—his salvation—and as he read the earnest appeal that had been written with such difficulty, every word touched the chords of his heart. He said, "If my salvation makes my dear mother so anxious, I will attend to it now."

That night he was found in a revival meeting; and from among the many who were converted at that time, he became one of the brightest lights of the Christian Church.

A Dream of being Burned to Death.—Solomon tells us that the multitude of dreams are vanities, and experience confirms the testimony. Nevertheless there are exceptional dreams wherein, as Elihu told Job, "God openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instructions." In the memoir of the Rev. W. Bull—a noted Nonconformist minister—such a dream is mentioned in connection with the burning down of the Haymarket Theatre in London, when fifteen or sixteen persons lost their lives. Among them was a young lady who had gone to the theatre, against the rebukes of her conscience, to oblige some country cousins, and who told her maid before she went that she should never return alive, for she had dreamed the night before that if she went she should die. This dream was awfully fulfilled. Her mother on the same night had a similar dream, so that in this case there was a double fulfilment.

"TURNING-POINTS IN LIFE."

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage; preached February 16th, 1879.

"Is the young man Absalom safe?"—2 SAMUEL 18 : 32.

Two Great Characteristics of Absalom: Worldly Ambition and Splendid Hair—The Safety of Young Men—Crises in Life when Men Must Have God or Perish—1. The Choice of an Occupation—A Career of Vacillation—God Knows for what you are Fitted—Ask Him—2. The Time when a Man Builds his Home—Marry a Heroine—"She's Been the Same to Me all Through"—3. The First Success in Life—Different Effects of Success—4. The First Sorrow—Life is a Conflict—The First Sorrow is perhaps Bereavement—Why the First-born Dies—Sickness will Come—5. The Tremendous Crisis of the Last Hour—Deathbed of a Nobleman—Come back to God—An Excursion Steamer at Niagara.

A FEW weeks ago, in discoursing to you upon this text, I spoke of the safeguards of young men. I use the text this morning for a different object, while I speak of the turning-points in our life. Two great characteristics of Absalom were worldly ambition and splendid hair. By the one he was debased; by the other, hung. He was a bad boy and broke his father's heart. He wanted to get his father's throne before the decease of the father. He wanted to get it immediately. He got an army. He started out in a great insurrection. David, the father, sits at the palace waiting for the news of the battle to come, not so anxious about whether Absalom's hosts won the day, or whether his own hosts won the day, as he is anxious about the safety of his boy. The father in him mightier than the king.

While he sits there watching and waiting for the coming of a messenger from the battle-field, he sees the dust rising in the highway, and long before the messenger comes up, bringing the swift dispatch, David cries out to him, "Is Absalom alive? Is Absalom dead? Is the boy wounded? Tell me quickly, is the young man Absalom safe?" But as the messenger had no very decisive intelligence to give, he stood aside. There David sat waiting for another messenger, and after a while he saw the dust rising on the highway, and long before the messenger had come up, David shouted to him again—shouts to this one as he had to the other, "Have you heard any thing from my boy? Is he wounded? Is he alive? Is he dead? Is the young man Absalom safe?"

Alas! he was not safe. Absalom riding on a mule—the meanest animal in all the world on which to ride, the hardest at the bit and the stiffest at the neck—Absalom riding on a mule, had gone under a tree branch and his hair had caught on the tree branch, and the mule, true to its characteristics, had gone on, he not able to stop it, and Absalom was suspended, and so he died. With an awful negative, the words of my text were answered, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" No, he was not safe. Destroyed for this life. Destroyed for the life to come.

I want to utter a few words this morning, in regard to the safety of young men—indeed of all men. While men may get along tolerably well without the religion of Christ, in some circumstances of life, there are three or four turning-points where a man must have God or perish; or, if he does not come to such a crisis as that, to such an extreme as that, he must have God or make a mistake that will last forever. I propose this morning to speak to you of three or four of these turning-points in life.

The first turning-point is

THE CHOICE OF AN OCCUPATION OR PROFESSION.

It is a very serious time when a young man comes from the school or the college and has completed his education, or has received all the education from the schools he will receive, and says, "Now, what shall I be? For what occupation, for what profession, am I prepared?" Mechanism will spread before him a hundred different occupations. Professional life will spread before him seven or eight callings. Indeed, perhaps in all there may be five hundred different callings and occupations. For only one of those five hundred is he fitted and prepared. If he does not have divine direction, four hundred and ninety-nine chances to one he will get in the wrong business. In other words, the most tremendous crisis perhaps in a man's life, or one of the most tremendous, is the time when he chooses his occupation or profession, and he wants God to tell him how to choose.

I knew a man who started in commercial life with bright prospects. He crossed over from commercial life into the medical profession; he went from the general medical profession into specific surgery; he went from surgery into the ministry; he went from the ministry into the army during the last war; he came out and entered the ministry again; then he passed from the ministry into surgery, and so his life has been a complete vacillation, and with the most wonderful talents his life is going to be a failure. How much better it would have been if that man could have got the right profession or occupation at the start. He was particularly qualified for surgery, and I believe if he had gone before God and asked for His direction he would have received it; and instead of going from one occupation to another, and making his life a mistake and a failure, he would have gone on to great usefulness and success.

You ask your father what you had better do: he will give you one kind of advice, he will advise you one style of occupation or profession, your mother will give you other advice, your sister other advice, while you will be in doubt as to whether you have physical endurance for this, or mental acumen for that, or tact for some other business. At such a time one needs to go to God. God built your body, and He knows what your physical endurance. God constructed your mind and He knows for what occupation you have particular adaptation. Go to Him and ask the question, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

I meet many young men in this house this morning who have not, perhaps, thoroughly decided upon the work or occupation for which the Lord has fitted them. Before you leave the house to-day ask God's direction that you may make no mistake. Blunder here and you blunder forever. You know a great many men who have been ruined for two worlds, because they got in the wrong business.

2. Another important pass in one's life, a turning-point in one's history, is

THE TIME WHEN HE ESTABLISHES HIS OWN HOME.

When a man builds his home, he builds for eternity. Is it not amazing that affiancing in life is so often a matter of merriment and of joke, when it decides so much for this world and the world to come? I do not put the case too strongly when I say that when a man marries he marries for heaven or for hell! Oh! build not your home on earth upon the sparkle of a bright eye or the color of a fair cheek. The time will come in your history when you will want in your home not a pet, or a toy, but a heroine, and you will find that life is not a gay romance, but a tremendous reality; and coming home from your store, or office, or shop, or factory, or studio, most of all you will need some one in your home with a face cheerful but sympathetic.

There is an aged man who looks back to a crisis in life when his fortune went away and reason almost left the throne. He knew not what to do. He remembers a particular evening when he came home from the store, he hardly dared break the news to the wife; he could not bear to tell her he had suspended in business, that he had stopped payment, that his fortune had gone. He went into the house, he closed the door upon the world, and in domestic peace found a foretaste of that heaven where panics never come. Ah! if it had not been for that help that you had, what would have been the result when you told her of your financial embarrassment and misfortune? She was cheerful, she was sympathetic, she was helpful, she helped you all through those dark days of trial, and after the piano went, she could sing without the accompaniment just as well as she ever sang with the accompaniment—

There have been Christian women who have so had their domestic troubles sanctified that they could get more music out of a Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machine than ever in the days of their prosperity they got out of a Chickering grand or a Steinway.

A Christian minister in England called upon a home of great destitution. There were the husband, the wife, and there were the children. No comfort in the household. Every thing indicative of want and struggle. The minister of the Gospel said to this young man: "Your mistake was in marrying so early. Do you not think that was the mistake of your life?" The man had been told that that had been the mistake of his life, before. The minister said: "It would have been a great deal better for you to have gone on and get something of a property before you entered into the marriage state. Don't you think it would have been better?" And then the man looked around, and his eyes filled with tears, and he looked to his poorly-clad wife and said: "No, sir; she's been the same to me all through."

Ah! there are some of you who would never have known what your homes were worth if trouble had not come. Perhaps your companion in life may have been too fond of the world and its gayeties; but one touch of misfortune turned her into a Miriam shouting the triumph on the banks of the Red Sea. If you have spoken of frivolity and fondness of display as the chief characteristics of woman, you may have to correct your mistake in some bitter pass of life, when, all other resources having failed, you are upheld by a wife's hand, suddenly armed of the Lord God Almighty for that emergency. Oh! in this tremendous pass of your earthly existence, cry unto God and ask His direction. Make a mistake here, and you make it forever. Walter Scott wrote something, half of which I do not like, for it is sarcastic, but the other half I do like, for it is so true:

> O woman! in our hours of ease,
> Uncertain, coy, and hard to please:
> When pain and anguish wring the brow
> A ministering angel thou."

lessed that home in which the newly-marrie couple dedicate their souls to Christ. Blesse the family Bible in which their names have jus been written. Blessed the hour of morning an evening prayer. Blessed the angels of God wh join wing tip to wing tip over that home, mak ing a canopy of light and love and blessednes It may be only yesterday that they claspe hands, but they have clasped hands forever The orange-blossoms may fail and the fragranc may die on the air; but they who marry i Christ shall walk together on that day when th Church, which is the Lamb's wife, shall take th hand of her Lord and King amid the swinging the golden censers.

3. Again I remark: It is a tremendous pa in life

WHEN A MAN COMES TO HIS FIRST GREAT SUCCESS.

You get in the cars some evening. Everybo that looks at you knows there has somethi glad happened. You sit down in the car, yo face illuminated, and a lady comes in. There no place for her to sit, and you get up with gre hilarity, and you say "Take my place," and s with great courtesy says, "I thank you," a everybody that sees you sees that great goo fortune has happened to you. What is the ma ter? Why, you have been taken into partne ship, or through a turn of business there h been some good-fortune happened to yo Now, that is your trial, that is your test ho At such a crisis a man says, "Now, what sh I invest in? what kind of a house shall I bu what shall be the library? what shall be my wardrobe? what shall I do with my money?"

At that point hundreds of men make a fatal mistake. Some go into dissipation. Some take on great arrogance, try to make everybody feel how small they are. Whole caravans of camels going through the needle's eye of their meanness. They walk through the street with an air as much as to say, "Get out of the way! here comes three hundred thousand dollars!" That is the crisis in life where so many fail, because they have no God to direct them.

There are men who before their success are kind and amiable and genial and useful who after their success are arrogant and unbearable and unchristian. Here is a man who was once very useful in society, but great success comes, and he gets in his equipage, and he drives on, he lashes the fiery steeds, he goes faster and faster, eight miles the hour, twenty miles the hour, one hundred miles the hour, faster and faster, until in his last moments he rouses up to find that he is drawn by the fiery hoofs of eternal disaster as they come clattering down on the pavement of hell. O young man, or man in mid-life! you want God in your great success, your first great success.

4. Another tremendous pass in our life is when we get

OUR FIRST SORROW.

It would be foolish for me to talk to the young men of this day as though their life was going to be smooth all the way. You might as well start a sea-captain in a vessel, without a carpenter and without any tools, and without any extra cordage. That would do very well while the sea was smooth, but when the ship gets caught in the teeth of a northeaster and the waves dash clear over the hurricane deck, then the captain cries out, "Where's the carpenter? where are the tools? where are the ropes?" The young men of this day would understand that I misrepresented the matter if I told them their life was always to be smooth. They know better. They know from what they see of the life of others that life cannot always be smooth. Many men came home from the late war without a scratch or a bruise; but in the conflict of life it is not so; we all get wounded—wounded in the head, in the hands, in the feet, in the heart.

LIFE IS A CONFLICT.

The Bible over and over again states that. Paul states it, and he writes himself as in a war with the world, a war with the flesh and a war with the devil, and war all the way through. Now, how are you going to meet the first trouble? That is the question. Show me how you are to meet your first trouble, and I will show you how you meet all the other troubles. It is the first blow that sends a man to drinking to drown his troubles, that knocks the fire out of him so he spends the rest of his life cowed down.

Who is that weigher in that large commercial establishment in New York? He once owned the store. Who is that underling in a large manufacturing establishment, getting one or two thousand a year? He once owned the factory, but misfortune came, the first blow brought him to the dust, and he never had the courage to rise. Oh, how important is the manner in which we receive the first sorrow!

Perhaps the first trouble is bereavement. I suppose you know—I suppose you have recognized the fact that so often the first-born is taken. I have seven brothers and sisters. Each one lost the first-born. And I suppose that in hundreds of cases in this house it was the first-born that was taken. Some people give what is to me a very absurd reason for that. They say it is because the child is loved too much. I do not think that is possible. I do not believe any father or mother ever loved a child too much. You cannot love your child too much. God did not take your child because you loved it too much. I think this is the reason why God so often takes the first-born: it is to transfer your affections to Heaven and make that place the more grand and blessed—at the beginning of your life making Heaven blessed, so that you keep thinking of that place, and so be elevated and lifted on toward it. I think that is the reason. Perhaps I am wrong. I am sure the other reason is wrong, that so many people give when they say it is because you love your child too much.

Now suppose the first trial comes and you have no God. What then? Have you ever tried to see one go through bereavement without any God? I have witnessed that sad spectacle. But we want grace, we want divine grace when bereavement comes into the home which erst was full of sunny locks and greetings at the door, and kisses flung by little hands from the window as you went down the front steps, and the doves in the nest cry because the hawk swoops, and the cheek pales, and the eyes close and the heart stops. Oh! to put away garments that never will be worn again, to gather up from the floor toys that never again will strew the carpet, and to go with a sense of suffocation through the desolated household that once rang with childish merriment—O my God! who can stand that without Thy grace to help, without Thy grace to soothe, without Thy grace to comfort? Oh! you will want Christ in your first trouble; whatever it is, whatever it may be, you will want Christ in your first trouble, and so I beg of you this morning to take Him as yours.

You say you are strong and well. So am I. You say that life is buoyant and beautiful. So it is to me. But sickness will come to you, and it will come to me. We will be told we cannot go out, the door will be closed against the world, there will be two watches, and some one will order silence on the stairs, saying: "Hush, hush!" and in your dream you will hear the dash of water which you will take to be the beating of the wave of the Jordan against your pillow, and you will hear a sound at the gate which you will take to be the pawing of the pale horse. Oh! then you and I will want a physician, a divine physician; we will want Christ to come in, and put His arms around us, and say, "Fear not, all is well—all is well."

5. But there is one more pass of great importance of which I must speak—one tremendous crisis, when we will want God. I say that not more to you than I do to myself. We will want God in that crisis. And that pass is

I suppose we all would like to expire at home. We want our friends in the room, some to recite the promises, some to sing, one to hold the hand. We want to look up in faces that have been familiar to us a good while, and we will have messages to give. If we are parents, we will want to tell our children how they ought to act when we are gone, what principles they ought to adopt, how near they ought to live to God.

And if we have aged parents living, we will want to tell our children how they ought to act toward the old people, how they ought to care for them after we are gone. I think when we leave this world we will all have a message to give to somebody. When that hour comes we will want Christ, we will want a divine friend to stand by us, and to say that all shall be well in the future. "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." But you know very well that if we go out of this world, my brother, without Christ, we take a leap into the dark. Have you ever read what the nobleman wrote to his friend—wrote on his dying bed to his friend?

writing to his friend, said: "I am throwing my last stake for eternity, and tremble and shudder for the important issue. O my friend! with what horror do I recall the hours of vanity we have wasted together; but I have a splendid passage to the grave. I die in state and languish under a gilt canopy. I am expiring on soft and downy pillows. My dependents sigh; my sisters weep; my father bends beneath the load of years and of grief; my lovely wife, pale and silent, conceals her inward anguish; my friend, who was as my own soul, suppresses his sighs and leaves me to hide his grief; but oh! which of them will bail me from the arrest of death? who will descend into the dark prison of the grave for me? Adieu, until me meet in the world of spirits."

Who would want to go out of the world like that, when he can go in triumph indescribable? Like Paul, saying, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me." Or that other battle shout: "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God, who giveth me the victory through my Lord Jesus Christ." Well, there are a good many men in this house who say, "What you have declared this morning is the truth, but I am so far gone in sin, there's no hope for me." O my brother! there you make a great mistake.

I stand here this morning to declare there is hope for any man who wants to come to God. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thought, and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy, and unto our God, who will abundantly pardon. Come, this morning. "Oh!" you say, "if you knew my history you wouldn't invite me." I do not care what your history; is come to God to-day. "Whosoever will." That word "whosoever" covers all cases of wandering, of iniquity. "Whosoever will, let him come." But says some one in the house: "I have started in the line of iniquity, and I am going on; I will risk the future; I haven't much faith in Christianity; I am going to have an easy time in this world, get all out of it I can, go into all kinds of sin, taking the risk for the future." Oh! will you not be diverted from that course? will you not now realize the fact that you want God? Oh! how much you need Him! It may take a great struggle to bring you back; but come back you may and you will; this morning some of you will. May God by His Holy Spirit move upon your heart!

I have sometimes heard people say it is as easy for them to become Christians as to turn their hands. Oh what a misrepresentation that is! It takes the blood. It is the mightiest struggle in all the world when a man who has been doing wrong tries to do right. It is a mightier struggle than I would ask any man to go into unless he lays hold of the strong arm of God, who will help him and who will deliver him.

Some years ago there was

some miles above Niagara Falls. There were many on the excursion, many passengers, and the boat floated on down toward the rapids; but the captain expected to return in time to avoid all danger, and they were laughing on the deck, when some one said to the captain, "Are you not going too far down?" He said, "No; I know what I am about." After a while he told the engineer to turn and go up stream; but lo! the captain found they were farther down toward the rapids than he thought for. He cried to the engineer, "Put on more steam!" More steam was applied, but still the steamer with its freight of life kept going on towards the rapids. The captain cried out to the engineer, "Put on more steam!" More steam was applied, but still the vessel made no headway up stream. The captain cried out, "Put on more steam, or we are lost!" The engineer said, "We can't put on any more steam; if we do, we'll blow the boat to atoms." "Put on more steam," cried the captain. More steam was applied and the vessel floated up and out into safety, and some fainted, and all were thankful that God has rescued them from so great peril. Oh! are there not some here to-day who are floating on down towards the rapids, aye, they are in the rapids going on towards the eternal plunge? Put back! In God's name, put back. You say it takes a greater struggle. Lay hold the oars with both hands, and pull, pull, if need be, until the blood starts, pull for Heaven. Now or never!

JANE JACKSON; or, THE BROKEN HEART.

By a Clergyman.

Another Visit to the Cottage—A picturesque Landscape—Intercourse with the Mother and Daughter—Called away by a Sister's Illness—Long Delay before revisiting the Jacksons.

PURSUING my conversation with Jane Jackson's father, I asked, "How long has she been back?" "Three weeks to-morrow, sir; but it ha' seemed more like three months, for she ha' done nothing but cough at nights, and cry all day long."—"Does her health seem to be much affected?" "Oh, yes, sir; very much. She ain't like the same creature. What life and spirit she had to be sure! and now she seems quite withered and broken up like—and I fear, sir, she ain't long for this world. Her mother wanted me to have a doctor to her, but she won't hear of that, and keeps on saying her cough, and the pain in her side, will soon be well."

Drawing out my watch, I perceived that the time had imperceptibly slipped away, and that unless I hastened home I should be too late for the evening service at R——. So adding a few simple words of comfort, and directing this poor man to bring his grief before the Lord, and seek His strength to enable him to bear it aright, I shook his weather-beaten hand, and left him, with a promise to call again on the morrow.

True to my promise, I set out on the following morning to keep my appointment at the cottage where poor Jane and her parents lived. The sun had risen with unclouded splendor, and would have been oppressive but for the fresh and cooling breeze which rippled the surface of the water, and came up charged with the healthy odor of seaweed.

I followed the course of the shore for about two miles, until I caught sight of a landmark I had noticed on the previous day, which indicated the direction of the cottage. And now commenced a difficult ascent of the steep and rugged cliffs before me, which I only surmounted by clinging to the patches of long grass and stunted shrubs which grew upon the edges. On gaining the summit I sat down to rest, and prepare myself for the interview before me.

I could not but be struck by the contrast between the peaceful scene which lay at my feet, and the mournful and desolate state of that home where the serpent-trail of sin had left such deadly impression. How humbling the comparison of nature's loveliness with man's deformity! The one as fresh and fair as when first it sprung from the hand of the Divine Workman, still mirroring His infinite perfections, and proclaiming, in the face of every jarring contradiction, the immortal truth that God is love; the other, with every trace of the Divine Architect effaced, exhibiting in endless succession the phases of a heart rotten at the core, a mind debased into hell, and a will perverted in its every channel.

With such chastened reflections as these, forced upon me by the still beauty of the scene, so strangely contrasting with the painful transition before me, I turned to fulfil my engagement at the cottage. Before doing so, however, I offered up a silent prayer for the Divine guidance, and for a blessing on that spiritual consolation which I desired to be made the humble instrument of communicating.

The door was opened for me by Jane herself, who informed me that her father had gone to work, leaving a civil message to account for his absence, and expressing a hope that I would step upstairs and see his wife, who had been for some months confined to her room with a paralytic stroke.

Before proceeding to comply with this request, I determined to avail myself of the present opportunity of speaking a few words in private to this erring and afflicted girl, whose looks might have afforded, even to a less practised eye, the premonitory symptoms of consumption. Avoiding as much as possible any allusion to the details of her sad history, which I saw must prevent her from listening to what I had to say with any degree of calmness, I endeavored to show her the heinousness of all sin, as committed against God, and the fearful condemnation resting upon those who have not repented of and forsaken their sins; pointing out, at the same time, the full and free salvation to be obtained through faith in Christ, and assuring her of a gracious reception and an abundant pardon if she would but seek it in the way appointed.

I concluded by requesting her to kneel with me in prayer, and join in repeating the words of the 51st Psalm. As I came to the part, "My sin is ever before me," I noticed her trembling with strong emotion, and before I could conclude she was sobbing violently. Thankful to perceive these traces of deep and tender feeling, I added a few words of kindly sympathy, offering, at the same time, to renew my visit for reading and prayer with her as opportunity offered, a proposal which she gratefully accepted.

At the close of our conversation she led the way to her mother's apartment, a tidy, cheerful little room overhead, commanding an extensive view of the sea. Though furnished in the most humble manner, there was evidently a care and tastefulness in the arrangements which showed a due regard to cleanliness and comfort.

Mrs. Jackson—for that was the name of the family—was a woman of much intelligence, and of pleasing appearance and manners. Her age was probably about sixty, although the traces of bodily infirmity and mental anxiety under which she was now laboring gave her a much older appearance. She was seated in a reclining posture near the window, with her Bible open before her. As I entered she laid it aside, and received me with much apparent cordiality and thankfulness.

"I hope, sir," she said, as she shook the hand which I offered her, "you will excuse me rising to speak to you. I'm so crippled in my limbs that I ain't able to stand or walk."

"I am sorry," I said, "to find you such a sufferer, but I see you have got the right medicine for all earthly sorrows and troubles—the Word of God."

"Ah, sir!" she replied, looking at me earnestly, "what should we do without that? I don't know where I could get comfort, now that my poor heart has been so broken, if I had not got that blessed Book to go to. Janie, dear," she said, turning to her daughter, who was leaving the room, "take your father's dinner to the farm; he won't be back till evening, as they be busy with the hay."

"Poor thing!" she added, as the door closed, "she will never be herself again;" and then, as if gathering eloquence from this allusion to her wrongs, she said, appealingly, "Oh, sir, she was my only child! I loved her as a mother only can love; and now see what she has come to."

The tears were already coursing down her pallid cheeks, and were dimming my own eyes, as I replied, "Yes, I know it all, and can fully sympathize with you. Your trial has been a dreadfully severe one, and yet you must not forget by whose providence it has been ordered. The time may come when you will see the mercy and the wisdom of this affliction, and when you will be able to say, even with regard to this stroke 'He doeth all things well.'"

"Oh, sir," she said, "if you can do any thing for my poor Jane—if you would pray with her, and try and lead her, as I have tried to do, to the Saviour of sinners, we may perhaps be happy together in another world."

"Yes," I said, "it will give me pleasure to see her often during my stay in R——; and, if I may judge from the way in which your daughter appeared to feel what I said to her this morning, there is good hope that this trouble may be greatly blessed to her, and that she may be led by it to seek her happiness in God."

"I hope she may, sir, I hope she may; but somehow I ain't comfortable about her. I don't think she looks at her sin as much as she do at the punishment. She frets as if her heart would break at being deceived, as she says, by one she had loved and trusted, and because she has brought this disgrace upon her home, but she don't seem to feel her sins as she ought."

"Yes," I said, "this is too often the case; but if, by depriving her of every other hope and comfort, God should at last lead her to yield her heart to Him we shall have reason to bless Him for this discipline, painful though it be."

At length I said, "I must be going, as I have several other engagements before me. I hope, however, in a day or two to see you again. In the mean time here are some little books and tracts which will be nice for your daughter to read, and may perhaps prevent her dwelling much on her troubles."

"Thank you, sir, and may the Lord bless you for your kindness to my child!"

As I left the cottage I looked forward with glad anticipation to further opportunities of bringing the consolations of the Gospel in all their healing efficacy to this desolate and afflicted home.

On reaching home I found a letter informing me of the sudden and alarming illness of a very dear and only sister, and requesting my immediate attendance. Overwhelmed with anxiety at this distressing intelligence, I had scarcely time to collect my thoughts and finish my arrangements before I took my seat in the train which was to bear me away from R——. It was not until I was actually on my way that my thoughts, which had been so painfully occupied, reverted to the dwelling which I had bu lately left; and I seemed to anticipate the surprise which my absence would occasion its inmates.

There was much in the circumstances whicl had led to my acquaintance with Jane Jackson' family to call forth my deepest interest, and t awaken my earnest desires to heal the ranklin wound which had just disturbed its peace wit the application of the Gospel remedy. It is a such times that hearts which are naturally inaccessible to religious influences may be easil won, and the soldier of Christ should be ever o the alert to take advantage of such favorable ci cumstances, in order to press home the grea truths of salvation.

This is one of God's usual methods for d stroying the outworks which bar the entrance His Spirit to the soul of man. In vain do H ministers sometimes attempt to scale the impe etrable fortress of the human heart, until, co passed with afflictions, the walls of pride and se love are razed to the ground, and the citadel the soul, thus exposed and vulnerable at eve point, fall an easy prey to the faithful minist of the Word. Strange that external influenc should be allowed such weight in the econor of Providence, and should become conducive such vast results! If it be true that "There a tide in the affairs of men, which taken at t flood leads on to fortune," it is equally true tl there are events in each of our lives which, if i proved, might, by God's blessing, result in salvation; and at such times it is remarka that the Holy Spirit often achieves the w without our instrumentality, as if to convi us that he that planteth and he that watereth alike nothing, but "God that giveth the crease."

God, who in His ordinary dealings loves work by means, shows Himself at times un tered by laws, and independent of the chann which He Himself has consecrated. This peculiarly the case with the subject of this n rative. Gladly would I have been the inst ment of imparting saving knowledge to wounded spirit; joyfully would I have rai this "bruised reed," and bound up this brol heart with the "exceeding precious promis of Divine forgiveness and reconciliation; an was no small part of my present trial that promised mission of usefulness had been t suddenly interrupted.

And though I indulged the hope of find

r sister so far recovered as to enable me to ren after a few days, there was an undefined ad upon my mind that I was hastening to at might prove the chamber of death. Avail-myself of a short detention on the road, I ote a few hasty lines to my friends at the cote, informing them of the occasion which ed for my abrupt departure, and expressing ope of seeing them again if my sister's health uld allow of my return to R——.

ly apprehensions were not unfounded; I was ch shocked at the change which had taken ce in my beloved sister's appearance, and the timony of her medical man soon prepared me the worst. For five weeks I watched over with painful anxiety, marking the startling al-nations of her symptoms, which by turn elicithope and fear. At length the ransomed spirit, ich had been so long hovering between earth heaven, took its flight, and passed away to the company of the just made perfect.

After my sister's death, I had to return to my ish without revisiting R——, and thus lost opportunity of visiting the Jacksons' cote; a circumstance which gave me much pain,
I had too much reason to believe that pasto-visitation occupied but a small share of their rgyman's attention. I failed not, however, inform him of the peculiar circumstances at-ding this case, and mentioned that my inter-urse with the family had been suddenly arrested my abrupt departure, adding that, from what I d been able to gather, it would be a great com-t to them to receive the visits of their minis-
, and that the opportunity appeared to be st favorable for the inculcation of Divine
th. It was not until the next year that I had opportunity of seeing Jane Jackson again.

AREER OF THE COMING MAN OF SIN.

By the late Rev. Capel Molyneux.

e Man of Sin will be a Literal Man—He will ossess Supernatural Powers—His Companion he False Prophet—He will Delude Israel—He will make a Covenant with Them and Break It—
His Destruction—1. His Individual Humanity—
2. His Character and Assumption—3. His Supernatural Constitution—4. His World-wide Influence—5. The Duration of His Reign and Power.

WHEN Israel shall be partially restored to Paltine, dwelling at peace in their rebuilt cities d villages, a man, emphatically denominated, d emphatically being the MAN OF SIN, will pear; he will be a literal man, an individual man being, energized by Satan and possessed erefore of supernatural powers, urged with arvellous pretensions (2 Thess. 2). He will be companied by another individual, a false pro-et, and this false prophet will cause an image be made to the Man of Sin, which image will made to speak, and be almost universally orshipped (Rev. 13: 11–18).

By flatteries and address he will ingratiate mself with the world at large, and be recognized d obeyed as the great head of the Gentile na-ons. Israel also will be deluded by his seducon and lying wonders, and receive him for a ason as the promised Messiah. Thus received d recognized, he will make a covenant for a eek of seven years with Israel, which stands for ree and a half years, but at the close of that alf-week he will work deceitfully, break the ovenant, and become their deadly enemy (Dan-l 9: 27).

At this time—the time when he breaks the ovenant—he will set himself up in the temple f God at Jerusalem, showing himself that he is od, arrogating the very perfections, attributes, nd glory of God, and claiming universal homge and adoration. He will then commence a ystem of persecution against Israel, and all in e world who refuse to acknowledge his pretenons, unprecedented in the history of man, hich terminates at last in what is called "Ja-ob's trouble," or, "the great tribulation"
Jerem. 30:7; Dan. 12:1; Matt. 24:21; Rev.
: 14).

About this time, and while these persecutions are raging, two other remarkable individuals will appear, denominated "the witnesses." They will be just what their name imports—Witnesses; but witnesses for God and His cause against Antichrist and his cause. They will complete their testimony and accomplish their work during the latter three and a half years, and, having so done, will be overcome by Antichrist and put to death. They will lie dead for three and a half days, and then will rise up on their feet, and ascend up in a cloud to heaven (Rev. 11: 3–13). About the same time, or immediately afterwards, there will be a gathering of all nations, under Antichrist their head (for the nations will cleave to him though Israel at last reject him), against Israel and Jerusalem, in order to the siege of the city, the accomplishment of the battle of Armageddon, and the events of the great day of God Almighty. At the close of this battle the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, will personally appear in power and great glory, to overwhelm with utter destruction Antichrist and his host, and take to Himself the kingdoms of this world forever and ever (Zech. 14, Rev. 19, Ezek. 39).

I will now proceed to elucidate some points in regard to the Coming Man of Sin.

1. His individual humanity. He will be an individual human being.

Taking the Bible as our guide, it really seems strange that any other idea should be entertained of him. All the passages referring to the Man of Sin, his character, his actings, and his end, with one accord proclaim him to be an individual man. All the attributes, circumstances, as well as appellations of individual humanity, are addressed and ascribed to him. He is distinctly called and declared to be a man, "that Man of Sin" (2 Thess. 2: 3), which itself, and in the absence of any positive contradiction to it elsewhere in Scripture, ought to be conclusive; or if not, it is difficult to know on what principle we are to understand the Bible, and arrive at fixed conclusions at all about its meaning.

In Rev. 13: 18, again, he is called a man: "Here is wisdom. Let Him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six." Also he is called "the son of perdition" (2 Thess. 2: 3); and so was Judas, but Judas was a man, and the natural inference is, that such also will be his antitype. John says (1 John 2: 18), "Ye have heard that Antichrist (or, as it ought to be rendered, the Antichrist (shall come, even now there are many Antichrists." But who were these many Antichrists? Who but men—Christ-denying, ungodly men—but men! And who, then, or what would be the Antichrist yet to come, but a man too? Also he is denominated the "vile person" (Dan. 11: 21), than which no clearer assertion of individuality could well be made.

But, in fact, that Antichrist would be an individual man was never questioned in the first and purer ages of the Church; no other opinion then obtained or existed on the matter. The idea of a power or system, or even series of individuals, being symbolized by the Man of Sin was utterly unknown. This sprang up in after ages, not from clearer understanding or closer investigation of the prophetic word, but from straining the prophetic word to meet the circumstances of the times.

2. His character and assumption.

A few quotations out of the multiplicity with which Scripture abounds on this point must suffice. Daniel's description of Him as "a king of fierce countenance" (viii. 23: 24) shows that he will be a king of vast knowledge and mighty power, but not his own; it will be derived from Satan; he will persecute the holy people, Israel, and destroy them wonderfully; he stands up at last, magnifying himself in his heart against the Prince of princes, but is broken without hand,—because destroyed by that Prince, even by the brightness of His coming.

Again, mark his assumption, as portrayed Daniel 11: 36, "And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that, that is determined, shall be done." Isâiah 14: 9–14, is also particularly deserving our notice here. What a description is given in the ninth and following verses, contemplating indeed his descent, and reception, into hell, but describing his character and assumption, which will have made his entrance thither so notorious.

And to the same effect we read (2 Thess. 2), "Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." We need no more to demonstrate His character, or His assumption; inconceivable this! were it not written—but so it is written, and so it shall be—"He as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

The "temple of God" is the term applied in the Bible to the temple at Jerusalem, and never to any other building, such as St. Peter's at Rome. And that temple is to be built again; and inside it the Man of Sin will sit, and in awful and daring assumption "exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped."

3. His supernatural constitution.

The assumption of the Man of Sin, daring and blasphemous as it is, is, however, little to be wondered at, when we remember not only who he is, but what he is, and whence his power and energy are derived. Antichrist, though a mortal human being, an individual man, will be no common mortal, no ordinary man. A terrible peculiarity belongs to him. In addition to the sinful nature common to man, in him will dwell and operate all that can be communicated of the evil and energy of Satan; "whose coming," says Paul, "is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders" (2 Thess. 2). Moreover, it is stated that the dragon—the devil—will give the Antichrist "his power, and seat, and great authority" (Rev. 13: 2). And it is evident that "the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet" (Rev. 16: 13) will be a blasphemous parody of the Trinity of heaven.

4. His world-wide influence.

In Daniel 7: 21–25, and Rev. 13: 16, we read that he is to prevail against the saints everywhere, and that all but God's elect are to be seduced by him, and the whole world to bow to his yoke.

The "abomination of desolation" will be the literal image of Man of Sin which will be set up in the rebuilt Jewish temple at the beginning of the final three and a half years, and will be the sequel for the commencement of universal persecution and desolation.

5. The duration of his reign and power?

Daniel's last week of the seventy weeks (9: 27) in connection with Antichrist determines this point. His career seems to last, in a certain sense and degree, for that whole week, or seven years. At the beginning he makes a covenant with Israel and is received by them, which implies considerable influence and dominion; but his great power and kingly assumption must be supposed to date from the middle of the week—when he breaks with Israel and sets himself up in the temple—and to continue to the end.

The three and a half years, as the duration of his great power, is determined also by other passages; in Rev. 13: 5, it is declared "power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." In Rev. 12: 6, the woman is sustained in the wilderness for the same period, which implies her persecution by Antichrist during his power; and in Rev. 11: 2, the holy city, Jerusalem, is also represented as trodden under foot forty and two months, the same period again.

After the close of that three and a half years, Antichrist will be destroyed at the personal descent of Christ at the battle of Armageddon.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week, and the American readers of his sermons, by helping to circulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be co-operating in rendering assistance to these institutions. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American pnblic."

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Our readers will share our regret that Mr. Joseph Spurgeon, the Manager of the office of this journal, has returned to England on urgent domestic affairs. Remittances should therefore be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Hayes' letter to General Merritt, congratulating him on the confirmation of his appointment by the Senate to the collectorship of New York, has just been published. In it the President states his desire that General Merritt will make no unnecessary changes amongst the officials, and especially hopes that no one will be discharged simply because he happened to be a friend of the late collector; and that in making new appointments, regard may be paid to the business qualifications of the candidate, and that recommendations from any quarter, even from the White House, will not be allowed to weigh in favor of any one, but that all appointments will be made exclusively with a view of promoting the efficiency of the public service. Truly a much-needed reform this, and one that might advantageously be extended to other departments of Government.

Mr. Tilden's evidence before the committee appointed to investigate the cipher telegrams has given rise to a great difference of opinion. He swore positively that he was utterly ignorant of the negotiations to purchase the presidential votes of Florida and South Carolina. He never saw the telegrams to Col. Pelton, or a translation of them, till they appeared in the Tribune. They were delivered at his residence to his nephew, Col. Pelton, but personally he knew nothing of them. He knew that the votes of the two States were for sale, but he was resolved that if the presidency went by auction, he "for one would not be amongst the bidders."

This evidence is naturally considered in the light it casts on the chances of the next presidential election. The Democratic party believe that Mr. Tilden has cleared his character, and that he is secure of the nomination, and will be the strongest candidate the Democratic party can put forward. The Republican party, on the other hand, contend that Mr. Tilden's evidence places him on the horns of a dilemma. If his evidence is true, they urge, it shows that Mr. Tilden has displayed a want of care and watchfulness which proves him unfit to be intrusted with the responsibilities of the presidency. If he was unable in his own house to prevent members of his own family plotting and compromising him, he would be in a much worse plight at the White House, which is naturally the focus of political plotters; and as he could not take care of himself and his own interests when he was only a candidate, he would inevitably fall a victim to fraud and duplicity when exposed to the wiles of those who would assail him as president. The other horn of the dilemma is, that if his evidence was false, and he knew of the negotiations and sanctioned them, or connived at them, he planned a gross fraud against his country and blundered in its execution, and is therefore unworthy of the high position to which he aspires.

The feeling of Christian men on the subject is one of profound sorrow that any party in the State should have plotted so gigantic a fraud, and while charges and counter-charges are bandied about from one side to the other, the godly man looks anxiously for the time when Jesus shall appear to rule "the earth in righteousness and the people with equity."

Among the records of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting for the past week are the following instances of God's prayer-answering faithfulness:

A friend rose to thank God for answering prayers offered in this room some time since. His son-in-law, a useful Sabbath-school worker, was sick, and laid aside from his work. The physician said it was only a case of a few months, and then the young man must die. Friends turned from the physicians to God. A day was set apart for prayer in his behalf. Friends in this room, friends in Colorado, and others in Jersey, and others in Bristol, England, prayed specially on that day. God heard those prayers, and to the astonishment of the medical men, the young man is fast recovering.

"God does hear prayer," said an old sea-captain. "He heard my prayer when I sought mercy, but not till I gave up the world and forsook the service of the devil did I get the answer to my prayer and know that my soul was saved. God heard prayer for my son. He died recently, but ere he died he was brought to Jesus. God is hearing prayer for my other son too, and he is under deep conviction of sin. Hallelujah to God!"

The leader said he was under great obligation to the meeting, for the prayers they had repeatedly offered in behalf of his mission work in Brooklyn. He was under greater obligation to God, however, for having answered those prayers. For two months his church, small though it was, had been greatly revived. The work was such that he did not know when it was going to stop; he hoped never. God had brought about some wonderful cases of conversion, and all this was in answer to prayer.

Is this a civilized community? might be a not inappropriate question by a foreigner visitin New York, who read in the New York Heral of Monday a description of the particulars o thirteen cock-fighting contests, held at New town, L. I., last week, probably on Saturda night. The "sport," as it is called, was between the two Long Island counties, Kings an Queens. It begun at ten o'clock in the evening and lasted until six o'clock in the morning, th betting on both sides being very heavy Twenty-eight birds were engaged in it, and al were either killed or horribly maimed. Thes things are a disgrace to any people.

A new sect of Mormons has sprung up i Southern Indiana, and two evangelists of Latte Day Saints are preaching there. The peculia tenets of this wing of Mormonism are ant Polygamy, healing by the laying on of hand immersion, the second coming of Christ in th near future, intervention of God in tempor and spiritual affairs, and belief in miracles spiritual providence in the interests of the saint The sect numbers about sixty members in Floy Washington, and Clark counties, made up of r spectable farmers.

A sad story has recently been told in th garret of a house in Twenty-seventh Street, Ne York. It cannot be too widely published, f young people may learn from it that the end sin is disgrace and death. A young lady, bare over twenty years of age, died in that garret, a she concluded the relation of her sad histo with her dying breath.

She was the daughter of respectable and pio parents, who occupied a farm at Northport, Lo Island. In this quiet retreat, embosomed trees and rural beauty, she passed her ea years and received a careful religious trainin Three years ago she formed the acquaintance a fellow, having the manners and appearance a gentleman, whose name was Cosgrove, a who, though living in Brooklyn, was at that ti visiting Northport. He took advantage of t girl's innocence and affection for him to betr her, and when the result became known brou her to New York and consigned her to one the vile dens of the city. There she gradua sank, and intelligence having reached the pol of the circumstances, they raided the house a found the poor girl, neglected and alone, dyi She had only sufficient strength to tell what career had been and then expired. The keep of the den and young Cosgrove have been rested and held to bail. When will the you daughters of our land learn "That the end the of are the ways of death"? (Proverbs 14 : 1

The attendance at the special meetings h by the Rev. Dr. Tyng at the Church of Reformation, Stanton Street, near Essex, is creasing in a very encouraging proportion. importance of this evangelical enterprise can easily be estimated. Christian friends who in sympathy with such a movement—especi those in the vicinity—should aid it by their p ence and co-operation.

Contempt for aristocratic titles was humorously displayed by President Lincoln in an interview with an Austrian count who applied to him for a position in the army. Being introduced by the Austrian Minister, he needed, of course, no further recommendation; but, as if fearing that his importance might not be duly appreciated, he proceeded to explain that he was a count; that his family were ancient and highly respectable; when Lincoln, with a merry twinkle in his eye, tapping the aristocratic lover of titles on the shoulder in a fatherly way, as if the man had confessed to some wrong, interrupted in a soothing tone, "Never mind, you shall be treated with just as much consideration for all that!" Likewise in the service of the King of kings will the humble and devout follower who consecrates his life to his Master be honored as highly as the most illustrious of the world's potentates. "There are last which shall be first, and the first last" when He cometh in His kingdom.

Revivals are now in progress in the neighborhood of Madison, N. J., and the students of Drew Theological Seminary are taking an active part in the work.

Mr. Castles, who has just returned from Middletown, N. Y., reports that, since the week of prayer, meetings of this nature have been conducted at the St. Paul's M. E. Church, in that town. Great results have come of the efforts put forth by those who had charge of the services; many persons have turned into the path of righteousness, and have found peace in believing. One interesting feature of these meetings is, that a number of those who found peace are of an advanced age.

The work is still in progress, and the Lord's arm is being made manifest; it is His work, and therefore must prosper. The pastor, Dr. Wardle, was also assisted by Mr. Samuel Halsted, of New York, and Rev. W. S. Boulton, pastor of Grace Church, Newburgh.

Revival work at Rossville, Staten Island, N. Y.—Rev. S. D. Jones, pastor of the St. John's M. E. Church at Rossville, has for the past three weeks held protracted meetings which have resulted in a great awakening interest among the members of the church, as well as in the conversion of many precious souls. He has had the assistance of three students from Drew Theological Seminary, Rev. Thos. H. Oakes from India, Rev. Henry C. Langley of Colorado, and Rev. Gustave Laas, of Syracuse, N. Y. The meetings were attended by the entire community, and a great feeling of interest has been manifested. Over twenty conversions have already resulted from the meetings, and many sinners are inquiring the way to be saved. Prayer is solicited by the friends engaged in the work for a continued outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

The conversion of a Chinaman who first heard the Gospel through a hole in the wall, is thus described in the reports of the China Inland Mission, of which Mr. Hudson Taylor, of London, is the manager: A native preacher of the Mission was speaking in a hall in China from the words, "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He spoke of the love of God, and spoke of God as a Father delighting to save, and delighting to welcome sinners. A Chinaman, who was present from curiosity, afterwards in his own home repeated the words which he had heard from the preacher, mimicking and perhaps exaggerating his gestures. In the next house to the one in which this mocker lived there was a young man, an orphan, at work. He was a worker in cotton. There was a very thin partition between the two houses, only a few boards, and those boards were not very close to each other, and many of the knots had dropped out. Hearing a good deal of laughter in the adjoining house, the young man got up from his work and first put his eye to a whole in one of the boards. He saw the people highly amused, and laughing exceedingly while the young man was gesturing and repeating something to them.

The same hole which had served for the eye next served for the ear, and he listened; and as he listened the words that he heard struck a cord that responded in the heart of that fatherless and motherless young man. "Oh," he thought, "that I had a Father! Oh that I had some one to welcome me and to give me rest of heart!" And when the speaker stopped he put his mouth to the same hole, and shouting through it said, "Tell us more of these good words." This caused increasing laughter. But he was not to be daunted. He went outside and ascertained where these words had been heard. He found his way to the chapel, and was converted to God. He has since suffered very much persecution. During the following winter he was put to perhaps the most severe trial he was capable of. After patient endurance of much ill-usage, the people he lived with, and whom he had long served—as Jacob did with Laban—for a wife, determined to bring matters to a crisis.

He was called up one night and told that he must either give up his hopes of marriage, and all his labor, or Christ. By God's grace he was faithful. He was further told that he must either there and then give up his home and be thrust shelterless and moneyless into the snow or give up Christ; but God's grace triumphed. He was thrust out, heard the doors barred, saw the lights put out, felt the cold sleet penetrate his thin garments, and had no refuge but God. He cried to Him, and not in vain. He got shelter elsewhere, and a week or two later the family found they could not do without him, and, after trying again in vain to induce him to renounce Christ, they took him back, and there has since arisen hope of the conversion of several of the members of the family. The Gospel proves in China, as elsewhere, still to be the power of God unto salvation.

A Husband's Society.—A lady was once asked how she could be happy so far away from all her old friends and relations, away from the privileges of the city and its pleasures, in a small country village. "Well," she said, "I once thought I never could live here, it looked to be such a dull, lonely place, and so little society; but now I am married I can live anywhere so long as I have my husband with me." So will it be with the true Christian. Wherever our Husband Jesus is, there will heaven be, even if not one other friend is there, and there were no other source of happiness there. "Thy Maker is thy husband" (Isaiah 54: 5).

Garrison Fare.—A thoughtful scholar of a generation that is passing away was once asked if he would take some bread and a glass of wine. His answer was, "No; I will take some bread and a glass of water." His friend smilingly answered, "Bread and water—that is prison fare." —"No," said he, "not prison fare, but garrison fare,"—and, dear friends, it is garrison time down here. We can't afford to be off. Our watch, not keeping a constant lookout for dangers that are very real and imminent. "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!"

In the Episcopal Church in Mexico the little company of sixty disciples has now become 7000, with 3500 communicants. Over 500 children are under instruction in different parts of Mexico, and there are also eleven theological students.

An English journal makes a suggestion for the evangelization of the world by this generation. The conversion of the world, or of a single soul, is beyond the Church's power, but its evangelization is quite practicable, and could easily be accomplished were there a tithe of the energy and enterprise in the Church to do the will of God that there is in the world to carry out the inventions of men. To preach the Gospel of the Kingdom to all nations would probably cost less in men and money, skill and labor, than to connect all nations by the electric telegraph.

Mr. Moody is now in Baltimore preparing some new sermons for next season's work. He is not sure where he will go on leaving that city—he may perhaps visit Cleveland, where a tabernacle has been built in anticipation of his coming.

EVERY MAN'S NECESSITY.

A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Ye must be born again."—JOHN 3: 7.

Regeneration an Urgent Need—I. The New Birth a Most Thorough Change—Not a mere Change of Opinion—1. A New Life—2. A New Experience—3. A New World—4. A New Force—II. A Most Wonderful Change—1. WHEN men are perishing all around you it would be cruel to waste time in attempting to interest their minds or to amuse their fancies. We must do something more practical, and give earnest heed to their pressing necessities. Is it famine which slays them? Let us feed them. Is it cold? Let us supply them with covering. Is it disease? Let us administer medicine. When the case is urgent we confine ourselves to necessaries, and attend with our whole heart to that which must have our attention. That which may be can wait, but that which must be demands our immediate care. Now, the spiritual needs of men are urgent, and among them the most pressing is their regeneration: they must be born again, or they are lost. Therefore, at this time, we will dwell on this topic and give it our whole consideration, letting other interesting matters wait till this most weighty business is happily over. This is a must, and we must press it upon you at once with our whole heart.

Our earnest desire is for a great ingathering of souls to the garner of salvation, but in order to this they must be born again. We have had many of you hovering round about us like birds around the fowler, but you are not as yet taken in the Gospel net; this state of things cannot content us; we want to see you decided for Christ, and truly born again. You have been hearers long, but, alas! you remain hearers only, and are not "doers of the word." We mean that the fault shall not lie with us; if you continue unsaved it shall not be because we have not preached the Gospel and kept to preaching it, and preached it as a matter of life and death. Again, then, do we aim at the one point, the point of absolute necessity—"Ye must be born again." We trust that if one arrow does not reach the mark another may; at any rate, we will continue driving at the one target—the conversion of your souls. Oh you who as yet have not been brought to know the Lord, may the Holy Spirit guide the arrow at this hour!

And now we will have a little simple talk about the great experience called regeneration, or the new birth, without which no man can see the kingdom of heaven, much less enter it.

A THOROUGH CHANGE.

I. And we shall remark concerning it in the first place that the change which is wrought in us by the new birth is MOST THOROUGH: "Ye must be born again." A new birth is the most sweeping and entire process conceivable. It is, in fact, more than a change, it is a creation. Regeneration is a great deal more than reformation of life, or a becoming religion; for it is not "Ye must be washed, ye must be improved, ye must be elevated;" but "ye must be born." It is not enough that the present life, as already possessed, should be renovated, that the existing nature should receive fresh vigor and new tone, but "ye must be born again:" a new life must be received, and no improving the present life will suffice in its stead.

It is a great deal more also than any change of opinion. I am always afraid of those persons who glory in being converted from one set of religious opinions to another. The best converts to a church are those who are brought into it from the world: those who migrate from other sections of Christianity are not often the most valuable acquisitions. Sometimes, like the convicts, who leave their country for their country's good, they benefit their party best by leaving it, and do not come to the newly-adopted section of the church as an unmixed gain.

The text says not "Ye must change your opinions, and drink in new notions," but "Ye must have a new nature; ye must be born again." Notions may be altered again and again, and yet the man may be no nearer being a child of God; but let the nature be changed by the Holy Spirit, and then the matter is accomplished. This it is, and nothing short of this, that can land a man in heaven; he must become a new creature in Christ Jesus.

The process of the new birth is so thorough that it is a great deal more than an alteration of a man's way of thinking, even upon the best of topics. A man may now think it his duty to be religious, whereas once he was debauched; he may now conceive it to be his duty to be sober, whereas before he was drunken; he may feel it his duty now to be diligent, whereas before he was a sluggard; but all these put together would not amount to a new birth. We rejoice in reformation of any sort. The less sin there is in the world the better, but, for all that, the vital point will not have been reached with all the alterations of thought, and even of life, of which a man is capable; for the text remains in force after all the renovations, conversions, and reformations that are possible to unaided flesh and blood, and it cries with stern, unchanging voice, "Ye must be born again."

1. Do not the words evidently mean that a new nature must be created in us? For a life, a nature is the production of a birth. At a birth there comes into the world a life which was not there before. There must come into us a new life to which by nature we are perfect strangers; something far beyond that which belongs to us as we are born after the flesh, a life that was not latent in the infant, to be gradually developed in the training of the child, but a life which is altogether absent till divine grace implants it there. "Ye must be born again"—ye must be created again, or as the Scriptures say, "Begotten again unto a lively hope." The life within you must be as fresh a creation as was the light when God spoke it, or as the world when God formed it out of nothing. A work of divine power must be exercised upon you equal to that which raised the Lord Jesus from the dead and gave Him glory.

2. With a new life in the matter of our ordinary birth there begins a new experience. To the new-born child every thing is new. Every pain, every sensation of pleasure, is all novel to him—he has known nothing of all this before. And though we may have attained to manhood, or even to old age, when we are born again the spiritual life is all a fresh experience. There are new feelings of contrition, there is a new faith, there is a new joy, a new hope, every thing is new—"Old things have passed away, and all things have become new."

Though the man may have traversed many paths, and experienced many sensations, yet the moment he is born again he is a stranger in a strange land, and he is led in a way which he knows not, and in paths which he has not seen. All young souls just born to God, however old they may be as to the bodily reckoning, rejoice in the sacred novelty of the new life, and they thank and bless God who has put His hand a second time to the work and quickened them into newness of life.

3. Now, as there is a new life, and a new nature, and a new experience, so is there to the child born and the man regenerated a new world. It is all new to the child—its brothers and sisters surprise it. When it is taken into the open air, and sees the green fields for the first time, it marvels at them. To the little one every thing is fresh. It lives in a museum, it is surrounded with wonders. Even the toys which grown-up people look upon with so much contempt are quite marvels to the little one, it is charmed with them all.

Now, a Christian, a man born again, lives in a new world. It is all new to him now, as I remember to have heard a young girl say when first she found the Saviour. When she came to confess her faith in Christ she said, "Either I am altogether changed, or else the world is:" and I could not help telling her I hoped it was both—I hoped she herself was changed, and that this change had produced the other, so that all things had become new. There is a new heaven and a new earth reserved for us by and by, and even now, while we are in this world, it is no longer to us what it is to the carnal man.

4. Note that every birth brings into operation a new force. A new worker is born; he is feeble as yet, but those little feet will yet be strong for running, and those tiny hands will yet become dexterous at some useful craft. And so, when a soul is born to God it feels a new power within, and itself becomes a new force. It is obedient to a power which it never recognized before, and a power is put forth from it which it had not been able to exercise before, and did not even understand. A new power has come among men when another soul is born to God: the spiritual world is stronger, and the carnal world is all the weaker for the birth of another spiritual man.

A MOST WONDERFUL CHANGE.

II. In the second place it is most wonderful. It is most wonderful in the sense of mystery—1. As to the manner of it. It is not easy to preach from this text and attempt to go minutely into details; for, if we did so, we might venture too far. I have read treatises upon the subject which were far too destitute of delicacy, and calculated to disgust rather than to impress. We do not pry and must not pry into a divine secret. "Thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

Who shall know how the Holy Ghost works? That He works by means of the word of God we know; that He blesses the truth read in a book or heard from the minister—this we know; but how it is He enters into the heart, how it is He creates a spirit within us, how He begets in us the spiritual life—who shall tell but God only?

2. It is a mystery as to the supernaturalness of the operation, for evermore true regeneration is always supernatural. There is no doubt that moral suasion does much with men, that the influence of association will often improve men's manners and habits; that great results may flow from education, especially if it be of the right kind; and that much may be developed in mankind that is admirable, honest, lovely, and of good repute. But this is nothing to the purpose, since it is not what our Saviour meant—it falls short of the new birth, and is indeed quite another thing.

The Holy Spirit, the third person in the blessed Trinity, must as much come to work upon us as God came forth to work upon this world in its creation, or else we are not born again. It is not enough that we of our own selves and in the energy of our old nature begin to pray, repent, and so on; for all that which can come of our flesh will still be flesh; but in regeneration it is the Spirit who begins by infusing the life, and then the new nature begins to pray and repent. That which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and hence the new birth must be a spiritual operation in order to produce that spiritual nature without which we cannot see and enter into the things of God.

3. This work is wonderful because of the grandeur of the relationship into which it introduces us. The child that is born has a father from the very fact of its birth, and we that are born from above cry "Abba, Father," from the very fact that we are regenerated. Adoption gives us the rights of children, but regeneration alone gives us the nature of children. Because we are sons God sendeth forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, whereby we cry "Abba, Father."

If I have been born again, no matter what my station in life or position in society, then God is my Father, and it follows that Jesus Christ is my brother; and this not merely in form and in name, as men call each other brethren when there is no actual relationship, but there is a real relationship between us and Christ Jesus and the divine Father, for we are made "partakers of the divine nature." We are the sons of God, and if sons of God, then are we brethren of Christ. It must be so, and it follows from this that, if children, then heirs, and if Christ is the heir, we are joint-heirs with Him.

My brethren, what privileges spring out of the relationship which arises from the new birth, for our Father then pledges Himself for our support, for our comfort, for our education, for all that is necessary for our perfection in the day of the home-bringing when we shall see Him face to face. What can happen to a man so great as to be born again? Suppose some of the poorest of the earth who have swept the streets for a paltry pittance should suddenly be elevated by royal favor to the peerage, or imagine that by some revolution of the wheel of providence they should become emperors and kings themselves; yet what of that? The change would be extraordinary, and men would wonder at it; for the passages in history which have been thought most noteworthy have been those wherein paupers have mounted from the dunghill to the throne, and fishermen have cast aside their rough garments to put on the imperial purple. But these strides from nothingness to greatness are inconsiderable and trifling compared with rising from being a slave of Satan to become a son of God.

A MOST MANIFEST CHANGE.

III. Now, let us remark, in the third place, that, wonderful and mysterious as the new birth must always be, it is MOST MANIFEST. The house knows when a child is born. There are mysteries surrounding its birth, but the fact is apparent enough. You shall soon hear its cry in the nursery, and erelong its prattle in the parlor; you shall see the joy of the parents as they clasp their offspring, and the care with which they watch for its good. So in the new birth, we know not how the Spirit works, but we know that He does work, and we soon see that a marvellous change has come over those whom He has made possessors of the heavenly seed, creatures of the new life.

Those who know converted persons best are among the first to perceive the transforming miracle of grace. Do you not think that Elstow knew when John Bunyan had found the Saviour? The bell-ringers knew it, there was n more Sabbath-breaking: and the few poor, godly people that used to meet at Bedford knew it for he crept into their midst and began to as them about the things which had become th delight of his soul.

We sometimes hear of a person being bor again and not knowing it—a somewhat singula matter. Yet I suppose that such an event, afte a fashion, very commonly happens in the Episcopalian denomination, because if persons ar born again in infant baptism there are thousand in London who have undergone the change, bu I am sure that they cannot be sure of it, for thei own lives would not tell them so, and their ow emotions and feelings would not lead them t any such belief. Regeneration is a poor bus ness if these baptized rebels are regenerat Why, at that rate, our prisons swarm with r generated thieves, and our streets are infeste with regenerated harlots, and occasionally w have regenerate murderers—all born again i their baptism, and made children of God, men bers of Christ, and inheritors of the kingdom heaven. The lie is sickening: the devil himse laughs at it.

Of all transparent falsehoods surely that baptismal regeneration is the grossest. It is marvel that men who live and walk among sa persons should ever fall into it. Ah! sirs, whe the true heaven-given life is found there is som thing to show for it.

The heavenly life is very manifest: and it all the more so from the fact that there are c tain signs which always attend and attest t new birth. Persons may be born again, and yet hey may not be able to see with us in certain points of doctrine; but there are some things which all the regenerate agree about.

For first, every soul that is born again repents f its sin. If a man lives in his sin as he used o do, he must not pretend that he is a twice-born man, or he will mightily deceive himself. f he can look upon sin in the same light as he did before, if he can find pleasure in it, yea, if he does not unfeignedly turn from it with loathng and seek the mercy of God to blot it out, he knows nothing of what regeneration is.

Again all the regenerate have faith: they all gree in finding all the sole ground of their hope n the blood and merit of Jesus. Meet them nywhere and they will tell you they have no confidence except in the Saviour's precious blood; he is all their salvation and all their deire. They rest upon this rock, every one of hem; and no matter what high professors they may be, nor what lofty offices they hold in the church, if Christ is not their one and only trust, hey know not what it is to be born again.

In addition to this all that have passed from death unto life pray. If it really rises from the heart, prayer is an infallible mark of the new birth; and if it can be said of a man "He does not pray," then he is still dead in his sins, the Spirit of God has not renewed his soul. I might mention some other holy signs which are nvariable accompaniments of the new birth, but hese three will suffice for all practical purposes. You can test yourselves, beloved, by them. Have you repented? Have you faith towards God? Do you rejoice to draw near to God in prayer? If these things be in you they are marks of the new life, for they were never yet found in the spiritually dead.

Do you groan over sin? A corpse does not groan: gracious mourning over transgression is one of the surest proofs of inward spiritual ife. Trust in Jesus is an equally clear sign of spiritual life, for the dead man does not know what it is to trust; and genuine prayer is equaly a certain token of life received from above. A pang of penitential grief, a thought of holy trust, and a yearning of inward prayer are more than all the unregenerate upon earth can compass, even though they should be doctors of divinity or cardinals of the church.

This new life, the new birth, is a very manifest thing from the power that it puts into men after it has had time to develop itself. At first converts are trembling and weak, but if they have received the new life they gather strength, and there is a power in it which the church soon rejoices in, and which the devil trembles at. This power of course can be kept under restraint by unbelief and other follies, but it ought to have full range, and should never be repressed.

I read the other day of a good Bible Christian brother who sometimes, when his heart was merry within him with joy in the Holy Ghost, would even leap for joy as he went to the pit to work. Why should he not do so? Yet you do not like the look of it; do you? I would a good deal sooner a man should be as nimble as David before the ark than be as sleepy as some Christians are, who, if they have any joy, repress it and never tell it out: they are afraid of expressing their joy for fear they should be misjudged. Let it not be so with you. If you let the new life within you have its own course, you may be thought eccentric, but in those eccentricities will lie your force.

I cannot linger longer. Regeneration is a thorough change, and a wonderful change; but it is a manifest change, and in some men it is especially so. Be it our aim to prove to a demonstration that we are born from above.

IV. But now, very briefly, regeneration is

A MOST IMPERATIVE CHANGE.

Ye must, ye must, ye must be born again. Ye may be rich or ye may be poor, but "ye must be born again." Ye may be intelligent, ye may be educated, ye may be talented, but "ye must, ye must be born again." Many things are desirable, but one thing is needful, imperatively needful—ye must, ye must, ye must be born again. This imperative necessity may be seen from many points of view. We cannot mention them all, but just one or two.

1. If you are not born again, you have no life, no spiritual life. The first birth gave you bodily life and mental life, but it did not give you spiritual life—it could not do so, for that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and no more. Now you must have spiritual life or else you are dead in trespasses and sins, and to all that has to do with spiritual blessings—to a spiritual Gospel, a spiritual salvation, a spiritual heaven, to all these things you are dead as the corpses in their graves are dead to the business of to-day.

There may be great changes taking place in politics; trade may be very prosperous, or it may be depressed, but the dead man has no interest in the nation or its commerce—how can he have? So is it with you; until you are born again, the spiritual world is shut to you, and you are indifferent to it. Angels may be rejoicing, and believers may be rejoicing over saved souls, but you care nothing about it. The Lord Jesus Himself may be seeing of the travail of His soul, but it is nothing to you, and it must be nothing to you because you are dead.

Oh if our bodies could take the shape of our souls, there would be many carcasses sitting before me in these pews. Ah, strange and ghastly sight! We thank God that He conceals the spiritual from our eyes, else might we in horror leave the places where we sit, because we should find ourselves in close companionship with the dead. What a horrible thing a dead soul must be, if our spirits could now perceive it as our senses would perceive a corpse!

2. Furthermore, remember that a man who is not born again has no spiritual capacity. We must be receivers first in the spiritual life, and the dead sinner as yet, until God quickens him, can receive nothing. How often are the saints of God spiritually comforted, instructed, enriched under the preaching and hearing of the word; but it is their spiritual nature that receives the enrichment. The unregenerate have no spiritual nature: they are carnal, sold under sin, and their mental powers, as well as their bodily appetites, are enslaved: hence they have no power to receive the blessing. The gracious and ever blessed rain of the Spirit comes, but they are not like Gideon's fleece ready to drink it in, but like an hard stone upon which the drops may descend, but it cannot be saturated with the mosture, nor softened by it. Unregenerate men are broken cisterns, which it is vain to attempt to fill. Even if God's own grace were to come to them it could not be retained, for they have not the capacity to hold it. Only the spiritual can receive the spiritual. You must then be born again to have a spirit by which spiritual things are discerned and received. Do you not see that you must be born again?

3. Once more, ye must be born again, because without the Spirit of God you are not the children of God, and consequently you have no spiritual inheritance. The Spirit causes us to be born; that birth makes us children, and our being children makes us heirs. If we are not born again we are not children, therefore we are not heirs, and we are out of the heritage, for God's heritage of glory is for the heirs of grace and for none others; and none shall come into the eternal portion but those who are born in his house and are his true sons and daughters.

Universal fatherhood, whatever that may be, brings us common mercies; but it is the special fatherhood which God hath towards the living in Zion which brings us special blessings. Ye must, then, be born again or lose all share in the divine inheritance. No soul can ever cross the threshold of heaven that has not received the new life. No matter how abundant its prayers, nor how multiplied its acts of religiousness, unless it has been born again, the gates of paradise are forever fastened against it. Banished from the presence of Jehovah's glory, there is only one other place where it can dwell, and that must be where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched. "Ye must be born again."

V. I will finish my discourse by saying that

THIS NEW BIRTH IS EMINENTLY PERSONAL.

"Ye must be born again." The idea of proxy is quite apart from the figure of the text. A man is born himself, in propria persona: no other can be born for him; so here the change which must be wrought in us must be personally experienced and individually known and felt.

Now, I think I hear passing through the congregation at this moment the whisper of many hearts who are saying, "This is very discouraging. We like to hear 'Only believe, and you shall be saved.' We are glad to be told that 'whosoever believeth in the Lord Jesus Christ hath everlasting life,' but this distresses us, for it does not open the door so wide as we could wish." Believe me, I am very glad to tell you of the free and wide Gospel of grace. It is joyful work to me to bring that welcome message

But at the same time God forbid that you should be built up upon a false foundation, or that your faith and confidence should stand apart from the truth as it is in Jesus. It will be found to be wood, and hay, and stubble if it be so. But you say my sermon is discouraging: had you not better ask, "Is it true?" A person has been building a house, and we see him piling up the stones, but he has never digged out the foundation. It is certainly discouraging to him to tell him that it is not the right way to build a house, but it will be a great mercy for him to be discouraged in a work which is so foolish. It will be a great saving to him in the long-run if all that he has already built should come down at once, and he should even now begin at the beginning once more, and lay a good foundation and make sure work of it. It would be foolish to cry out, "Do not discourage him:" he ought to be discouraged. Yes, indeed, we would discourage all that will end in disappointment. The fact is your efforts, and your doings, and your merits, all of them, at their very best, must be a failure, and it is a good thing for us to tell you so.

"But what am I to do?" saith one. That, permit me to remind you, is not the best question for you to ask, for if the work of salvation were what you must do, surely it would be left undone. You may put the question, "What must I do to be saved?" but we will point you away from doing, and we will tell you to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, that you may be saved.

"Oh! but you tell me I must have divine power working in me. We do tell you that; we can tell you nothing less, and if that power is ever at work in your soul, its first effect will be to bring you to confess this, and you will fall down before the footstool of divine mercy and say, "Lord, save me, or I perish. God be merciful to me a sinner."

I do not want to rouse your activity, you unconverted people: I want to rouse you to the conviction that you are lost, and I pray God the Holy Spirit may so convince you. I wish, not to make you think "we can cure ourselves," but oh! that you would feel that you are diseased, and that, though you have destroyed yourselves, your remedy lies in a higher hand—that you must look to Jesus only for healing.

To get the supernatural element into the matter is that which we would strive for, and may God the Holy Spirit help us in it! We would have you look away from what is in you or can come from you, and trust to what Christ did on the cross, to what the gracious Father is waiting still to do, and what the Holy Spirit is sent on purpose to work in you that you may be saved. Oh that you may begin to pray for the divine power! May you never rest in any thing short of the divine working in your spirit. It is to this we would bring you.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

THE STORY OF FELICIA CUFFE,

The Long-Lost but Rescued Nun.

Deathbed Confession of Felicia Cuffe's Aunt about her Inveiglement of her Niece into the Convent—Felicia's Mother consulted about her Long-lost Daughter—She goes to the Convent and recognizes Her—Thrilling Scene—Mrs. Cuffe's Visit next day legally to demand her Daughter—Her Abduction.

ONE morning I was surprised to receive in Dublin a visit from this converted priest, Father Kirby, and more surprised still at the purport of his coming. It was to inform me of the place of Miss Cuffe's imprisonment. It came to his knowledge that her mother was one of my parishioners. His first thought had been to go direct to herself, but upon reflection he deemed it better to use my mediation, for he feared the effect upon a parent, long bereaved, of the sudden intelligence of the more than probable existence of her child.

It came out in our interview that Mr. Kirby himself had once resided in Dublin as a Roman Catholic clergyman, and that Miss Barbara Cuffe, who was Felicia's aunt (as has been previously stated), had used his priestly ministrations. He, in fact, had been her father confessor. When she lay dying it was he that shrived her, and "gave her the last rites of the church." When it came to the closing scene of her life's drama her past deeds stood out in the light of eternity, and her conduct toward her niece rose up before her conscience in something of its true colors.

She confessed to him what she had done—how she had inveigled her niece, when a mere child, into St. A——'s convent. She felt, now as in the presence of death, troubled at the deed, yet sought to palliate it by urging her motive, namely, to rescue the child from the fangs and claws of heresy, and to gain a new and wealthy subject for Holy Church. "To ease my mind I tell you this," she said; "but, Father Kirby, you must on no account make known to her mother her hiding-place. My niece has now become reconciled to her lot,—is, in fact, a professed nun, which, as you are aware, supposes her own consent. She has therefore given up all earthly relationships, and is the spouse of Jesus Christ. Her mother can never regain her as a daughter, and since by this time she has given her up as dead, it would be worse than useless to renew old yearnings, which, as things now stand, can never be satisfied."

"At that period," said Mr. Kirby to me, "I was fanatically zealous for my Church—approved of the so-called 'religious life'—would, indeed, have every well-to-do and handsome young woman in the land a nun if I could—yet I remonstrated with the dying woman; my natural sense of right revolted at her act, and I urged her to permit me to make known to the parent that her child still lived. But all my exhortations went for nought. 'It would breed a grievous scandal against all the convents in the kingdom,' she exclaimed. 'Your oath of secrecy as confessor, Father Kirby, binds you to silence; and besides this, you now must see that the interests of Holy Church put a double seal upon your lips concerning this matter forever.'"

"Her excitement," added Mr. Kirby, "hastened the burning out of the flickering lamp of life; exhausted, her head fell back upon her pillow, there was an agonizing sob, the emaciated countenance fell, the spirit went to its solemn account, and the worn and ghastly tenement of clay mutely supplicated burial.

"About that period," continued Mr. Kirby, "some pressing matters of business required my attention, my thoughts were very much engaged, and after a little the case of Miss Cuffe faded from my remembrance. The other day, however, an incident that came before me in my course of reading brought up the whole affair again before my mind, and now, absolved from my unrighteous oath—an oath which is a crying wrong to society at large—I have come to you to see if something cannot be done to bring together the long broken-hearted mother and the kidnapped child."

MRS. CUFFE CONSULTED ABOUT HER LONG-LOST DAUGHTER.

Since it was uncertain, however, whether Felicia Cuffe was still in St. A——'s convent, and as neither Mr. Kirby nor myself, if she were brought before us, could recognize her, it became necessary to use the services of Mrs. Cuffe. It would never do to get a search warrant and go at a peradventure. Before any outward action should be taken, it must be ascertained with all certainty where the stolen girl was. It was therefore arranged between Mr. Kirby and myself that I should break the matter to the mother, and in a cautious way.

While proceeding to Mrs. Cuffe's home, I asked Mr. Kirby (for he accompanied me) how he could account for the nunnery officials being content to retain Miss Cuffe so long without a financial consideration, "for, of course, though she is a considerable heiress from her father, the manner of her concealment has prevented a demand at law for her money."

His reply was, that he had no positive knowledge of how the affair had been managed, but his suspicion was that the aunt, as long as she lived, must have given an annual and handsome sum for the support of her niece; and that as to the portion which every professed nun is required to bring to her (so-called) divine bridegroom, which, in reality, is a bonus to the convent funds, his idea was that a claim upon it from the legal trustees had been deferred until the mother's death should remove any difficulty. Meanwhile the money would accumulate, and patience would have its reward in the clutching of a good round sum from compound interest in the future.

One feels anxiety when the bearer of evil tidings, but not less apprehension filled my heart at the task I had undertaken of making known to Mrs. Cuffe the very joyful tidings I had to bring her. Perhaps as many have died from over gladness as from over grief.

Mrs. Cuffe received us quietly; much sorrow had subdued her—a desolated heart had for years given her to live as in a wilderness of gloom. Seating ourselves, at her request, Mr. Kirby and myself gradually led up the conversation to the subject of her long-lost daughter. "If it were possible that she lived, do you think you would know her?" Mr. Kirby inquired, with as great an appearance of inadvertence as he could manage, but Mrs. Cuffe at the question gave him a piercing look—it told her there was something behind his words—and, gasping with excitement, while the blood fled from her lips, she entreated him to no longer keep her in suspense, but to tell her all he knew of her dear one.

What he could convey shed a gleam of light upon a long and horrid mystery, but of course did not make certain the recovery of her child. That depended upon suitable action.

Upon certain days, at most convents, relatives are permitted to visit, under surveillance, a relative who is a nun; often the arrangement is that the interview shall be through a grating, the friend at one side of it and the nun at the other, with an elder sister, to watch every word that passes, close at hand.

SHE DISCOVERS HER DAUGHTER IN A CONVENT.

Mrs. Cuffe, after some mutual counsel, proposed that on the next day for visits at St. A——'s convent she should make her appearance and ask to see sister Agnes. Mr. Kirby could inform her, from what Barbara, her aunt, had told him, that such had been the new name given to Felicia Cuffe upon her taking the veil.

We hesitated to sanction this plan. We feared that Mrs. Cuffe would not have nerve enough, and would betray herself before gaining an interview. She herself, however, felt confident of retaining the necessary self-possession, and insisted that she must be the first to set eyes upon her long-bewailed darling.

The difficulty, in the next place, was to invent a plea for getting to the lost one. Mrs. Cuffe had been to this convent, among the rest, in her personal inquiries about her child. She would very likely be recognized, and the virtual gaolers of her daughter were wary as wolves. It so happened, however, that a Miss Cuffe, cousin of her dead husband and a Roman Catholic, was of similar stature to Mrs. Cuffe, and had something of her general appearance. It was resolved by Mrs. Cuffe to personate this lady,—to purchase an attire as like hers as possible, and in this disguise, stating the cousin's relationship, to ask to see sister Agnes.

The servitor at the convent door, upon this request from the trembling mother, gave her a searching look. Some reminiscence seemed to pass before her mind; she paused, and Mrs. Cuffe's hopes sank to zero within her. The hesitation of the servitor nun, however, was only momentary. She told Mrs. Cuffe to wait for a little on a seat in the hall, and, saying she would soon return, passed from sight through the door at the upper part of the hall already mentioned in our narrative. The moment of her absence was a season of intense suspense to the yearning mother, and in the multitude of her thoughts within her, seemed an age. It ended, however satisfactorily—the mother's heart leaped to he throat as she was told by the servitor nun to follow her to the reception-room.

Felicia Cuffe was greatly changed since she and her mother, thirteen years before, had been ruthlessly parted; from a mere child she ha grown to be a woman; a nun's raiment, too, i an efficient disguise of lineament and featur Mrs. Cuffe herself, likewise, was greatly altere for sorrow mars the face. If then, it were th case that sister Agnes was the lost one, woul mutual recognition be possible? The proble was soon solved.

Mrs. Cuffe, with palpitating heart, took h stand near the grating, which reached fro floor to ceiling in the room, and severed th "religieuse" from the outer and "profane world. Soon a dark-robed young female forn with an older female dark-robed form beside he moved towards the expectant visitor. O glance of the mother into her child's face w sufficient—the lost one was found. The name F licia, in the old tender tone, passed aloud fro her lips as she pushed her hands far as ar would reach through the grating.

THRILLING SCENE.

The word was as an electric flash to the n addressed. With a bound and a raptur shriek she rushed to the embrace held out her. Mother and child were locked in e other's arms, lip met lip in a delirium of kiss and bosom all but lay close to bosom—we say but lay—for the cruel iron bars rose up strai and strong between them.

Soon the whole convent was in a tum Some of the elder nuns rushed to that port of the apartment where Mrs. Cuffe stood, others to that part where, pressed to her he was her discovered daughter. It soon bec evident that these spiritual recluses would scruple to resort to physical force when deemed a heretic invaded their sanctu Rude hands were laid upon Mrs. Cuffe and daughter, and strenuous efforts were made separate them. On their part a brave and e est resistance was made, but numbers at len prevailed. Felicia Cuffe was torn from her ther, was violently pushed back in the room, finally, in a swoon, was carried to a distant of the convent.

Long did the mother, holding on to the b and making as though she would tear them as beseech those around her, as women, to pity on her, and restore to her her child. addressed herself to those who, as steepe bigotry and austere in their fanatical zeal, no compassion. Alas! so-called mothers, yet had never been mothers, could not be pected to know any thing of a mother's She too, was drawn back from her position ainting state—was hustled to the outer door, vhich with a slam was closed behind her.

Mr. Kirby and myself were not far off; we rere standing half-way down the great avenue f trees that led to the convent. We hastened p, and took hurried counsel. We concluded hat to ask for readmittance to Miss Cuffe was ow utterly useless. The superior of the conent and her auxiliary sisterhood were "masers" of the situation, and so far we had been affled. It was, however, now certain that the ong-lost one lived, and the place of her conealment was known. A "mandamus" could e obtained from the civil authorities, which ould compel her production.

HE MOTHER'S LEGAL CLAIM FOR HER DAUGHTER.

Next day—the soonest period possible from he law's proverbial delay—Mr. Kirby and Mrs. uffe and myself, with the necessary legal officls, presented ourselves at St. A——'s convent oor. We were all received with a studied coursy and ceremoniousness. Making known the bject of our coming, regret was expressed at ne hasty removal of Mrs. Cuffe from the premses on the day previous, but it was declared with bland smile to be rendered necessary by Mrs. uffe's outrageous conduct. She had, as one emented, laid hold upon a young sister in the stablishment, an utter stranger to her, and had nsisted, in a most unladylike way, that she was lost child of hers.

They would prove the truth of this statement, it were desired, by producing the young nun nat had been assaulted. They could not acount for the wild mistake which the lady had nade, except by supposing that—poor thing!—he was a little crazed upon the subject of her aughter; and perhaps the young sister she had ushed upon had some distant resemblance in ge and features to her child.

The effect of this speech, as may be supposed, as maddening upon Mrs. Cuffe, while it excited n Mr. Kirby and myself the warmest indignation. he law officers, however, who accompanied s, and who were Roman Catholics, felt quite isposed to accept the lady superior's words as rue. They said, "They would like to see the un that was spoken of, and perhaps a look at er by Mrs. Cuffe would dissipate the fancy that he had seen her daughter." We all, on our ide, protested against the performance of any uch farce. Mrs. Cuffe firmly asserted her absoate certainty of having seen her child, and we nsisted upon having a search made throughout he premises.

The sisters in black declaimed against any uch insult being offered to their privacy, but t length consented, and, changing their tone, ven ostentatiously offered every facility for havng it thoroughly done. Every room and closet nd cell and recess was therefore explored; but hey were explored in vain. No Felicia Cuffe as to be found; and, finally, the nun said to be nistaken for her was set before us. But Mrs. Cuffe ridiculed the idea of her being the person he had seen the day before; yet I must confess began to feel it might be that the lady superir's representation of the matter had some truth n it, and a glance at my friend Mr. Kirby gave ne to see that he had something of the same idea.

There was such a seeming candor about the lder inmates of the convent. We had, using heir help and guidance, carefully ransacked very hole and corner of the building. Mrs. Cuffe, we knew, was in a state of mental fever concerning her daughter. The person she had dentified as her lost one was seen by her only or a few moments, and delusion was possible. We pressed this fact upon her attention; but—poor woman!—she would not heed it for an nstant. She declared a mother, in such a case, could not be mistaken; and with a heart cast lown from the highest hope to the deepest sorrow and despair, she returned to her dwelling.

HER ABDUCTION INTO ANOTHER CONVENT.

Mrs. Cuffe was right in her conviction that sister Agnes was her long-lost daughter, and the heads of the St. A——'s consent were fully in accord with her in this belief. Therefore, after the mother's expulsion from the convent door, an anxious conference was held as to what should be done under the circumstances.

It was felt that sister Agnes must be removed. It was true that since she was torn from her mother's bosom she had passed from one swoon into another—that her life, in fact, was in jeopardy—still the good name of the convent was more precious even than that. Therefore, though transference to another "religious house" in the city might entail risk to the young nun, transferred she must be, and as soon as possible.

PROBABLE POLICY OF THE POPE.

By Rev. C. H. Hamilton, Rector of Horne, England.

The Recent Revival of Papal Power a Fulfilment of Prophecy—The Loss of Temporal Power has Resulted in an Increase of Spiritual Power—A Probable Change of Front—Ultramontanism the Third of the Unclean Spirits under the Sixth Vial—Antichrist will Probably Rise by Ultramontane Influences.

FEW things have been more surprising than the revival of the power of the Papacy within the last ten years. Shorn of its strength, and apparently doomed to speedy decay, it has nevertheless taken a new lease of life. To the student of prophecy this has not, however, been an unlooked-for event, because a temporary revival of the Papal power, though under singularly altered conditions from the time when Rome dictated her laws to the nations of the earth, has been clearly foretold in the Apocalypse (Rev. 13 and 17).

The Papacy dream of universal dominion has been steadily maintained, notwithstanding the loss of its temporal sovereignty over the Eternal City, in 1870, when the Pope became the self-styled "prisoner of the Vatican." The Church of Rome still indulges in visions of the time when the kingdoms of the world shall be brought under her sway.

Strange to relate, the loss of the temporal power has resulted in a vast increase of the spiritual power of the Pope. The power of the Papacy is more unlimited than that of any absolute monarchy. What seemed at first sight an irreparable disaster has been the means of rallying the tens of thousands of spiritual subjects of the Pope around his throne, in a more blind and unreasoning allegiance than ever.

The most striking proof of this autocratic power was afforded at the Vatican Council in 1870. It is well known that an influential minority, of which Bishop Strossmeyer may be regarded as the leader, was strongly opposed to the monstrous dogma of Infallibility, then imposed upon the Roman Church; but the remonstrants were not only silenced, but compelled to give in their adhesion to a dogma which conscience and reason alike condemned. Never was the right of private judgment so rigorously denied to the subjects of the Church of Rome; never was the spiritual dictatorship of the Papacy so despotic and triumphant.

It is certain that the late Pontiff—whether from the dislike of old age to engage in acrimonious warfare, or perhaps owing to a revival of the liberal spirit that had made the inauguration of his Pontificate so remarkable—desired to relax the fierceness of the conflict he had so long waged with the kingdom of Italy. We do not think that this policy of moderation will be really pursued by Leo XIII., however much it may possibly be professed in honeyed phrases. It is far more likely that the famous "non possumus" of Pius IX. will be repeated in terms of equal, if not increased, hostility.

We must also be prepared before long for a startling change of front in the attitude of the Papacy. In past times it has been allied to governments: it has bestowed its patronage on kings and princes in exchange for the recognition of its spiritual supremacy, and has shown itself the uncompromising foe of democratic aspirations. But its present sore need will make it willing to use any instruments, however ignoble, by which it may regain the sceptre of the world.

Disowned by the Governments of Europe, its Concordats with Austria, and even with Catholic Spain, rescinded, deprived of this auxiliary power of influencing the destinies of the world, it will in due time throw itself into the arms of the people, and strengthen itself by an alliance with democracy. The Scarlet Woman, for a short season just before her destruction, is again to be seated in temporal power upon the seven hills of Rome, and to ride triumphantly upon the crownless red-republicanized nations of Cæsar's Roman Empire, represented by scarlet wild-beasts with ten uncrowned horns (see Rev. 17: 3, 9).

The Papacy has ever been ready to adapt itself to altered times and conditions. It can suit itself either to monarchical or republican Governments. A glance at the present state of Europe will find what a formidable weapon it may find in Communism. Every day the power of government is becoming more and more vested in the hands of the people. In every State where free institutions exist there are busy agitators laboring to spread the doctrines of Socialism, Communism, and Internationalism. The dread of Internationalism is the nightmare of politicians. The English Prime Minister long ago sounded the note of warning touching this new cause of danger, and far-seeing statesmen regard it as an omen of grave import to the liberties of Europe.

There is even reason to believe that it was the fear of concerted action between the Catholics of South Germany and the Ultra-Radical party, leagued together by a community of interest, that induced Prince Bismarck to withdraw, in a great measure, from his memorable struggle with the Papal See. His present policy may delay for a while, but cannot ultimately prevent, the realization of his fears; the separation of the South German States from Bismarck's German empire being a necessity for the complete reconstitution of the ten kingdoms of Cæsar's Roman Empire.

The dethroned Babylonish queen of nations, in her extremity, will ally herself with the despised populaces, and ride back again to power on the shoulders of Revolution and Demagoguism, as foreshown in the expositions of Mr. Hyslop, Mr. Jenour, and other writers upon Revelations 17.

Ultramontanism, or Popish fanaticism, together with Mohammedan fanaticism, is clearly the third of the unclean spirits which are predicted to gather the nations to war during the sixth vial under which we are now living. The sixth vial is drying up the Euphrates or Turkish Empire in order that the way may be prepared for the return of the Jews to Palestine.

It will be by Ultramontane and Democratic influences that the predicted Napoleonic Antichrist will presently rise to this predestined universal dominion (Rev. 13: 3, 7), and the next ten or fifteen years will probably witness all these and other concluding events of this dispensation connected with the Second Coming of Christ.

Casting a mighty spell over the minds of the nations by her withcrafts, and sorceries, and miracles, wrought through Satanic agency, the Church of Rome under her final Pontiff (who will most probably be a more active man than Leo XIII., who is sixty-eight years old) will seem at last to have reached the summit of her ambition—universal dominion. But in the midst of her exaltation, while she exclaims, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow," and exalts herself boastfully over the nations, shall sudden destruction come upon her, and her power shall be utterly cast down. "In one day shall her plagues come upon her," and her kingdom broken, so that it shall be found no more forever. Then shall He come "whose right it is to reign,"—the Sovereign Prince of Peace,—and "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ." "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE.

A Sea-captain Half-seas over—Intoxicated Engine Driver and Stoker—Casinos Promoted by Drink—A Dying Magdalen Repaying a Debt of Half-a-crown—A Glasgow Minister Reclaiming a Fierce Drunkard.

A FRIEND of mine told me that the captain of a packet-ship plying between Liverpool and New York said to him, "I always considered myself a moderate drinker. I drank a glass of brandy-and-water at my dinner when at sea, nothing more. And I always felt better for my brandy-and-water. I came on deck slightly exhilarated." A heavy sea rolling, or a terrific gale of wind blowing, he would say, "This is magnificent, this is glorious to manage a fine ship! How she pitches into it—she works like a beauty! Mate, send the men aloft, and shake the reefs out of that main-top-sail; ay, ay, shake them out of the fore-topsail; let us have a little more sail, we will make a fine passage."

The mate looks at him in surprise; the sailors would obey his orders; the vessel felt the press of the sail and quivered in every timber—the bows driving under water, and the mate standing with blanched cheeks clinching the stanchions, looking at the masts bending like whip-stocks in the wind, the captain feeling it was glorious and magnificent. "This is the kind of weather we want; isn't she flying along; we shall make a magnificent passage." By and by, when the influence of that single glass passed away, he would look up aloft, then he would look out to windward. "Getting dirty weather, mate; better make things snug up there. I say, men, clew up that main-topsail, close reef that fore-topsail; make things snug."

The very same sea rolling, under the influence of one glass of brandy-and-water he would clap on sail enough to spring the masts and drive the vessel's bows under water; but when that influence passed away he would prudently take in sail. "Now," he said, "I am a sea-faring man, and I believe that many a good ship, with passengers and crew, has foundered at sea through the influence of a glass of brandy on the brain of a captain in a gale of wind." Now, I say, is that one glass moderation? You may say so to me sitting here, but you would not say so if you were on the deck of that ship. Circumstances would alter your opinion of the same fact. And you would probably say, if you were on board that ship, "I wish he had not taken that brandy." "But he daily drank one glass." "Ay, but that one glass was not moderation."

INTOXICATED ENGINE-DRIVER AND STOKER.

Two men were brought up at Liverpool, an engineer and a stoker, and were tried, and they proved that they were sober when they went on the locomotive, and they proved that they had only been taking a drop or two with some friends at Christmas. But the guard finding, when they came near to Warrington that they were going at the rate of some sixty miles an hour, felt that there was something wrong, climbed over the carriages, and found the engineer and the stoker stupidly drowsing on the engine with a full head of steam on. Do you call that moderation?

I care not what a man drinks—I care not whether it is a thimbleful or a quart—if it acts upon the brain so as to induce him to neglect his duty—if its effects are such that life is sacrificed—God save those who travel from moderation. We say that the moderate drink of one man is not a safe example for another man to follow, and what we want specially with regard to young men is this. Young men are exposed in this city to terrible temptations; it is a city of snares: some of you, perhaps, do not know it, and God forbid that you should. But there are men here who could take you on a six-hours' exploration in this metropolis and show you scenes—well, I cannot tell you—I cannot tell you what the effect would be upon you. I know what it has been upon me.

CASINOS PROMOTED BY DRINK.

I have not slept at night for them—I have not eaten any food for them—scenes so horrible when we think of them in a Christian land, they won't bear repeating. You cannot describe them. While you are sitting here to-night, they are there, in full force and in full play, and not one of them can be sustained without drink. Drink is the beginning, the middle, and the end of it. Young men cannot be induced to enter these horrible dens until they are first induced to drink. It is drink that is the beginning; drink is the first step; you find among those who are whirling their partners in the giddy dance to-night in the casinos, and will be till to-morrow morning—that some of them have been Sabbath-school scholars, some of them Sabbath-school teachers!

Ask them the cause of this; ask them the first step, and nine out of ten will tell you drink—drink—drink. And there is no power on earth that debases and degrades and embrutes a man as the power and influence of drink. Drink—ah! young men, when you look at debased men and women, I know you call them brutes. I know that. I know very well when you see a man that will abuse his mother you call him a brute; when you see a young man that will, as a young man did that I know very well, steal money from his sick sister, and as she said, "I have no friends; I am all alone, I have been saving money for my sickness, and my death, and my burial, and he has left me without a penny." "Ah!" you say, "a man like that is a brute."

No, he is not; no, he is not. I tell you if we had a stronger faith in this fact, that there is no man or woman so debased and so degraded, but they are human yet; there is a spot in their hearts, if we can only get at it; it would go right through them like electricity; if we only had more faith in that fact we should be doing more good. But we get so weary in well-doing—don't we? We get so weary in setting the example of patience in bearing with the errors and faults of our brother. But remember God's long-suffering to you.

Remember that when you see an erring brother, when you see a faint and erring sister, have mercy on her, as Christian men; have mercy on such, they are human. Did you ever work among them? Did you ever go among them? Did you ever find a human being that persevering kindness cannot reach, would not touch? Did you? I never did; never—never—never: I care not who they are.

A DYING MAGDALEN PAYING A DEBT OF HALF-A-CROWN.

A friend of Hugh Miller related this fact. He received a letter from a poor woman, he knew not who it was till he went, inviting him to call and see her in her wretched den in Edinburgh. He went, and found the woman on her death-bed and destitute. She was a townswoman of his. For eight years and more she had been a flaunting street-walker. But she was a woman, and she had a woman's heart; and she lay down to die. He had no money with him but half-a-crown; it was Saturday night. He gave her that, and said, "I will call in the morning." He did; but she was dead. At the funeral Mr. Miller saw a woman evidently affected, and he said to her, "Is that any relation of yours?"

"Oh, no!" she said; "no relation, poor thing. When she was a gay, flaunting girl, with her ribbons, and her furbelows, and her flounces, she purchased things of me, and she owed me half-a-crown, and I could never get it; she would laugh at me when I asked her for it, and evidently seemed bent upon cheating me. Last Saturday night I was astonished to see that poor creature come into my shop: she only had one garment on her; it was a drizzly night; her cheeks were hollow, her eyes sunk down deep in the sockets, her fingers like the claws of a bird; and she came tottering in and laid down the half-crown and said, 'There is your money, ma'am; it lies heavily on my conscience; it is your due—I owe it to you, and I did not mean to cheat you; I must pay you before I die,'—and went back to her wretched rags to die."

They have hearts. Did you ever try it? Oh, these poor outcasts! I could sometimes bow my head and weep floods of tears when I see the horrible oppression of man to his fellow erring man. "Oh, yes; beat him, give it him, John; he has got no friends!" this is very much the doctrine of the world; and it should not be so with Christian men. They are our brethren; and remember Jesus our Saviour, in His ministry on earth, never said a harsh word to the outcast—never, never. To the self-righteous Pharisees He said, "O generation of vipers! how shall ye escape the damnation of hell?" But to the woman, the sorrowing woman, He said, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." Oh, the might and power of example! Do not these poor creatures look for it from you? Would to God the time was come when, if we should say to any of these erring, wretched, vile outcasts, "Friend, that is a Chrsitian man," he would spring to him, and know that the Christian man, like the good Samaritan, would pour in oil and bind up his wounds. Did you ever try consistent, persevering kindness with the erring?

A GLASGOW MINISTER RECLAIMING A FIERCE DRUNKARD.

A minister of the Gospel, a parish minister in Scotland, told me that when he first went to Glasgow he made up his mind that he would call on every individual in his parish—every one; but there was one man he was afraid of. His friends said to him, "I would not go and see him, he will do you a mischief probably; I would not go to see him; it is no use going to see him—he is a brute," they said. Well, the minister said, "I was ashamed of myself, to find day after day, week after week pass away, and I did not see this man. I visited everybody else but him. One morning I got up, feeling exceedingly well; the sky was bright, the sun shining, the trees were looking green; just that sort of a morning when a man feels the blood running through his system, and I said, I will go up and see that man; I am just in the right trim for it."

He went up three or four pairs of stairs, and knocked at the door—no answer; he knocked again—no answer; he knocked again—no answer: he opened the door and went in; and h said, when he saw that poor creature crouched b the fire-place, he began to feel a little frightened he began to feel a sort of sickness in his throat—that sort of feeling, I wish I wasn't here. Hi hair was matted and tangled, his clothing i rags, and filthy; a four-weeks' beard on his face and his cheeks cadaverous; and, as he looke around him, there was a glare like that of a ma beast, and he felt timid and frightened.

The first word the poor creature said wa "Who are you?"—"I am a minister." "Min ister; what do you want?"—"Well, I hav called to see you." He rose upon his feet, ar the minister said, "Then I began to think whe I should take him; I expected a struggle, and was determined I would not give him up. H came up pretty close to me, and stretched o his hand and said, 'You have come to see m have you; then see me. How do you like t looks of me—I'm a bit of a beauty, ain't Come to see me, did you?"

Then he came a pace or two nearer, and he f the pestiferous breath on his face hot, as said, "Now, I will kick you downstairs." "Stop," he said; "don't—don't, don't kick downstairs now, because I have a call to make above; and, if you kick me down, I shall obliged to come all the way up again, don't y see. Now, if it is any gratification to you kick the minister downstairs, who has come call upon you out of pure good-will, let me and make my visit upstairs and then I will pl myself at your disposal." "Well, you ar rum 'un," said the man, and shuffled back to seat.

The minister made his call upstairs, ca down, opened the door, and said, "Well, man, here I am. I told you I would call aga

Now, if it is any gratification to you to kick the minister downstairs, I am at your disposal."—"Did you come to see me?" the man asks. "Yes, I did." "Well, then, sit down;" and he began to talk to him, not as if he was a brute, but as if he was a brother; as if he was a man. And by and by the poor creature cried out, "O sir! I am the most God-forsaken wretch on earth!" and then he spoke of a wife and six children, of sorrow and sin, and degradation and despair.

Well, the minister prayed with that man, and eft him, came back again, and the result was hat man, with his wife and five children, sat in God's house on the Sabbath, clothed and in his right mind, under the influence of the truth.

CONTRASTED DEATHS OF TWO AUSTRALIANS.

An interesting story has been told by the Rev. Dr. Cameron, whose lamented decease took place at Melbourne on December 17th, 1877. It orcibly illustrates the saying of our Lord that many who seem first in their chances of reaching the kingdom fail of finally entering there, while others who might be supposed to have no chance at all are, like the thief on the cross, gathered in at the eleventh hour. The first two servants that Dr. Cameron had when he went out to Australia as a young man had both been convicts, and when he became acquainted with them were still condemned sinners in God's sight (John 3: 18).

One of the two, whose name was Mitchell, had been in a clergyman's household, where he had the privilege of joining every day in the family devotions, and of receiving regular religious instruction, and of worshipping on the Sabbath in the house of God. To all appearances he seemed to feel no repugnance at these things, but rather to appreciate and relish them.

The other man had been in circumstances of the very opposite kind. In that part of the country where he had lived there were none of the ordinary means of grace—no minister of the Gospel, no Christian fellowship, nothing to remind him of heaven. But this man was arrested in his ungodliness by the power of God's Spirit, turned aside into a new path, continued steadfast to the end, and died leaving a clear testimony to the thoroughness of his regeneration by God's Holy Spirit.

The end of Mitchell, however, was as melancholy as the other's was satisfactory. After he left Mr. Cameron's service he went to reside with a settler in a remote part of the bush. A young gold-digger, with gold in his possession, happened to lodge for the night at the house where he was living. Shortly after, Mitchell was found in possession of the horse which the digger had been riding, and he was arrested on suspicion of having stolen it.

Then, as the young gold-digger never reached his destination, a worse suspicion was aroused, and a search was instituted. In a shady and secluded spot, close to the road along which the missing man had been travelling, the remains of a large fire were discovered. Among the ashes were found certain articles, which were identified as having belonged to him. That he had been foully murdered, and his remains burned up, was evident.

Further investigation brought to light additional circumstantial evidence against Mitchell of the clearest kind. To crown all, a watch was found on him which was proved to be one which the gold-digger had worn. Mitchell was accordingly tried and sentenced to be hanged, and without confessing his crime, or giving any sign of penitence, he was executed.

The strangely contrasted ends of these two Australian servants show how vain are hopes built merely on favorable associations and religious influences, and how necessary it is to seek a changed heart and a new nature through earnestly seeking Christ and coming to Him in fervent prayer and faith.

THE PRAYER OF THE PENITENT.

S. S. Lesson for March 2d.—Psalm 51; Golden Text, verse 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The prayer of the penitent in our Psalm for to-day is not the prayer of an unconverted man. David had long known the Lord when he fell into his grievous sin through indolence and want of watchfulness. In 2 Sam. 11: 1, 2, we find the King of Israel sending Joab to fight his battles "at the time when kings go forth." "But David tarried still at Jerusalem." David was on his bed instead of in the field, and thus the enemy got advantage over him. The whole tone of the prayer is that of one who knows the Lord, and knows himself too. Nathan had made a personal application of the parable of the ewe lamb (2 Sam. 12: 1-14), and in the name of God he had said to the king, "Thou art the man;" and David bowed before God and said, "I have sinned against the Lord," and received the blessed answer, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin."

But the king sought not pardon only, but a cure and an inward cleansing from his impurity, and so he appeals to the wondrous greatness of God's mercy, and says, "Have mercy upon me, O God! according to Thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of Thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." What multitude of mercies has God for us? David would say, according to what Thou art, and not according to what I am, blot out my transgressions.

Then he desired a radical cure, so that the sin might not occur again even in thought. "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin." Only when we know God and love His holiness do we make this prayer from the depths of our hearts. Then sin to us becomes exceeding sinful, and the very thought of an excuse is impossible. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1: 9). At first David made an attempt to hide his sin. "Thou didst it secretly." He thought of his reputation as a man of God; and while he was under the power of the sin, he so far forgot his integrity that he planned the death of Uriah, and lent himself to a course of guilty deception. Oh, how hard a master Satan is, and how bitter is this horrible bondage of attempting to keep up appearances when the heart is wrong all the time!

But, blessed be our most gracious God, there is a way of return. And should any of my readers be under the power of a secret sin, of whatever nature it may be, I would urge you, my reader, to out with it tooth and nail. Where sin is concealed, it is still loved; remorse may be present, bitter shame, despair, but sin is still loved where it is unconfessed. "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." (Heb. 12: 4). Confession may be like the cutting off of a right hand or the plucking out of a right eye, but it is worth the while to be fully cleansed and separated from the uncleanness. There is a want of true nobility in those who shrink from acknowledging their sin. The slavery of confession to a priest is not what is meant here; but confession of sins against one another, or the frank acknowledgment to one who esteems us above that which is our real spiritual state when we know we have fallen into sin.

David felt the slime of his sin clinging about him, and he felt it was due to the people whom he ruled over, and from whom he had so carefully concealed his sin, that they should know his guilt, and thus he wrote this Psalm about himself and sent in to the chief musician; and all Israel knew that their king had sinned, and that he took the place of a penitent.

Beloved friends, no efforts of our own can produce in us a clean heart; sin dwelleth in us, and cannot but fructify if a stronger power does not keep it down. A clean heart is none other than Jesus' heart beating in us, loving in us, shunning all that is impure; it is "the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1: 4); God dwelling in us; "newness of life" (Rom. 6: 4). If we cry unto God to create such a heart in us, we acknowledge that there is no material ready prepared for it; that it is Him who says, "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21: 5), that alone can create a clean heart.

The Psalmist got down to the very depth of the reality about himself. While he claimed cleansing on the ground of his confession, "For I acknowledge my transgression," yet he saw the complete ruin of his human nature. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." But he made no excuse on this ground. And then he who had written of the king's daughter, "the Lamb's Bride" (Ps. 45: 13), that she is "all glorious within," says, "Behold, Thou desirest truth in the inward parts; and in the hidden part Thou shalt make me to know wisdom." He knew well that an outward change was not sufficient for a holy God; that the abstinence from the commission of sin was not reformation deep enough for Him who knoweth all the secrets of the heart. And he who had sinned so grievously against Uriah, against Bathsheba, and against his people in the guilt which might make them think lightly of sin, yet saw above all the sin which he had committed in its relation to God; so that he said, "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight: that Thou mightest be justified when Thou speakest, and clear when Thou art judged."

Then He requests God to give him joy. He does not think that the shame for his sin necessitates his always being miserable; always humbled he must be. "Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which Thou hast broken may rejoice;" and again, ver. 12, "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation." It had been lost, but he believes in the power of God to restore it; and then he asks for the Holy Spirit. First, "Renew a right spirit within me;" then, "Cast me not away from Thy presence, and take not Thy Holy Spirit from me;" and, lastly, "Uphold me with Thy free Spirit." He was deeply conscious of his utter inability to walk alone. But he counted the more upon the Spirit of God. He needed constant renewing by the Holy Ghost; he needed the certainty that God would not leave him to himself, which he feared now more than ever, and consequently the upholding of the Spirit of God; and not alone for himself; he had another object in view: "Then will I teach transgressors Thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto Thee."

David saw, perhaps, as never before the wondrous mercy and love of the heart of God; and as one who had tested by the vileness of his sin what kind of God he had to deal with, he could translate to sinners that unknown heart of love which was yearning over them; he could say to sinners, "I have been as low down in sin as you, but the Lord has raised me up." And then he says, "Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God! Thou God of my salvation;" the blood of Uriah lay upon his conscience and the blood of souls also. "And my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy righteousness," not of Thy mercy, but Thy righteousness. For God hath set forth Jesus "to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past," "that He might be just and the Justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Rom. 3: 25, 26).

Then he speaks as though his sin had robbed him of all liberty and freedom. "O Lord! open Thou my lips; and my mouth shall show forth Thy praise." The very Psalmist's lips had been closed while sin had bound him. "For Thou desirest not sacrifice," etc. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise." This is not a heart which prides itself upon its own penitence, but which is helpless and hopeless in itself. And then again the king pleads for his people: "Do good in Thy good pleasure unto Zion; build Thou the walls of Jerusalem. Then shalt Thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness," etc. He contemplated a life henceforth which should be a freewill and a thank-offering to his Saviour God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Parliament reassembled on Thursday, February 13th, for the dispatch of business. The ministerial leaders of both Houses made important speeches. That of Lord Beaconsfield in the House of Lords was listened to with intense interest, owing to the sad news of the Cape disaster which had just been published. He frankly admitted the gravity of the situation, and stated what measures had been taken to remedy the evil. In reference to the Afghan war he said: "The object of the Government's interference in Afghanistan has been completely accomplished. We now hold the three great highways connecting Afghanistan and India, and I hope we shall always retain them. We have secured a frontier which I hope and believe will render India invulnerable in a way which will trench as little as possible on the independence of Afghanistan."

In the lower House the policy of the Government was severely criticised by the Marquis of Hartington, the leader of the Opposition. The Irish members loudly complained that the interests of their country were being neglected by the Ministry.

A severe disaster has befallen the British forces in Southern Africa. During the absence of the British commander, Lord Chelmsford, and a strong reconnoitring party, the Zulus in large numbers surrounded the camp, and in spite of a vigorous defence by the soldiers left to guard it, the savages succeeded in capturing the guns, stores, and ammunition. Very few of the gallant English troops escaped. The fight must have been very desperate, for it is computed that the loss of the Zulus amounts to upwards of 2000 men killed. The British loss is set down at thirty commissioned officers, and five hundred and seventy rank and file. The details of the engagement have not yet come to hand, but it would appear, from such intelligence as we have, that the British force was enticed out of their camp and surrounded by an overwhelming Zulu force. The Zulus are the most warlike of the Caffir tribes, and in their tactics and mode of warfare closely resemble our own enemies, the Cheyennes and Sioux. The British Government appears to have underestimated the power of the Zulus and to have sent a force totally inadequate to cope with them. When the news of the defeat reached London, a Cabinet council was summoned at once, and prompt measures adopted for the protection of the colony. Upwards of seven thousand men are to be dispatched to the Cape within a week, with a full complement of artillery. Telegrams have also been sent to the Viceroy of India and the Governor of Mauritius, directing them to render what aid they may be able in the emergency.

The President of the French Republic is rapidly completing his arrangements with the view of intrusting the chief appointments, military, civil, and diplomatic, to men who are sincerely in sympathy with his administration, and who are known to be of sound Republican principles. The military changes at present made known affect eighteen generals and twelve commanders of troops. An amnesty bill has been presented by the Government to the Chambers. It grants amnesty to all offenders except those who have transgressed the common law. It condones all political offences committed subsequent to 1870. General tranquillity prevails throughout the country, and a more hopeful feeling is noticed among all classes of society.

The distress in London, as well as in other parts of England, continues very great, and the sufferings of the poor are much increased by the extreme severity of the season. Mr. E. Clifford, writing to the Echo, says of his visit to a poor man's house: "He and his family were all together in a dark room. A little girl, wearing only a boy's waistcoat, with one button, came out. She did not know her name. A miserable boy, about thirteen years old, came out. He earned eighteenpence a week. The woman was ashamed to come out because of her nakedness. I went into the dark room. On a horrible bed lay another little boy, because he and his brother had only one suit of clothes between them. The woman said, 'I am wretched; if it wasn't for that child I should be dead; but she is such a little cricket, and sings all day. Nobody has spoken a kind word to us till now all the years we have been here. There is no water here, and the neighbors are tired of lending it to us. So we cannot wash." The man said, 'My employment was washing bodies of people that had died. In the small-pox time I thought that if I drank it would keep away the infection, and that was how I came to drink. But I brought the small-pox home to my little girl. It's not all drink that has brought me down to this."

We regret to observe that the contemptible and worthless self-styled Charity Organization Society objects to the "indiscriminate charity" of feeding the starving poor, even to the extent of giving them a cup of cocoa and a piece of dry bread. There was ONE who two thousand years ago, in the most "indiscriminate" manner distributed not only bread but fish to multitudes on the shores of the Sea of Galilee; but, fortunately for these, there was no Charity Organization Society in those days, nor had that equivocal creation of our modern civilization the "Guardian of the Poor" been evolved out of the selfishness of human nature.

The German Reichstag was opened on February 12th by the Emperor William in person. In his speech from the throne he said he thanked the members for assisting in the suppression of the Socialist agitation, and hoped they would continue to support the Government as far as was necessary for the care of the Socialist evil. He announced the abolition of Article 5 of the Treaty of Prague, and referred with pleasure to the friendly relations with Austria, and the results of the Berlin Congress. He declared that the relations between Germany and all other powers are satisfactory, and that she would continue to use her influence in behalf of European peace.

Scientific Faith of the Prince of Wales.—A fact is related about the Prince of Wales and Dr. Lyon Playfair which is worth recording. Both were standing near a cauldron containing lead which was boiling at white heat. "Has your Royal Highness any faith in science?" said the doctor. "Certainly," replied the Prince. "Will you, then, place your hand in the boiling metal, and ladle out a portion of it?" "Do you tell me to do this?" asked the Prince. "I do," replied the doctor. The Prince then ladled out some of the boiling lead with his hand, without sustaining any injury. It is a well-known scientific fact that the human hand may be placed uninjured in lead boiling at white heat, being protected from any harm by the moisture of the skin. Should the lead be at a perceptibly lower temperature, a dreadful burn would result. After this let no one underrate the courage of the Prince of Wales.

The Death of Mr. Henry Vincent, who has been known for many years as a popular lecturer in the United States and England, took place on December 29th. He was an eloquent orator. Until a few weeks before his death he was fully engaged in a course of lectures. The labor thus entailed had been augmented by his earnest desire to preach the Gospel, so that he usually preached twice on Sunday, in addition to exhaustive lectures during the week. A short while before he breathed his last he uttered, as the expression of his confidence, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." His portrait and a sketch of his life will appear in an early number of this journal.

Money in Answer to Prayer.—The Rev. Hudson Taylor, who is manager of the China Inland Mission, says: "On October 11th, 1878, we wrote from London to our brethren, Mr. S. B. Drake and Mr. W. L. Elliston, telling them that we were able to receive them with a view to their early departure for China. We mentioned that we had not a penny in hand towards the expenses of their going out, but reckoned, as heretofore, on the faithfulness of God to supply all that was needed. These letters were posted at 5.15. By the 9 o'clock delivery of that same night a letter reached us from a distant European capital, containing donations for several objects. And amongst them one hundred pounds to pay the passages of two new missionaries to the very districts to which we had designated the above-named brethren. The kind donor knew nothing of the circumstances in which we were placed; but God, who knew all, had anticipated the prayers of that very day, and had laid several needs, which were met by that letter, on the heart of His servant. In writing to these two brethren, whom he had known as desirous of serving the Lord in China for two or three years, we had, as usual, to act in faith; but the Lord justified that faith, which rested on His own sure word of promise."

English labor troubles show no sign of abatement. The most serious struggle between employers and employed will probably arise in the iron trade, as the men employed in that branch of industry belong to a union which holds a large reserve fund, and is able to support its members during a protracted struggle. The employers in this trade have postponed for a week action on the notice which is the occasion of the dispute, in hope that during that time a compromise may be effected and a strike averted. A general strike in the English iron trade would be a most disastrous event for the English nation, for while masters and men are measuring their strength against each other and trying which side can afford to remain idle for the longest time, other nations will supply the markets, and trade once diverted into new channels is slow to return to the former ones, if it ever does.

The dock laborers at Liverpool and othe English ports have united in a strike, and severa vessels waiting for their cargoes have had to be detained because men could not be found t carry them on board. A number of laborer from other districts have been sent to Liverpool to take the place of the men "on strike," bu have been driven away by the threats of the strik ers. Extra police were on duty to protect th new men, but by the latest accounts a grea deal of intimidation was still being employed It is estimated that 35,000 men are on strike i Liverpool alone, and there is some apprehensio that if they ally themselves with the idle sailors of whom there are always a large number loafin about the port, a serious riot might ensue.

A Royal Madman.—The eccentricities of th King of Bavaria are multiplying in a strang manner. Last summer he caused a wonderf sort of water chariot to be constructed an launched on Lake Chiemsee, among the Bava rian Alps, and in this fantastic barque he w drawn about by trained swans, to an accompan ment of Wagner's music. Later on, he was r ported to have been heard, by the people of Mu nich, playing the violin by midnight on the ro of his own palace. Still more recently, he o dered the building of a new palace on an island i the same mountain lake, Chiemsee. It is to b on the plan of Versailles, though far surpassin that in extent and splendor, with a court full statues of warriors, statesmen, and musicians, i marble and bronze, and gardens containing a entire mythology of sculpture.

Pastor Oncken, of Hamburg, the veter pioneer evangelist of Germany, is seriously fa ing in health. In a recent letter he speaks himself as growing daily weaker and weake and unable to attend public worship—a gre deprivation for him—adding, "Nor am I a longer able to take an active part in the spre of the glorious Gospel of Christ—the only gre work in which a Christian can be employed "On earth," he continues, "we shall probab meet no more, but how glorious the prospect meeting where we shall see the King—our glo fied Saviour in all His glory, and be like Him Mr. Oncken enters his eightieth year on t 26th of January. THE LATE REV. REUBEN NELSON, D.D., AGENT OF THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

Birth and Early Conversion.—Ordained a Local Preacher—His Zeal—Obtains an Education through Losing his Arm—His Happy Marriage—Admitted to Oneida Conference—Temporary Loss of his Voice—Twenty-eight Years Principal of Wyoming Seminary—His Brilliant Success—His High Honors—How he Corrected a Young Lady—Appointed Agent of the Book Concern—His Indefatigable Labors—His Illness and Sudden Death—Exalted Character of Dr. Nelson.

IN this eminent minster of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the well-known Book Concern at 805 Broadway has, for the first time in its history, which extends over more than ninety years, lost an agent by death.

The late Dr. Nelson was born in Andes, in the State of New York, on December 13th, 1818, so that at the time of his death he had just entered on the sixty-first year of his age. He was converted to God when fifteen years old, and immediately joined the M. E. Church, and from that time till the close of his life he was a devout, earnest, and active Christian. At the early age of seventeen he was licensed as an exhorter, and in that capacity he evinced such intelligence and faith, and so much zeal for the kingdom of God and the immortal welfare of men, that only a year later he received a local preacher's license. This was a remarkable testimony to the work of the young man, and a promise of the dignity that was to crown his mature age.

Believing himself to be called by his Master to the holy ministry, he had the judgment to realize the importance of having a thorough education, and although there seemed at that time no prospect of his getting it, he adhered to the idea with the tenacity of a strong will. He was then a worker in a wool-carding mill, and, by one of the wonderful compensating providences of God, he lost an arm, which got caught in some part of the machinery. It is related of him that one of his first remarks under this terrible affliction was that his friends would now be obliged to send him to school. That remark betrayed the steadfast purpose and "the immense power of vital energy," as one of the speakers at his funeral called it, which characterized Dr. Nelson through the whole of his active life.

In August, 1840, being then in the twenty-third year of his age, the subject of this notice was admitted on trial into the Oneida Annual Conference, and was appointed as the third preacher on Otsego Circuit, having for his senior colleagues Martin Marvin and William Bixby. Next year he was removed to the Westford Circuit, and about that time he married Miss Eddy, a Christian lady whose character and culture abundantly fitted her to be the companion and helpmeet of him to whom she was united for nearly forty years.

In 1842 Dr. Nelson was admitted into full connection in the Conference, ordained to the order of Deacon, and appointed Principal of the Otsego Academy at Cooperstown, N. Y., which had been already under his supervision for the two preceding years. Near the close of that year a partial paralysis of the vocal organs rendered it impossible for him to speak aloud, and he was compelled for one year to resign his place as Principal of the Academy, while his name was placed for the same time in the list of superannuated preachers. During a portion of that year (1843) he employed himself as a private tutor to teach Latin and Greek to some young men who were preparing for college, though he was gener-

Pennsylvania, and Reuben Nelson was appointed its first principal. He held his position at the head of this school, and conducted its affairs with distinguished success for a period of twenty-eight years, excepting two years, when he was presiding elder of the Wyoming District. During the Conference year of 1868–69 he did double duty, being at the same time presiding elder of the District and Principal of the Seminary.

Bishop Harris, in a eulogy to his memory last week, said, "As a preacher and as a teacher, in the pulpit and in the class-room, his duties were exacting and incessant; still, he met to the full all reasonable demands upon his time and strength, and did it with an unfaltering devotion to all the interests confided to him by the church. Under his wise and vigorous administration, the Wyoming Seminary came to be the chief educational centre in the Wyoming Valley. It stands to-day a monument of his patient toil and unflagging energy, one of the best institutions of its grade in the land. It may be said truthfully, of Dr. Nelson, that as an educator he had few equals, and perhaps no superiors, in his chosen field."

In acknowledgment of his liberal scholarship, and of his success in the line of his profession, Union College conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts, and Dickinson College that of Doctor of Divinity.

AN AMUSING STORY

has been told of the way he cured a young lady in one of his classes of a bad habit of saying ben instead of been. The pupil had often been spoken to about her mispronunciation of the word, but she always forgot what was said to her and fell into her old habit. It happened that at that time she was receiving the addresses of a young man whose Christian name was Benjamin, and one day, on her saying in the presence of Dr. Nelson in her usual way, "I will have ben," etc., the latter turned upon her sharply with the question, "How do you know you will have Ben?" The young lady never said ben any more after that.

In 1852 the Oneida Conference was divided, and Dr. Nelson and his institution were transferred to the newly created Wyoming Conference. In 1858 he was chosen secretary of that body, and was unanimously re-elected at every succeeding session till that of 1870, when, because of the increased demands of other duties, he declined to serve any longer in the office. In 1860 he was chosen a delegate to the General Conference, to meet that year in the city of Buffalo. He was a delegate to each General Conference since that time, receiving, every time, a a larger number of votes than was cast for any other delegate from the Conference, and he was thus placed always at the head of his delegation.

At the session of 1872 Dr. Nelson was elected to the important post of agent of the Methodist Book Concern, in the City of New York, and, with his associate, Mr. J. M. Phillips, took charge of that important publishing house. During the same year he was elected Treasurer of the Methodist Missionary Society, a very responsible post where nearly $1,000,000 are received and disbursed yearly. In 1876 he was unanimously re-elected to both of these positions, which he held till his death. He was also made one of the Managers of the Missionary Society, and at the last General Conference was appointed Chairman of the Standing Committee on Episcopacy. He has also been prominently connected with various other Methodist Church enterprises, his name thus becoming well known in the Church throughout the world.

During the latter part of last year Dr. Nelson supervised alterations then being made in the Book Concern sales-rooms at 805 Broadway, and lasting several weeks. This, in addition to his other duties, which he never remitted, overtaxed his strength, and he succumbed to an attack of malarial fever of a typhoid type about a month
The disease yielded to medical treatment he was able, on the Saturday even-death, to walk about his house; and he received the congratulations of his physician and friends on his improved condition, and he and they hoped to see him fully restored in a short time. But within a very few minute afterward, while walking across the floor, h was suddenly stricken down with paralysis which affected the entire left side of his body He became insensible at once, and continued in that condition, with the exception of two o three brief periods of consciousness, till h death, which occurred on Thursday, Februar 20th, at ten minutes past four in the morning.

On the Tuesday before, hearing he had bee smitten down, Bishop Simpson came to the cit to see him, and was permitted to go to his room It chanced to be during one of the most ration moments which he had. The Bishop aske Brother M'Cabe, who was in the room, to sin a verse, and as he sang,

> "Other refuge have I none, > Hangs my helpless soul on Thee," that tongue which had been able to utter scarce a word distinctly pronounced "Amen." The at the request of Mrs. Nelson, Dr. Simps knelt by the bedside and prayed. The dying mi ister was deeply affected, and said "Amen" number of times.

"It was," said the Bishop, "a short int view, for he was able to speak only a very f words, but it was a precious occasion to n showing that while heart and flesh were faili God was the strength of his heart, and his p tion forever" (Psa. 73 : 26).

The funeral services were held on Saturd February 22d, at St. Paul's Methodist Episco Church, Fourth Avenue, in the presence of large concourse of the ministry and laity of t Methodist Church. The employes of the Bo Concern marched to the church in processi and upwards of one hundred ladies belonging the house were in a line by themselves. Bish Harris gave an account of the deceased's life, which we are indebted for some of the parti lars in this sketch. The remains were conve the same evening to Wilkesbarre, Penn., wh they lay all Sunday at the house of his son law, Mr. Geo. T. Bennett, a well-known ban of that place. On Monday they were buried Forty Fort Cemetery, at Kingston, which long the place of Dr. Nelson's residence and scene of his labors.

Now that he has gone before us to his eter home, it is appropriate to speak of the g purity of character which was the secret of immense moral influence over other men. was simple, frank, and earnest as a child; ter and affectionate in his family; genial and able in his friendship. He possessed a kindn and sympathy which bound him to all wh whom he was much in contact, and there re thousands of men and women whom he edu ed, scattered now in different States, who h his name embalmed in their memories. is love was the love of Christ, and he was instru mental in opening it up to very many hundreds of souls.

"Overcoming Evil with Good" (Romans xii. 21).—The following incident, which occurred at Ventry, in Ireland, is related in the life of the Rev. Godfrey Massy: "A boat's crew of converts, whilst fishing, had been assailed by a boatful of infuriated Romanists. In the eagerness of pursuit one of the assailants dropped his oar; the crew gave a cry of distress, for the helpless boat was now borne out by the strong current to the ocean. A convert sprang into the sea, followed the oar, and brought it in his teeth to the enemy. The two boats were rowed back silently side by side, and on reaching the shore the crews shook hands with each other. The brave act of the Christian convert had made peace." This was after an interdict from the priest had caused all verbal correspondence to cease. But though he could evoke an evil spirit, he could not prevent a stronger and a better one from counteracting it.

A LETTER FROM A CITY PRISON,

ich a man said, "Three years ago I was happy, in the Church of Christ, in Balti- . I was prominent in all good things, but I nto evil associations and wandered away, ny prayer now to God is almost a mockery; et I cannot help but cry out, God be merci- me, a sinner!" And when I had read that I said, Here is another illustration of the hat God is very slow to give a man up.

u may have thought that

would have almost rotted down before the people got in. For more than a century the door of that ark had been standing open, waiting for the people to come in, and if, according to Christian scientists, some of all kinds of creatures went into that ark, then there were 5000 kinds of birds that went in, and 2000 kinds of reptiles, and 100,000 kinds of insects that went in, and while they were going in and the forage for that great multitude of living creatures was being shipped for that strange voyage, most certainly there was time for all the people to get in; but they stayed outside, and God waited and called, twenty years, fifty years, a hundred years, a hundred and ten years, a hundred and twenty years, crying out, "How shall I give thee up?"

But why, my friends, should we go so far for an illustration, when we can find thousands of illustrations in this room to-night. I could come to the man only a little way seated from you, and I could show you in the history of that man how slow God is to cast a man off; but I will not stop there: I will come to your own soul, and illustrate the truth which I am to-night to present.

I want to show

HOW GOD IS MOVING UPON YOUR SOUL

for its salvation, and how slow he has been to cast you off and give you up; and to-night he stands with outspread arms waiting for this entire assemblage to come and take eternal life.

The first move that Christ made for your salvation, as near as I can understand it, was in Anno Domini 1. The meteor that swung out above Bethlehem was kindled for you. He laid aside His glory, and from the swaddling-clothes of the manger, from your Lord the King, behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for this day is born in the City of David, Jesus, which is Christ the Lord.

But I go down to the year Anno Domini 33. Hark! the crash of the mountain shivering at the martyrdom of a God! Behold His outstretched hands, wounded clean through, and look at His lacerated feet! Hear His cry, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." For whom was He praying? For you. Hear Him say, "It is finished." What did He mean? Your salvation.

Can it be that eighteen hundred years ago He began to plan for your salvation? Can it be that two thousand years before you were born He was effecting your redemption? Behold the height, behold the depth, behold the length, behold the breadth of the love of God; for you the tears, for you the heartaches, for you the weary journey, for you the blood, for you the sepulchre—all for you.

> "Was it for crimes that I had done
> He groaned upon the tree?
> Amazing pity, grace unknown,
> And love beyond degree."

But the second move that God made for your salvation was in

THE DAYS OF YOUR CHILDHOOD.

I do not know whether it was the picture of Samuel or of Christ, or the whisper of a Christian aunt, or a father's counsel, or a Bible lesson; but I am right when I say that in the history of all of you during the days of your childhood God mightily moved for your salvation. You know within the first fifteen years of your life you ought to have become a child of God. Perhaps you ran your little fingers over the keys of the piano, or plunged into amusement in order to hide this feeling of the soul, that you might drown it out; but still God's Holy Spirit was moving upon your heart, and He was saying in all those days of our childhood, How shall I give thee up?

I think th move God made for your salvation w ur father's house. Sickness came nber the consternation on the fac night when his soul went away from you, and you remember the vendue when the furniture was sold, and you remember when you moved into a smaller house, and you remember the sensation of nailing the old pictures to the new wall, and you remember how hard it was for you to get used to the new surroundings. There God stood amid all that desolation of your early days, and amid all that bereavement, saying, Come to Me: I will be thy Father, I will be thy friend; how shall I give thee up?

The next move God made for your salvation was when you established your own home.

THE MARRIAGE DAY

came and went; there was a great day of brightness in the household; every thing that heart could wish.

Years passed on, and there were many bright adornments in the household, but none so bright as the bright eye that looked up to you from the little one. Days of hilarity they were, days of indescribable joy; but there came a cold and a chill and a fever, and a prayer to God for the recovery that did not seem to be answered, the putting way of the loved one out of your sight, a day of darkness and of heart-breaking, and God stood amid that desolation of your home, saying, Come to Me, and I will comfort you in your distress; look upward to the bright world where your little one has gone; all shall be well. Trust in My grace; I will never leave thee; I will never forsake thee. These trials I have sent for your redemption. How shall I give thee up?

I think that the next move God made for your salvation was in the upturning of your worldly fortunes. There was some

CHANGE IN YOUR FINANCIAL CONDITION.

Perhaps you had some useless machinery thrown on your hands, or you bought some unsalable goods, or you were over-persuaded to make an indorsement; the property went, the men who were proud to walk by your side forsook your acquaintanceship, you were cast out by the circles where you were proud to move, and there were duns and there were insults and there were outrages indescribable inflicted upon your soul; and there God stood amid the shipwreck of your worldly fortunes, saying, Seek those treasures which are in banks that never break: earth fails you, but I will be your God, I will be your portion forever. Through these financial distresses I have come for the redemption of your soul; yield your heart now unto My keeping. How shall I give thee up?

The fact is, there is not a man in this house that has not been moved upon a thousand times by God's invitations and warnings. Every evening of every week-day there are bankers and brokers and merchants and mechanics, who leave their office or store or shop, and go home never to return; and if a fire should break out to-night on Fulton Street, or Broadway, or Wall Street, they would not go to see it. They have passed away from the sight of this world; they have passed away forever.

Oh! how God has warned some of you by taking away those who were your companions and partners in business! Day after day and hour after hour He has called and called. Through all the changes of life the air is filled with rumors of disaster. Some slip down after awhile upon the ice. Some fall between the bridge and the boat, some drop down with heart-disease or apoplexy. Some pass out this life without any preparation for the eternal world, and so God has warned and warned and called and called, saying, How shall I give thee up?

I would not, however, my friends, have you think that because you have rejected all past opportunities of salvation, that God therefore turns His back upon you to nstead of your kneeling before God fore you, and p affection and Why will ye not My hu

Well, my friends, if God is so slow to give a man up, that teaches me it teaches all Christian workers a lesson. Perhaps many years ago you were united at the marriage altar; the record was made on the church book, the record made on the county book. Were you married only for time? or were you married both for time and eternity? Let me say to any Christian husband or Christian wife, Never surrender the eternal salvation of your companion.

Amid a great throng of people who pressed into the sessional room in Philadelphia to profess faith in Jesus Christ, there was who led her husband by the hand, and sne said to me, "Mr. Talmage, I've brought him at last; for all these twenty years I have been praying for his salvation, and when I spoke to him about his soul it angered him; when I invited him to the house of God, he jeered at all Christian institutions; but I kept on imploring God for his salvation, I implored him by the value of our own union on earth and by the worth of the soul of the only child that God had given us; and for the sake of the Lord Jesus I implored God for the salvation of my husband. The people said, It is no use; your prayers will never be answered. But my prayers have been answered, and I have got him here to-night, and I wish you would ask him some questions?"

I said to him, "Sir, do you feel that you are a sinner before God?" "Oh!" he says, "that has been the story all the way through." I said to him, "Are you willing now to give your heart into the keeping of God for time and eternity?" He said, "I am." I said, "Would you like the ordinance of baptism to be administered, and would you like to sit at the holy sacrament, and would you like to be united with the people of God?" "I would," he said; and while we were standing there I put the hand of the husband into the hand of the wife, and I said, "You have been married for time: now be married for eterhity; let the angels of God be the witnesses." While standing there I said to her, "Then your child will no doubt soon be coming to Christ and be coming into the church?" And she said, "Oh! I forgot her in my anxiety for my husband's salvation, but I have brought her, too, and here she is: ask her a few questions?" I thought how the Lord Jesus took little children in His arms and blessed them, and I said, "Mary, do you love the Lord?" and she said, "I do;" and I said to her, "Would you like to join your father and mother on the road to heaven?" and she said, "I would;" and then and there all three marched out on the road to heaven.

O husband! O wife! never give up the salvation of your companion. Now in these days, when God is blessing you with health and prosperity, surrender your heart to the Lord who bought you. Pray on five years, ten years, twenty years, forty years, if need be; and God, who is the answerer of prayer, will just as certainly answer as you sit there and I stand here. The desire of your heart will be answered in the salvation of your beloved companion. But I go further and say, no parent ought ever give up the salvation of a child. Oh this tender relationship of parent and child!

A MAN CAME TO MY HOUSE

during a very great storm. He came on an errand, and as he was passing out of the door he said to me, "It is three weeks ago to-day since we put away our little girl from our sight." I said to him, "Was it sudden?" He said, "It was very sudden; it was scarlet fever." But as he went [illegible] said to me, "There [illegible] and my wife very [illegible] at?" "Well," [illegible] one." Then [illegible] mbition of

When God takes your little child from your arms He takes it into glory. I have heard of men on earth who believe there are cases where infants are lost forever: I have heard such things, but I do not believe such a man ever existed in all the ages of the church. I do not believe there was ever a man who really believed the soul of an infant was lost.

The dear children go out of our arms into the embrace of the Lord Jesus, to be happy forever; but suppose our children come up to years of discretion and through evil example they go off into paths of dissipation, away from God and away from heaven, running all the rounds of iniquity, and then lose their souls. God forbid that that shall be the history of any one in any of our households. Do not give up that son. Many a parent has prayed a son back from Omaha, prayed him back from San Francisco, or from Mount Blanc, or from Canton, or from Peking. Although that son may be on the other side of the world, if you can go before God in supplication, He may start by the first ship for his father's house. Oh be earnest in your prayer; you cannot afford to give up your child. If you come down to old age, with your wrinkled hand take hold the strong arm of God and bear your gray hairs in His bosom, while you offer the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man, that availeth much.

Give up your boy! You cannot afford to give him up. By the cradle in which you rocked him, by the bosom in which you nursed him, by the God to whom you consecrated him, do not dare to give him up.

But now that I have preached nine tenths of the sermon to you, may I not preach one tenth of the sermon to myself, and say to myself as a minister of the Gospel, while I say it to all Christian ministers who may be in the house, let none of us ever dare to give our beloved people up.

I HAVE SET MY HEART ON ONE THING,

and that is the eternal salvation of my beloved church. If you do not come to God it will be to me, it seems, an eternity of disappointment.

Look oft to-night upon this august assemblage, and realize the fact that there are hundreds tramping on towards the eternal world without any preparation, and I must cry out in their hearing, with alarm, O my brethren, to-night I heap up a barrier between you and death—a barrier made out of Bibles, and on the top of the Bibles I heap up the communion-tables where you have been invited to sit, and on the top of that barrier I heap up the pulpits that have invited you to Christ, and then I stand on the top of that barrier with the drawn sword of God's truth, two edged, to fight you back from your own eternal destruction. Oh, climb not over the barrier; get back, get down; now is the day of salvation! How can I give thee up?

But there is one thing I forgot. While my text represents God as slow to give a man up, there seems to be an indication that there are times when He is compelled so to do; in other words, a man may go so far on in the rejection of God's mercy, and he may so often, and once too often, resist the influence of God's Holy Spirit until there are written in God's holy book of remembrance two words, "Given up!" And as the Holy Spirit takes His final flight from the soul and closes forever against it the door of mercy, He cries, "Given up!" and the cheek blanching, the truth must be announced that notwithstanding all that God had done through these years for the man's eternal salvation he is everlastingly "given up"!

"Sinner, perhaps this very day
  Thy last accepted time may be:
Oh! shouldst thou grie[illegible] now away,
  Then hope may nev[illegible] thee."

And so I have sounded [illegible] ngs of great joy for all the people. [illegible] ites, the door of mercy is open, [illegible] ady. Come one and all, no [illegible]; whatever your sir [illegible], whatever your wa [illegible] soul. "Le [illegible] nrighte

"Bow the knee and kiss the Son;

e Escaped Nun Loses Her Way—Her Diffi-ulties in Finding a Friend—Sets out on a Twelve-mile Walk to the Protestant Arch-ishop of Armagh—The Convent Bell—She is Found on the Road in a Swoon by Four Orange-nen.

THE street Felicia passed up was broad and ll lighted by the gas-lamps and the bright shop idows. The first turn, however, led into a rrow and dim thoroughfare, the aspect of which l not assure her. Immured, too, as in a prison years, in the presence only of women, and ver seeing one of the sterner sex save the two three priests who ministered in the convent, : sight of so many rude and rough men on the vement passing to and fro—some of them half ink and staggering across her path—unnerved :. A woman, likewise, with a sick child in bed her house, and standing at her door on the kout for Dr. Magrath, who often passed that y, rushed at his simulacrum, and "will it" "nill it," would have from it a visit to her larlin' ailing bairn."

Felicia Cuffe knew she durst not speak—one rd from her and her ruse would be detected. th all the force she could command she shook the woman's hold from her cloak and pro-ded down the path before her and with more id step, as though the supposed doctor were most urgent business. With any thing but a nplimentary speech upon her tongue, the ther, who felt, of course, that no case could more important than that of her sick child, lowed with an angry eye the well-known cap l cloak as the wearer of them retreated in the kness.

The rencontre with this uncouth specimen of : sex did not add to the self-possession of the eing nun, and also her speed deceived her. e passed beyond the next proper turn, took soon erwards what she supposed the one laid down her plan, hurried along it, and expected speed- to reach Dr. Wilson's dwelling. When she ched what she judged must be its locality, no ch house as she knew his must be was visible. s-lamps still bordered the way, but they re-aled not respectable dwellings, but a long ige of miserable cabins.

Perhaps the house she was in search of was ther on. Oh, how she longed to be free to ke inquiry! but she felt she must ask no ques-ns. She was a fugitive nun, and she had the gacity to perceive that all the dwellers in these ualid homes along the road were, with scarcely exception, ignorant and fanatical Roman tholics. Her voice arousing suspicion would d to the drawing aside by some rude hand of r folded cloak, her nun's dress would be recog-ized, and the whole district would soon be in a ment.

Depending upon her own judgment and obser-tion, she must, therefore, go further on, and pe sooner or later to find the haven of refuge e so panted for; but the further she went the ore evident it became that either Dr. Magrath ve her a wrong direction or that she had failed follow the right one. She came to where the t gas-lamp stood, and then looked up the road yond into the outer darkness. There she lted in perplexity and dread, and anxiously estioned within herself what must be her next nduct.

Felicia Cuffe had now indeed escaped out the convent walls, but, ignorant of where to and attired in the strange disguise of Dr. grath's cap and cloak, she began to discover at her position was surrounded by difficulties. licia's first thought was to retrace her steps, back to the first turning she had taken, regain r clue, and from that point recommence her grimage; but then she reflected that her flight m the convent was now known, that both the ests and elder nuns in connection with that ablishment would resolve upon pursuit, and that if recaptured, upon the plausible representation that she was a religieuse temporarily out of her mind, and who had broken from her keepers, she would be carried back to captivity.

She knew well what that now would mean—a more despairing and merciless condition of bondage. No; the risk of such a fate was not to be contemplated. While she stood thus in self-debate the sound of the wheels of a cart was heard some distance up the dark road before her, and she moved towards it. Perhaps some one was leading it that would befriend her. It was one of those well-known, long-heeled Northern drays, so common in Ulster, and was heavily laden with undressed linen. The carter was a tall, muscular, and hoarse-voiced man, that every now and then cracked his long whip with the report of a pistol-shot, and shouted to his horse stentoriously.

Felicia Cuffe, when, mutually moving towards each other, they met, had only courage to ask him what road she was on. Perceiving from the voice it was a woman that spoke, "Lassie," was his reply, "it's a dark night and a lone place for one the likes o' you to be out o' yer reckonin'. But ye be on the road till Armagh, which is twel' mile on. I've just cum it, and an up and down journey it is, for, as I dar' say ye have heard, that 'for all the world like a baskit o' eggs is Armagh county,' meanin', ye onderstand, that it's wan big gatherin' o' wee hillocks. So it is, me lass; and if you'll tak' me advice ye'll not thry it." He then added, "Upon my conscience that looks a warm cap you've on yer head, and yet ye seem cowld" (she trembled with fear). "But come alang wi' me to the inn, honey, and I'll giv' ye somethin' warm."

As may be supposed, Felicia Cuffe did not accept this ill or well meant invitation. She stood silent, and after a little the man, feeling that he must see to his horse, which had kept moving on while he had stopped to speak to his interrogator, bid her "gude night," hastened up to his cart, and the young nun was left alone in the darkness.

Armagh—she had heard of Armagh, and that the Protestant Primate had his palace there; and it was, as she had been now told, but twelve miles before her. If only she were there she would throw herself upon the kindness of his Grace, and would crave his protection. Could she walk twelve miles? Why not? The man she had just spoken to had done the distance, and evidently without fatigue. It was true she felt a little tired. "But never lose heart," she said, within herself. "It will a progress to freedom, and the boon is worth the endurance of any toil and difficulty." Thus the poor fugitive thought and reasoned. She had but a false estimate of her own capability, and little knew what a journey on foot of twelve miles would be to one like her. Under this misapprehension she resolved to push on towards the city of refuge lying before her. It was not long before she reached an ascent upon the road. It stretched over one of those hillocks of which the carter had warned her, and, only slightly reducing her pace, she set herself to breast it.

If the spirit, however, was willing, the flesh was weak. She began to breathe quickly; her side gave her pain. After a while she only staggered on; and then, when near the summit of the hill, all her strength exhausted, she was forced to stop and was glad to sit down upon a heap of stones that had been gathered to the roadside.

While she pondered this question, and her thoughts moved to and fro, a bell rang out from the far-off town. Moderated by the distance, yet distinct, the sounds of it floated upon the air up to where the young nun was seated. It was the convent bell, that was summoning the inmates to the nunnery chapel for the nine-o'clock service. A bell of much feebler tone would have answered all the purpose so far as the nuns were concerned, but no nunnery bell is of feeble tone. Its toll heard over a whose town will, it is clear, give the whole town to know the devoutness of the celibate sisterhood.

It is true a Divine teacher has said, "When thou prayest, shut thy door and pray in secret" (Matt. 6:6); but convents are the institutions of a church that has set aside Scripture injunction for a rule and method that will gain the notice and applause of ignorant and superstitious men by striking their imagination. In a moment Felicia Cuffe recognized the tones that reached her. Often had the ringing of that bell sounded to her as the knell of her dead hopes. It brought again before her mind in all their force the miseries of her captivity. No; never again will she move one step towards the place of her dungeon. She sprang to her feet, renewed her onward path, soon overtopped the hill, which, as she descended it on the other side, shut from her view the dome of light over the town she had quitted.

There were very few houses beside the road on which she travelled, but she could perceive that the whole country on either hand was well set with dwellings—points of light, from windows, far and wide, twinkled like stars. Sometimes alone, and sometimes in twos and threes, they spangled hill and valley. In England the field-hands live in villages, which not seldom are miles apart, without a house between; but it is not thus in Ireland, and especially in Armagh. The whole county is divided, as a rule, into small farms. On each the proprietor has his cottage dwelling—in which, also, for the most part, is a linen-loom, which he can work at on wet days, and thus add to his income. Felicia Cuffe heard the distant shuttle-noise of some of those looms as she advanced on her journey. The baying of dogs, too, saluted the night. The sound was melancholy, yet it had this advantage—it denoted the presence of living creatures, and that so far relieved the loneliness and darkness around her.

We must leave her on the road to Armagh for a little, and ask you to imagine what her thoughts and feelings must have been as she faintly and wearily—"with toilsome steps and slow"—urged on her way. Meanwhile we draw attention to a group of men that, two hours after Felicia Cuffe heard the convent bell, were some miles on, trudging the same Armagh road, but in a direction the opposite of that in which the young nun was moving.

There are four of them—John McAdam, Roger McIlroy, Andy Boyd, and Alick Cummin. They have been to an Orange lodge, for the times are threatening. The Repeal Movement is all afoot. The Government is at its wits' end, cannot trust malcontents, and is in need of loyal men. Orangemen, whatever other faults they may have—and they have many, some people say—are loyal to the backbone. The authorities are well aware of this, and though in safe times they are wont to snub them, the powers that be were now coquetting with the Orange confederation, and had even hinted that, if matters were carried much further by the Repealers, they would distribute arms to the Orangemen.

It was to make known this fact, as communicated to him from Dublin, that the master of the Orange lodge at the village of ——, seven miles from Armagh, had summoned the meeting at which the before-mentioned men, as in duty bound, were present. We are sorry to have to add that, after the business of the lodge was over, the four friends whose names we have given

While standing there I said to her, "Then your child will no doubt soon be coming to Christ and be coming into the church?" And she said, "Oh! I forgot her in my anxiety for my husband's salvation, but I have brought her, too, and here she is: ask her a few questions?" I thought how the Lord Jesus took little children in His arms and blessed them, and I said, "Mary, do you love the Lord?" and she said, "I do;" and I said to her, "Would you like to join your father and mother on the road to heaven?" and she said, "I would;" and then and there all three marched out on the road to heaven.

O husband! O wife! never give up the salvation of your companion. Now in these days, when God is blessing you with health and prosperity, surrender your heart to the Lord who bought you. Pray on five years, ten years, twenty years, forty years, if need be; and God, who is the answerer of prayer, will just as certainly answer as you sit there and I stand here. The desire of your heart will be answered in the salvation of your beloved companion. But I go further and say, no parent ought ever give up the salvation of a child. Oh this tender relationship of parent and child!

A MAN CAME TO MY HOUSE

during a very great storm. He came on an errand, and as he was passing out of the door he said to me, "It is three weeks ago to-day since we put away our little girl from our sight." I said to him, "Was it sudden?" He said, "It was very sudden; it was scarlet fever." But as he went out at [illegible] said to me, "There [illegible] and my wife very [illegible] at?" When God takes your little child from your arms He takes it into glory. I have heard of men on earth who believe there are cases where infants are lost forever: I have heard such things, but I do not believe such a man ever existed in all the ages of the church. I do not believe there was ever a man who really believed the soul of an infant was lost.

The dear children go out of our arms into the embrace of the Lord Jesus, to be happy forever; but suppose our children come up to years of discretion and through evil example they go off into paths of dissipation, away from God and away from heaven, running all the rounds of iniquity, and then lose their souls. God forbid that that shall be the history of any one in any of our households. Do not give up that son. Many a parent has prayed a son back from Omaha, prayed him back from San Francisco, or from Mount Blanc, or from Canton, or from Peking. Although that son may be on the other side of the world, if you can go before God in supplication, He may start by the first ship for his father's house. Oh be earnest in your prayer; you cannot afford to give up your child. If you come down to old age, with your wrinkled hand take hold the strong arm of God and bear your gray hairs in His bosom, while you offer the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man, that availeth much.

Give up your boy! You cannot afford to give him up. By the cradle in which you rocked him, by the bosom in which you nursed him, by the God to whom you consecrated him, do not dare to give him up.

But now that I have preached nine tenths of the sermon to you, may I not preach one tenth of the sermon to myself, and say to myself as a minister of the Gospel, while I say it to all Christian ministers who may be in the house, let none of us ever dare to give our beloved people up.

I HAVE SET MY HEART ON ONE THING,

and that is the eternal salvation of my beloved church. If you do not come to God it will be to me, it seems, an eternity of disappointment.

Look oft to-night upon this august assemblage, and realize the fact that there are hundreds tramping on towards the eternal world without any preparation, and I must cry out in their hearing, with alarm, O my brethren, to-night I heap up a barrier between you and death—a barrier made out of Bibles, and on the top of the Bibles I heap up the communion-tables where you have been invited to sit, and on the top of that barrier I heap up the pulpits that have invited you to Christ, and then I stand on the top of that barrier with the drawn sword of God's truth, two edged, to fight you back from your own eternal destruction. Oh, climb not over the barrier; get back, get down; now is the day of salvation! How can I give thee up?

But there is one thing I forgot. While my text represents God as slow to give a man up, there seems to be an indication that there are times when He is compelled so to do; in other words, a man may go so far on in the rejection of God's mercy, and he may so often, and once too often, resist the influence of God's Holy Spirit until there are written in God's holy book of remembrance two words, "Given up!" And as the Holy Spirit takes His final flight from the soul and closes forever against it the door of mercy, He cries, "Given up!" and the cheek blanching, the truth must be announced that notwithstanding all that God had done through these years for the man's eternal salvation he is everlastingly "given up"!

"Sinner, perhaps this very day
Thy last accepted time may be:
Oh! shouldst thou grie[illegible] now away,
Then hope may nev[illegible] on thee."

And so I have sounded [illegible] of great joy for all the people. [illegible] the door of mercy is open, [illegible] Come one and all, no[illegible] whatever your sin[illegible] whatever your wa[illegible] soul. "Le[illegible] nrighte[illegible]

Escaped Nun Loses Her Way—Her Diffi- ies in Finding a Friend—Sets out on a elve-mile Walk to the Protestant Arch- op of Armagh—The Convent Bell—She is nd on the Road in a Swoon by Four Orange- .

E street Felicja passed up was broad and ighted by the gas-lamps and the bright shop ows. The first turn, however, led into a w and dim thoroughfare, the aspect of which ot assure her. Immured, too, as in a prison ears, in the presence only of women, and seeing one of the sterner sex save the two ree priests who ministered in the convent, ight of so many rude and rough men on the ment passing to and fro—some of them half k and staggering across her path—unnerved A woman, likewise, with a sick child in bed r house, and standing at her door on the out for Dr. Magrath, who often passed that rushed at his simulacrum, and "will it" nill it," would have from it a visit to her rlin' ailing bairn."

licia Cuffe knew she durst not speak—one from her and her ruse would be detected. all the force she could command she shook he woman's hold from her cloak and pro- ed down the path before her and with more step, as though the supposed doctor were ost urgent business. With any thing but a plimentary speech upon her tongue, the her, who felt, of course, that no case could ore important than that of her sick child, wed with an angry eye the well-known cap cloak as the wearer of them retreated in the ness.

he rencontre with this uncouth specimen of sex did not add to the self-possession of the ng nun, and also her speed deceived her. passed beyond the next proper turn, took soon rwards what she supposed the one laid down er plan, hurried along it, and expected speed- o reach Dr. Wilson's dwelling. When she hed what she judged must be its locality, no house as she knew his must be was visible. -lamps still bordered the way, but they re- led not respectable dwellings, but a long ge of miserable cabins.

erhaps the house she was in search of was her on. Oh, how she longed to be free to ke inquiry! but she felt she must ask no ques- ns. She was a fugitive nun, and she had the acity to perceive that all the dwellers in these alid homes along the road were, with scarcely exception, ignorant and fanatical Roman holics. Her voice arousing suspicion would d to the drawing aside by some rude hand of folded cloak, her nun's dress would be recog- ed, and the whole district would soon be in a ment.

epending upon her own judgment and obser- ion, she must, therefore, go further on, and pe sooner or later to find the haven of refuge so panted for; but the further she went the re evident it became that either Dr. Magrath ve her a wrong direction or that she had failed follow the right one. She came to where the t gas-lamp stood, and then looked up the road yond into the outer darkness. There she lted in perplexity and dread, and anxiously estioned within herself what must be her next nduct.

Felicia Cuffe had now indeed escaped out the convent walls, but, ignorant of where to and attired in the strange disguise of Dr. agrath's cap and cloak, she began to discover at her position was surrounded by difficulties. licia's first thought was to retrace her steps, back to the first turning she had taken, regain r clue, and from that point recommence her lgrimage; but then she reflected that her flight om the convent was now known, that both the iests and elder nuns in connection with that tablishment would resolve upon pursuit, and that if recaptured, upon the plausible representation that she was a religieuse temporarily out of her mind, and who had broken from her keepers, she would be carried back to captivity.

She knew well what that now would mean—a more despairing and merciless condition of bondage. No; the risk of such a fate was not to be contemplated. While she stood thus in self-debate the sound of the wheels of a cart was heard some distance up the dark road before her, and she moved towards it. Perhaps some one was leading it that would befriend her. It was one of those well-known, long-heeled Northern drays, so common in Ulster, and was heavily laden with undressed linen. The carter was a tall, muscular, and hoarse-voiced man, that every now and then cracked his long whip with the report of a pistol-shot, and shouted to his horse stentoriously.

Felicia Cuffe, when, mutually moving towards each other, they met, had only courage to ask him what road she was on. Perceiving from the voice it was a woman that spoke, "Lassie," was his reply, "it's a dark night and a lone place for one the likes o' you to be out o' yer reckonin'. But ye be on the road till Armagh, which is twel' mile on. I've just cum it, and an up and down journey it is, for, as I dar' say ye have heard, that 'for all the world like a baskit o' eggs is Armagh county,' meanin', ye onderstand, that it's wan big gatherin' o' wee hillocks. So it is, me lass; and if you'll tak' me advice ye'll not thry it." He then added, "Upon my conscience that looks a warm cap you've on yer head, and yet ye seem cowld" (she trembled with fear). "But come alang wi' me to the inn, honey, and I'll giv' ye somethin' warm."

As may be supposed, Felicia Cuffe did not accept this ill or well meant invitation. She stood silent, and after a little the man, feeling that he must see to his horse, which had kept moving on while he had stopped to speak to his interrogator, bid her "gude night," hastened up to his cart, and the young nun was left alone in the darkness.

Armagh—she had heard of Armagh, and that the Protestant Primate had his palace there; and it was, as she had been now told, but twelve miles before her. If only she were there she would throw herself upon the kindness of his Grace, and would crave his protection. Could she walk twelve miles? Why not? The man she had just spoken to had done the distance, and evidently without fatigue. It was true she felt a little tired. "But never lose heart," she said, within herself. "It will a progress to freedom, and the boon is worth the endurance of any toil and difficulty." Thus the poor fugitive thought and reasoned. She had but a false estimate of her own capability, and little knew what a journey on foot of twelve miles would be to one like her. Under this misapprehension she resolved to push on towards the city of refuge lying before her. It was not long before she reached an ascent upon the road. It stretched over one of those hillocks of which the carter had warned her, and, only slightly reducing her pace, she set herself to breast it.

If the spirit, however, was willing, the flesh was weak. She began to breathe quickly; her side gave her pain. After a while she only staggered on; and then, when near the summit of the hill, all her strength exhausted, she was forced to stop and was glad to sit down upon a heap of stones that had been gathered to the roadside.

While she pondered this question, and her thoughts moved to and fro, a bell rang out from the far-off town. Moderated by the distance, yet distinct, the sounds of it floated upon the air up to where the young nun was seated. It was the convent bell, that was summoning the inmates to the nunnery chapel for the nine-o'clock service. A bell of much feebler tone would have answered all the purpose so far as the nuns were concerned, but no nunnery bell is of feeble tone. Its toll heard over a whose town will, it is clear, give the whole town to know the devoutness of the celibate sisterhood.

It is true a Divine teacher has said, "When thou prayest, shut thy door and pray in secret" (Matt. 6 : 6); but convents are the institutions of a church that has set aside Scripture injunction for a rule and method that will gain the notice and applause of ignorant and superstitious men by striking their imagination. In a moment Felicia Cuffe recognized the tones that reached her. Often had the ringing of that bell sounded to her as the knell of her dead hopes. It brought again before her mind in all their force the miseries of her captivity. No; never again will she move one step towards the place of her dungeon. She sprang to her feet, renewed her onward path, soon overtopped the hill, which, as she descended it on the other side, shut from her view the dome of light over the town she had quitted.

There were very few houses beside the road on which she travelled, but she could perceive that the whole country on either hand was well set with dwellings—points of light, from windows, far and wide, twinkled like stars. Sometimes alone, and sometimes in twos and threes, they spangled hill and valley. In England the field-hands live in villages, which not seldom are miles apart, without a house between; but it is not thus in Ireland, and especially in Armagh. The whole county is divided, as a rule, into small farms. On each the proprietor has his cottage dwelling—in which, also, for the most part, is a linen-loom, which he can work at on wet days, and thus add to his income. Felicia Cuffe heard the distant shuttle-noise of some of those looms as she advanced on her journey. The baying of dogs, too, saluted the night. The sound was melancholy, yet it had this advantage—it denoted the presence of living creatures, and that so far relieved the loneliness and darkness around her.

We must leave her on the road to Armagh for a little, and ask you to imagine what her thoughts and feelings must have been as she faintly and wearily—"with toilsome steps and slow"—urged on her way. Meanwhile we draw attention to a group of men that, two hours after Felicia Cuffe heard the convent bell, were some miles on, trudging the same Armagh road, but in a direction the opposite of that in which the young nun was moving.

There are four of them—John McAdam, Roger McIlroy, Andy Boyd, and Alick Cummin. They have been to an Orange lodge, for the times are threatening. The Repeal Movement is all afoot. The Government is at its wits' end, cannot trust malcontents, and is in need of loyal men. Orangemen, whatever other faults they may have—and they have many, some people say—are loyal to the backbone. The authorities are well aware of this, and though in safe times they are wont to snub them, the powers that be were now coquetting with the Orange confederation, and had even hinted that, if matters were carried much further by the Repealers, they would distribute arms to the Orangemen.

It was to make known this fact, as communicated to him from Dublin, that the master of the Orange lodge at the village of ——, seven miles from Armagh, had summoned the meeting at which the before-mentioned men, as in duty bound, were present. We are sorry to have to add that, after the business of the lodge was over, the four friends whose names we have given had, as often happens in such cases, stepped into a "shebeen" house on the way home, to have "jest a glass o' sperrits." The single glass, perhaps, in one or two cases was increased to two, for there is a mysterious tendency, as is well known, in these fascinating doses to double themselves in self-prescription.

However, between the excitement of the lodge meeting and the news heard there, and the force of the imbibed stimulant, the aforesaid John McAdam, Roger McIlroy, Andy Boyd, and Alick Cummin were in a somewhat rollicking condition. Every now and then they broke the silence of night by singing a stanza of "The Boyne Water." As it is a fine and quaint old ballad, and is one not known to everybody, we are tempted to give the words of a verse or two—words which these jovial companions were vociferously shouting:

> "July the first, in Oldbridge town,
>   There was a grievous battle,
> When many a man lay on the groun'
>   And cannons they did rattle.
>
> King James he pitched his tents between
>   The lines, for to retire,
> But William sent his bomb-balls in,
>   And set them all on fire."

After describing William's wound in the shoulder, as grazed by a cannon-ball, and the dismay of his men when they thought he had been fatally hurt, the ballad thus continues:

> "Duke Schombergh then, with friendly care,
>   His King did often caution
> To shun the place where bullets hot
>   Retained their rapid motion.
>
> "But William said, 'He don't deserve
>   The name of 'Faith's Defender,'
> Who would not venture life and limb
>   To make the foe surrender.' "

As is well known, the leader that fell in passing over the river that ran between the hostile armies was the brave veteran Huguenot, Schombergh himself. The ballad sings of this, and then proceeds:

> "When valiant Schomberg he was slain,
>   King William then accosted
> His warlike men for to march on,
>   And he would be the foremost.
>
> 'Brave boys,' he said, 'be not dismayed
>   For the loss of one commander;
> For God this day will be our guide,
>   And I'll be general under.' "

These are but three verses of a ballad of several verses in length, the singing of which never fails to stir the blood of Protestant hearts in the North of Ireland. The men we now speak of went through them all in their vocal concert, from the first to the last, and had reached the closing lines of the last verse, which run thus:

> "To God above the praise we'll give,
>   Both now and ever after;
> And bless the glorious memory
>   Of him that crossed the water,"—

when Andy Boyd's foot came in contact with something on the road.

Politeness of the Chinese.—At the opening of the Great Exhibition of 1851, a Chinaman took his place among the ambassadors and representatives of foreign nations. He bore himself with as much dignity and behaved with as much courtesy as the most aristocratic diplomatist in the brilliant circle. Yet he was only the carpenter of a Chinese junk then in the Thames, whom the directors of the Exhibition borrowed for pictorial effect in the procession. On surprise being expressed at his demeanor to an old Shanghai merchant, his reply was that "every Chinaman is taught manners at school as part of his ordinary education." Here is a hint to School Boards in other countries.

PESTILENTIAL PERIHELIA IN 1880 to 1885.

"Great signs shall there be from heaven."—LUKE 21 : 11.

Approaching Extraordinary Perihelia of the Planets—Dr. Knapp's Investigations—Great Disasters and Epidemics to be Expected—Remarkable Agreement in Dates.

A LARGE number of astronomers have recently been observing with profound interest an eclipse of the sun, and they all admit that its condition appears to have recently undergone a great change.

Professor Lockyer, an eminent English astronomer, who has made the sun his special study, inclines to the opinion that these changes observable in the sun must have very serious results.

Observers of the late eclipse agree in admitting that they were surprised to find that the burning hydrogen which was formerly present in the corona has largely disappeared. The spectroscope proves this beyond any possibility of doubt. It was previously known that for the last four years the spots which were formerly so frequent on the sun had been fewer, and the close connection between the sun-spots and terrestrial magnetism has been once more demonstrated by the marked decrease of magnetic activity during the same period. The disappearance of sun-spots and the disappearance of hydrogen from the corona mean that solar activity and solar heat have decreased.

Now, the decrease of solar heat means, in its earlier stages, an increase of heat on the earth; for the gases thrown out by the sun when in a state of great activity, and which act as a shield to protect the earth, disappear as the heat decreases.

According to this view, the sun is taking precisely the course which must end in the burning up of the earth at a comparatively early period (2 Pet. 3 : 10, 11).

But the heavens are said, by some well-informed persons, to indicate, on much more proximate evidence, that we are rapidly approaching what will be one of the most perilous and malific periods of the earth's history.

Since the commencement of the Christian era, the perihelia of the four great planets of the solar system—Jupiter, Uranus, Saturn, and Neptune—have not been coincident. But this is about to occur, and, in the language of Dr. Knapp, who has traced the history of the greatest epidemics that ever afflicted the human race to the perihelia of these planets, there will soon be times of great pestilence. The view is, that when one or more of the large planets is nearest to the sun, the temperature and condition of our atmosphere are so disturbed as to cause injurious vicissitudes, terrible rains, prolonged droughts, etc., resulting in the destruction of crops, and pestilences among human beings and domestic animals.

Dr. Knapp has collected a mass of statistical data, all going to show that perihelion dates have always been marked by unusual mortality, and that sickness and death have invariably corresponded with the planets in perihelion at the same time. The revolution of Jupiter round the sun is accomplished in a little less than twelve years, of Saturn in a little less than thirty years, of Uranus in about eighty-four years. If it be true, therefore, that the perihelia of these planets occasion atmospheric conditions unfavorable to life, pestilential periods should occur once in a dozen years, and aggravated and still more widespread epidemics at longer intervals.

In tracing the history of epidemics for more than two thousand years, Dr. Knapp finds the facts in all cases to validate the theory. Thus in the sixth and again in the sixteenth centuries, three of these planets were coincident in perihelion, and those were the most pestilential times of the Christian era.

But soon after 1880, for the first time in two thousand years, all four of these planets will be at their nearest approach to the sun or perihelion (as the word signifies, being compounded of the Greek words peri about, and helion, sun). So that for a few years, say from 1880 to 1885, t vitality of every living thing will be put to a sev and trying ordeal. Some persons think t they see in the signs of the times evidences the great disasters at hand in the immedi future. Extremes of heat and cold, the pre lence of flood and disasters, the general fail of the potato crop, the widespread chill fe among human beings, and the equal presenc the epizootic among animals, are mentioned among the premonitions of the rapidly approa ing perihelion.

We do not write to alarm any one unne sarily, but we merely state facts. That the c joint perihelion of all the large planets of solar system, one of which, Jupiter, is a t sand times as large as the earth, must dist our atmosphere and temperature very consi ably, is probable; that this disturbance n be injurious to health and life is certain; that these periods have heretofore been p lential, is a matter of record.

Nor can the synchronization of such an as nomical crisis, with the general epoch of 188 fixed upon by many of the most able interpre as the probable termination of this dispensat escape observation.

FRANCE, RUSSIA, AND ENGLAND THE LAST DAYS.

By the Rev. J. R. Purcell, M.A.

Faber on the Great Powers of the Last Day The Western Antichrist to be a Revived B parte—II. The King of the North or R —III. The King of the South, or Egypt— Opening of the Suez Canal—Napoleon Shadow of Antichrist—What Occurred in Day a Rehearsal of Future Stupendous E —England perhaps the Future King of South.

AT the present time, when events of g magnitude and of European as well as of O tal interest have transpired, it may not be teresting to prophetic students to conside light which God's Word throws upon ce kingdoms which are marked out by prophe participating in the great struggles which wind up our present dispensation.

Faber, in his "General and Connected of the Prophecies," published in 1808, well up the great powers. "Now, we learn certain prophecies that at the time of the four mighty powers will be the principal a in the great drama of nations: the Roman under his last or Carlovingian head, some Protestant or maritime state—a king of North and a king of the South."

Such is Faber's summing up of the powers who are to be conspicuous in the l day struggles, which will gradually conver and then finally run their course on the s the "pleasant land," the theatre of the w redemption. The history of these confli minutely described in the closing verses of 2. This description has always seemed to most important prophecy in Holy Writ.

There is no reason why we may not eve form something more than a mere probabl jecture regarding the four kingdoms speci the prophecies.

I. Firstly, the leading power is no dou Western Antichrist, and it is almost certai France will be the nucleus of the Antichr confederacy, and also the stronghold of its In other words, the Antichrist will be Mo of France, and possibly Emperor of Rome one who has witnessed the extraordinary perative powers of France since the catast of Sedan and the extraordinary developm her military resources, can doubt that in years she will stand forth stronger than Superficial observers thought that in 18 hour had struck; but the late Mr. Pu with a much deeper insight into the m stated "that the French nation was like which when trodden upon would soon again."

Events have more than verified his sag

Al when the hour has struck there will be nd the man, as I believe, A REVIVED BONA-TE, combining the fiery impetuosity and itary prowess of the first Napoleon, with the omatic skill and cunning of the third—a eftain of whom the question will be asked, 'ho is like unto him, who is able to make war h him?" And there is almost a prophetic etness that it should be so—that as Julius Cæsar gained his laurels and rose to power by his itary deeds in Gaul, the last of the Cæsars uld also end his career as head of that coun- and of the revived Roman Empire.

I. Then, again, can we doubt who is the King the North but the future head of the Russian pire in league with Persia; leaguing under standard the wild Turkoman tribes of Asia, Cossacks of the Don, the Calmucks, the skhin? Any one who will compare the de-ption of the Russian invading hosts as rked out in Ezekiel 38 : 4–7 with the most ent conquests of Russia in Turkestan and where in Asia, cannot but be struck with the reme rapidity with which Russia is working Her destiny.

ean Stanley, in his "History of the Eastern urch," says "that the last word of Peter the eat, when struggling between life and death, s 'Hereafter.' 'Did he,' says Dr. Keith,* nmenting on the scene, 'did his thoughts k into the unknown future of his beloved ssia?'" Of course we cannot answer, but do know that Russia in her most recent con-ests, and by her exact geographical position, fils exactly the position and the destiny God's ord marks out for her. It is impossible to fine the position she occupies in reference to Antichrist and his vassal kingdoms whether e be in league with or in opposition to him, ll she comes under the prophetic denuncia-n of those powers of the last days who say, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in ssession." But we know how the prayer will fulfilled. "O my God! make them like unto wheel, and as the stubble before the wind."

III. But who is the third power, "the King the South"? All commentators agree hereon, the then ruling King of Egypt." I would row it out as a suggestion that it is just pos-ble that by or just after the manifestation of e Antichrist, England, the great maritime wer of the latter days, may have acquired gypt. As Professor Birks remarks, "Egypt is o feeble a power of itself to acquire prophetic nportance." But suppose that the power of at country be wielded by the great maritime ower of the last days, then I venture to submit at the position which that country occupies in e prophetic horoscope would be worthy of its osition therein described. Might not such be e literal meaning of the prediction, "I have iven Egypt for thy ransom"?

The opening of the Suez Canal has vastly en-anced the position of Egypt as the highway to he East. In spite of the threatened Euphrates alley Railway, Egypt will be seen to be the rue passage to the East; in spite of the Eng-ish acquisition of Cyprus and protectorate of Asia Minor, England could not (supposing Rus-ia within the next ten years to have more fully leveloped her resources) hold it at all points. ince the Caucasus was conquered, Russia is irtually mistress of Asia Minor. So that we ave only to suppose a further disintegration of he Turkish Empire, and the question would rise, Who is to take Egypt? England in her wn interests, could not allow France or Russia o do so; and that is just the point which would blige her to acquire it.

Very much light may be thrown on the career of the Antichrist by recalling the career of Na-oleon I., who was, as Dr. Newman so well erms him, "a shadow of Antichrist." No man ever yet so acted out as prototype what will be carried out in full by that dread being. His invasion of Egypt, his repulse by the ships of England, his invasion of Syria, and the actual contest on the plain of Eschaelon (the supposed site of Armageddon), and lastly, the convocation of the Jewish Sanhedrim in Paris in 1807, are more than coincidences. They are the types in miniature, the "prelibations," to use Mr. Elliott's apt word, of what the real Antichrist will enact in his marvellous career and final doom.

The coincidences between the first and final Napoleon will, I venture to submit, when the time comes, be seen to be marvellous, but with this difference, that the latter will fill up completely and accomplish all that the other failed to do. Napoleon never ceased to regret his repulse at Acre by Sir Sydney Smith. "St. Jean d'Acre once taken," said he, at St. Helena, "the French army would have flown to Aleppo and Damascus: in the twinkling of an eye it would have been on the Euphrates; the Christians of Syria, the Druses, the Christians of Armenia, would have joined it; the whole population of the East would have been agitated. I would have reached Constantinople and the Indies: I would have changed the face of the world."*

Let it be borne in mind that the power which repulsed Napoleon in the East was England, and also that she did in 1840, at the same place, compel Ibrahim Pacha to retreat from Syria.

Now on the principle that what has already occurred in the East in the time of the first Napoleon may be a rehearsal of far more stupendous events, which shall close our dispensation, we can see no reasons why England may not be at once the great maritime power of the last days and—exercising a protectorate over Egypt—be the predicted king of the South.

It is likely from analogy that there will be the same territorial extent of the Roman Empire at the Second Advent as there was at the First Advent.

There are, as I believe, sundry positive statemnts in God's Word which speak of England as doing God's work in bringing back his ancient people. I believe England's work will be exerted in the incipient and final stages of the Jewish restorations, thus leaving a middle space for the actings of the Antichrist, who, as we learn from Daniel, "will confirm a covenant with many for one week, and in the midst break it by planting the abomination that maketh desolate," and will afterwards enact his final persecution during the last three and a half years of this dispensation (Dan. 9 : 27).

TENEMENT-HOUSES IN NEW YORK CITY.

A MEETING of clergymen of different denominations was held in this city a few days ago, to discuss the moral and domestic aspects of the tenement-house system. At that meeting facts so startling were presented that it was unanimously resolved to invite all the clergy of New York to point out the special dangers and evils of the present tenement system to their congregations on Sunday, February 23d. The advice was acted upon in many of the churches, and statistics obtained by thorough investigation of the system were presented, and Christians were besought to do something more than pray and bestow charity for the amelioration of the poor. The state of things disclosed was abominable beyond what many persons will be able to believe.

Dwelling-places were described where it was impossible for the father or mother or children to get out into the street except at low-tide. At high-tide the floor was covered with water, filth, and vileness from the neighboring dwellings, forced there by the pressure of the water. The inmates were obliged to get on chairs and tables until the tide went down. A room had been visited fifteen or sixteen feet square, in which four families were living, and where the boundaries of each family were made by a chalk line. The room was chalked off into four spaces. No warmth, little food, no seclusion, no any thing that was good; every thing that was vile and wretched. Four families in one room by night and by day!

In Madison Square Presbyterian Church Dr. Derby gave an account of visits to some tenement-houses. In one of these, although it was daylight, it was impossible to see in the four middle rooms without the light of a lamp. In another, a five-story tenement, there were thirty-two rooms which received no daylight. In this house there were fifty-one children, only twenty-two of whom went to school. In another house, 10 x 14½ feet, utterly without furniture except an old stove, five men and four women were found in one room during the day, and at night in the same room there were six men and five women seen. This dive was kept by a young man who charged five cents for a night's lodging, and sold stale beer at two cents a pint.

In another room were two Italians and three women, and overhead on a loft were ten settees, for which a charge of ten cents each nightly was made. In the same building a widow and her six children resided. In only four rooms in the entire house was there any thing like family organization, and there were seventy-two persons in the house. In another tenement-house of the same class, 10 x 16, occupied by ragpickers, there was in every part an utter abandonment of the decencies of life. It is unnecessary to comment upon this state of things. The picture explains itself. More than that, it effectually answers the question which the lawyer put to our Lord, "Who is my neighbor?" (Luke 10 : 29.) No Christian, after this public disclosure, can plead "Behold, we knew it not"

In Grace Church, Rev. Dr. H. C. Potter explained what was a tenement-house. The law defines it as "a house occupied by more than three families living independently and doing their cooking on the premises." But a tenement-house is a very different thing from an apartment-house. Ordinarily it is from four to six stories high, having frequently a store on the first floor, which, when used (as is often the case) as a liquor-store, has an entrance from the hallway, so that it can evade the Sunday law and give secret access to the inmates of the tenement at all times. Four families occupy each floor, and a set of rooms consists of one or two dark closets, used as bed-rooms, and a living room twice as long as one of these pens and ten feet wide.

It is sad to have to say that these horrible places have been rapidly run up of late years. Although the first was built only forty years ago, there are 21,000 of them in the metropolis to-day. In ten years, it is said, $82,000,000 have been invested in tenement-house property. So greedy are men to run after gain, reckless of all consequences to others! In the most densely-populated portion of London there are not more than 175,000 people to the square mile, while in parts of the Fourth Ward of New York there are 290,000 to the square mile. In this terrible state of affairs the little ones suffer most, it having been estimated that ninety per cent of the children born in tenement-houses die before reaching youth.

A Child's Prayer Answered by a Russian PRIEST.—A gentleman in the neighborhood of St. Petersburg died recently, leaving behind him motherless, and without friends or relations, two little children, one a boy of seven and the other a girl of three. Left in the house alone, without money or food, the boy did not know what to do to get bread for his sister. At last, urged by the little one's tears, he wrote on a piece of paper: "Please, God, send me three copecks (a penny) to buy my little sister a roll," and went to the nearest church to slip it into an alms-box, believing in his simplicity that the prayer would reach Heaven through this medium. A priest passing by observed the child on tiptoe trying to thrust the paper in, and, taking the paper from him, read the message. Returning home with the child, he took the little ones to his house and gave them the food and clothing they so much needed.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week, and the American readers of his sermons, by helping to circulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be co-operating in rendering assistance to these institutions. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American pnblic."

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill is still the most prominent subject of the day. It was vetoed by the President March 1st. This action, while it will occasion surprise and indignation in some quarters, will in others be hailed with intense satisfaction, as the means of saving the nation from a dishonorable infringment of its treaty obligations.

The following expression of opinion, by an intelligent Chinaman resident in this country, is interesting at this juncture. He says that his people view the recent act of Congress as an insult to their race, although they have taken no measures to resent it. He thinks his Government will discredit the good faith of the United States if the anti-Chinese bill becomes a law, and will possibly either prohibit commercial intercourse with the United States, or only allow it under embarrassing and ruinous restrictions. His people never sought to open communication with the people of the United States, and now, when they have yielded, the United States Government abrogates a treaty and passes an anti-immigration act that is an insult to them.

Two important demonstrations on the subject of the Chinese immigration bill were made February 27th. A meeting of the New York Chambers of Commerce, very largely attended, passed a resolution deprecating the bill "as establishing a bad precedent; as an unworthy political concession to the lawless spirit of a single State; as tending to degrade the National character in the sight of all other nations; as calculated to imperil the life of the missionary, and to impair the value of his teachings; as exposing the merchant in his dealings to the consequences of public dishonor; and, finally, as presenting the hasty action of our Congressional body in sorry contrast with the more cautious and dignified wisdom of the heathen Empire, and finally asking the President to withhold his approval.

On the other hand the Californians are equally earnest in urging the President to sign the bill, and held a mass meeting in San Francisco on the same day, at which nearly five thousand persons were present, among whom were the principal merchants, professional men, and politicians of the city. The purpose of the meeting was stated by Governor Irwin, who said, "It was to let the President know the true feeling of the people on the subject under consideration."

The following appeal, signed by the Episcopal Bishop of California and a number of clergy, has also been telegraphed to the President: "We, ministers of various religious denominations in San Francisco, earnestly entreat you to sign the bill for restricting Chinese immigration, firmly believing, as we do, that the presence of large numbers of Chinese on this coast is highly detrimental to the spiritual, moral, and material welfare of our people."

Witchcraft in Alaska.—A missionary of the Presbyterian Church, who has been working in the Alaska Territory for the last two years, reports that witchcraft is very prevalent among the Indians. About the time he went among them an old woman at Sitka was accused by a "medicine-man" of bewitching one of his patients whom he had failed to cure. To escape torture and death she confessed she was a witch, and, according to the custom of the people, was set free in that character. But her own son and daughter had such a superstitious horror of her as a witch, that they murdered her, and then they were themselves put to death by their tribe for the murder. Thus three lives were horribly sacrificed through this wicked superstition. The Word of God is very severe in its condemnation of witchcraft. "There shall not be found among you an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, for all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord," (Deut. 18 : 10–12). Modern Spiritualism comes distinctly under this category.

Horatio Davis Sheppard, M.D., the founder of the first penny newspaper in New York, died on February 24th, in St. Luke's Hospital. He was seventy years of age and the cause of his death was pneumonia, complicated by disease of the heart. Dr. Sheppard was a native of New Jersey, but had been a resident of New York for many years, and was a warm friend of the late Horace Greeley. He had been a member of the American Institute since 1867, and was connected with several other societies. His only known relative is a cousin, Caleb Henry Sheppard, residing at Shiloh, Cumberland County, N. J. No one called at the hospital to visit him, and his body was unclaimed till his cousin had been written to by the hospital authorities. In 1831 he conceived the idea of a daily newspaper, at one cent a copy. Whenever he came down town from the medical school, through Chatham Street, which was then, as now, a busy thoroughfare, and much occupied by street venders, h noted the large business in articles sold at " penny apiece." He saw that the expenditur was so small that the purchasers rarely hesitated, and he thought that if a newspaper could b produced and sold at that price it might be sold he thought, by boys as readily as they then sol apples, cakes, and candies.

Washington's Great-Great Grandfather.—Perhaps no place in "the old country" shoul be of more interest to Americans than the pa ish of Brington, in Northamptonshire. Litt Brington is about half a mile from Great Brington, and is noteworthy as containing the hou formerly occupied by the ancestors of Georg Washington. The church of the village is a ancient structure dedicated to the Virgin, an bears the traces of many alterations and restor tions. On the pavement of the chancel is stone slab bearing this inscription :

Here lieth the bodi of Lavrence Washingt sonne and heire of Robert Washington of Sov grave in the Countie of Northamton Esqui who married Margaret the Eldest daughter William Butler of Tees in the Countie of Su sexe Esquier, who had issue by her 8 sonns a 9 daughters, which Lavrence Decessed the of December A. Dni. 1616.

Thou that by chance or choyce of this hast sight
Know life to death resigns as daye to night;
But as the sunns retorne revives the day
So Christ shall us though turnde to dust and clay

This Lawrence Washington was the lin ancestor, presumably the great-great-grandfat of George Washington.

At the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting on W nesday, February 26th, the following instanc healing by prayer was related :

A physician said he had been laid upon a of sickness, and the skill of three brother p sicians had failed to afford him relief. T he turned with all his heart to the Lord, asked Him, if it was His will and for His gl to give relief, to restore speedily. The Lord this, and he asked all present to unite with i in the doxology. "Bless the Lord, O soul ! who healeth all thy diseases."

Sudden Deaths of Business Men.—Bis Simpson, of the M. E. Church, speaking at funeral service of Dr. Nelson, referred to number of venerable fathers in the church had been taken away during not many y past. Then he said—and we pray that the les may not be lost—"I am reminded by th scenes of the fact that in these days mer business seem to die so easily. It may be a fa but it appears to me there is not that war there was years ago. Such is the pressur business on the brain, and such is the wea nerve in the active conflict of life, that the break down suddenly. They seem unabl resist disease, and we hear almost every da men dropping suddenly, with scarcely a ment's warning. Death is abroad; the mes ger is touching all around us, and we almost as though he were about to touch us also. soon we shall be in the casket none of us bu All-wise can tell. The lesson is that w death always utters—to be ever ready ; to our work done." Solomon, with all his dom, could say nothing more than this—"B not thyself of to-morrow" (Prov. 27 : 1).

The Possession of Diamonds.—A New York minister lately remarked: "The difference between a saint and a sinner, especially where the latter is a moral man and to all outward appearances as good as the other, may be illustrated by the following fact. Next door but one to the house in which I once lived a Hebrew resided. He was afraid to leave his diamonds in the store when he went home at night, for fear they might be stolen while he slept; so he had a pocket made in his clothing where no one would suspect its existence, and in that he carried one hundred thousand dollars' worth of diamonds. There was the difference between us. We both lived in a brown-stone house and our coats were made by the same tailor and were alike, but he had a hundred thousand dollars' worth of diamonds and I had not a single one. The child of God possesses many precious spiritual diamonds—love, joy, peace, and other heavenly gems—while the worldling has none. That is one of the great differences between them."

Thomas C. Doremus, one of the old merchants of New York, for years the senior member of the firm of Doremus & Nixon, house and church furnishers and general dry-goods merchants, died on Feb. 16. Mr. Doremus was very liberal in his benefactions. He was forty years a Director of the American Tract Society, was one of the Founders of the Sabbath Committee, and for many years one of the most influential members of the South Reformed Church. He was in his eighty-third year at the time of his death.

Mr. Moody is delivering sermons in four churches daily at Baltimore, Md. He speaks at four P.M. at Dr. Leyburn's church, and at night at the Broadway Methodist, Second Presbyterian, and Broadway Presbyterian churches. Two of these meetings are for men only. Congregations crowded.

One of our subscribers writes: "My dear husband, the Rev. Dr. C. B. Egan, exchanged earth for heaven, February 2d, one beautiful Sabbath morning, at 9.35, at about forty years of age. He was converted from Romanism, was educated for a priest, was a most popular physician, and also a Free Baptist clergyman. But the summons came for him to come up higher. His departure was peaceful, beautiful, and without a struggle. I know that my loss is his inestimable gain. During his sickness I used to read aloud to him from your papers and he enjoyed them very much, especially respecting the second coming of our blessed Saviour. Oh! how I long for His appearing! I want to be more active in doing good."

Every testimony of this kind is valuable. When a man leaves this world everybody knows that nothing belonging to this world can sustain him during the dark passage. Blessed, therefore, are the dead which die in the Lord (Rev. 14 : 13).

Legacy of a Hidden Treasure.—At Zahlet, in Syria, a native soldier was lately received into the communion of a Presbyterian Church. He attracted much attention as he arose in full uniform and gave assent to the Confession of Faith. It seems that the father of this man was a merchant, who, when travelling to sell his goods, more than fifteen years ago, secured a Testament, which he carried to his home. The father died, and the Testament was hidden away among old papers and entirely forgotten. But a short time ago the soldier discovered the forgotten treasure, and began to study it, and also to attend the mission services. It was not long before there was a complete change in the man. Although he had been one of the most daring and wicked men in Zahlet, he became a gentle and consistent follower of the Lord Jesus." What an encouragement to tract-distributors! See Eccles. 11 : 1.

The First Hindoo Convert.—"When I was a boy in England," said a white-haired old man at a missionary meeting, "one day my mother had gone to the missionary prayer-meeting. That was in the early days of missions to the heathen—the days of Carey, and Ryland, and Andrew Fuller. Toward evening she came home very much excited, and bursting open the door as the family were just gathering around the supper table she clapped her hands and exclaimed: "There's a convert! there's a convert!" Then she told the story of the conversion of Krishnu Pal, the first Hindoo trophy of the cross. It was a matter of great rejoicing in all the churches of the realm. God had owned and blessed the missionary enterprise."

Result of Confession.—An Italian innkeeper, when confessing to his priest, was asked by the priest if he had never greased the teeth of travellers' horses to prevent their eating. He replied that he had never done so. When the time of confession came round again, however, he voluntarily confessed having done this several times. "Why," exclaimed the priest, "at your last confession you told me you had never done so!" "True, holy father," replied the penitent, "I never heard of it until you mentioned it." Similarly many girls have become depraved through the wrong things suggested to them by the questions of priests in the confessional.

A Saintly Girl in a Garret.—The Rev. Dr. Samuel Manning, Secretary to the Religious Tract Society, London, preached not long ago on "Looking unto Jesus," and he forcibly showed that the aim of the Society, in each of the sixteen millions of tracts issued every year, was to point men to Jesus as the author and finisher of faith. In the course of his sermon he related the following anecdote:

"Some years ago I stood by the sick bed of a young woman racked by a cruel disease, which was dragging her to her grave. She was lying in a poor chamber, and was dependent upon the charity of the church for her support in her last days. By patient submission, however, to the discipline through which she was called to pass, she had, through the grace of God, been lifted into a region of holy peace and hope, such as I have seldom witnessed. Her poor, mean attic was as the antechamber of heaven, she was always so full of thankfulness and joy.

"At last she came to the hour of death. 'Mary,' said her visitor, 'how is it with you now?' Her reply deserves to be remembered: 'I once thought,' she said, 'that I should rise above my starting-point, that I should get beyond it. I do not think so now, sir. I MUST LEAVE OFF WHERE I BEGAN—at the feet of Christ.' Then she murmured:

" 'A guilty, weak, and worthless worm
On Thy kind arms I fall;
Be Thou my strength and righteousness,
My Jesus and my all.'

Then her eyes closed in that sleep which men call death, but as I stood there I knew it to be but the awakening into the higher and diviner life. So it is with all of us; we begin with Christ when we begin to live, and we end with Christ when this mortal life is over, for He is the author and the finisher of our faith."

The Death of Professor Francois Bonifas, of the Protestant College at Montauban in France, took place recently. His last moments are thus described by M. Monod: "His end was one of those which reconcile one to death. Up to the last he had a full consciousness of his state. Two hours before the end he was heard to say, 'Lord, my God, help me!' A little afterwards he added, 'I do not suffer acutely, but the continuity is painful. I ask the Lord to preserve to me a little longer strength and power of voice; I should like to glorify Him once more. I should live to have received the students, and to have glorified my Master once again. I should have told them that in Jesus one may depart in peace and with joy.' In the morning he said, 'How good the Lord is! Oh! how good He is.' At last, at the moment when earthly shadows were disappearing before him, he exclaimed, 'How beautiful heaven is!' and after a momentary pause he added, 'and how near!' This was his last word."

Mr. C. L. Brace, Secretary of the Children's Aid Society, 19 East Fourth Street, New York, acknowledges with cordial thanks a donation of four dollars, sent by J. J. B. through the Manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

SEEKERS DIRECTED AND ENCOURAGED

A Sermon delivered by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Aud ye shall seek Me, and find Me, when ye shall search for Me with all your heart."—JEREMIAH 29 : 13.

A Blessing is about to Come when we are Moved to Pray for It—I. An Address to the Unconverted—A Search Necessary—Some Seek with no Heart—Some with a False Heart—Some with a Double Heart—Some Half-Heartedly—Jesus the only Meeting Place for God and the Sinner—II. The Backslider—A Sad Position—It may follow False Profession—A Fearful Reception in Hell—III. An Address to Professing Christians—Anecdote of Robert Hall—How shall the Lord be Honored—By Holier Living.

THIS was a part of the direction which God gave by His servant to the captives in Babylon. They were to remain quiet in Babylon until the set time came for their deliverance, and then there would be granted to them a gracious visitation from God which would move them to repentance, and incite them to prayer. Then might they be quite sure that the time had come for their deliverance, when they sought the Lord with their whole heart. It is a general principle that a blessing is about to come from the All-Merciful One when we are moved to pray for it with all our heart.

The Lord of grace may send us blessings before we search for them, for He is a sovereign, and often far outstrips what we might have expected, but His promise runs, "Seek and ye shall find it," and it is with the promise that we have most to do. A cheering assurance is given to those who seek in hearty earnest, and to this requirement of heartiness we must give earnest heed.

At this time I shall not attempt instruction, but strive to drive home the truth into the heart and conscience; I pray the Holy Spirit to help me, and I ask the prayers of those who have power with God, that the word may be as a goad to arouse, bestir, and urge onward those upon whom it is used.

Our address will be, first, to the unconverted; secondly, to backsliders; and thirdly, to this church, or any other Christian people.

I. And first,

TO THE UNCONVERTED.

Our text has a word for you. "Ye shall seek Me, and find Me, when ye shall search for Me with all your heart." You have lost your God; you are at a distance from Him; your sins have separated you from your Maker, and nothing will ever be right with you—really right—till you get back to your God. You are a sheep away from its shepherd now; you are a prodigal son away from his father now; and you will never be right, I say, till, as a sheep, you get back to the fold, and as a son that has rebelled you are reconciled to your Father. You want your God, and you will never be right till you find Him. You are therefore, stirred up by the text to "search for" Him. You are not to sit still with folded arms, and say, "He will come if He will." The prodigal said, "I will arise and go to my father," and some such spirit must be in you, or we cannot hope well of you. You must search after the Lord.

In this search it will be of no use for you to look within your heart, for it is empty and void of any thing godlike, and altogether estranged from God. Expect not to find the remedy in the disease. No one turns to his empty purse in the hope that it will supply his necessities, for poverty is not the source of riches. It were vain to look for the living among the dead, therefore look not for grace and salvation to yourself. Neither will it be the path of wisdom to endeavor to perform good works of your own, hoping to set yourself right by your own exertions in gaining merit.

Man, the whole mischief is that you are separated from God, and you must get back to God; the best works done while you are at enmity with your Lord and King are only part and parcel of the proud, presumptuous sin which rejects the Saviour and sets up itself in His place. It would have been quite right for the prodigal to wash himself, and cease from feeding the swine; it was most desirable that he should leave the harlots and the riotous living in which he had indulged; but if he had done all that and nothing more the great mischief would not have been cured, for the radical evil lay in his being away from his father's house. That is the essential wrong in your case, O unconverted man! You will never be perfectly happy and right till you are reconciled to God.

You are allowed to search for Him, and what a privilege that is! When Adam sinned, he could not go back to Paradise, for with a flaming sword in his hand there stood the mailed cherub to keep the way that he might not touch the tree of life. But God, as far as the garden of His mercy is concerned, has moved that fiery sentinel, and Jesus Christ has set angels of love to welcome you at mercy's gate. You may come to God, for God has come to you. He took upon Himself your nature, and His name is Emmanuel, God with us. Yes, the Infinite became a man, and He that builded yonder arch of heaven, and hung it with those starry lamps, came down below, to be subject to lowly parents, to work in a carpenter's shop, and to die upon a felon's gibbet, "the just for the unjust, that He might bing us to God." Search for Him, and you must find Him, for so stands His own word, "Ye shall seek Me, and find Me."

The text, however, demands that our searching after God should be done with all our heart. There are several ways of seeking God which must prove failures. One is to seek Him with no heart at all. This is done by those who take their book and read prayers, never thinking what they say; or who attend a dissenting place of worship, and hear another person pray, but never join in it. This is done by those who bend the knee at eventide, and mutter pious words, but never think; who rise in the morning and repeat sacred sentences, and never consider; who with regard to divine things are as little thoughtful as if the Gospel were all a legend or an old wife's fable, not worth an hour's meditation.

I have seen young women, sometimes, when I have been travelling, reading those trashy novels, which they purchase at the railway stall, and I have seen them waste their tears on some imaginary heroine or hero, and yet they and others hear about the majesty and the love of God without emotion, and read of heaven and hell, and Christ and God, with scarce a tear or a thought. Dear friend, you will never find the Lord if you seek Him in a heartless, unthinking manner. God is not mocked. If any of you have fallen into a formal religion, and seek the Lord without your heart, your seeking is in vain.

Some seek God with a false heart. They flame with zeal, and would have their friends know it, for they say as Jehu did to Jehonadab, "Come with me and see my zeal for the Lord;" but their heart is not true towards God. Their piety is an affectation of feeling, and not deep soul-work; it is sentimentality, and not the graving of God's Spirit upon the heart. Beware of a false religious excitement—of being borne up with religious gas as some are, inflated like balloons by a revival, only to burst by and by when most they need something to support them. God grant us to be saved from a lie in the heart, for it is a deadly canker, fatal to all hope of finding the Lord.

Some seek Him, too, with a double heart—a heart and a heart, as the Hebrew puts it. They have a heart towards God, and they have a heart towards sin; they have a heart towards the pardon, but they have also a heart towards the transgression. They would fain serve God and Mammon; they would build an altar for Jehovah, and still keep Dagon in his place. If your heart is divided you will be found wanting. Those prayers will never get to heaven which only fly upward with one wing. If one oar pulls toward earth and the other towards heaven the boat of the soul will revolve in a circle of folly, but never reach the happy shore. Beware of a double heart.

And some seek God with half a heart. They have a little concern, and are not altogether indifferent; they do think when they pray, or read, or sing, but the thought is not very intense. Superficial in all things, the seed is sown in stony ground, and soon it is withered away, because there is no depth of earth. The Lord save us from this.

Now, ye that are seeking Christ, remember that if you would find Him you must neither seek Him without heart, nor with a false heart, nor with a double heart, nor with a half heart, but "Ye shall find Me," saith the Lord, "when ye shall search for Me with all your heart."

NOBODY GETS ON IN THE WORLD WHO IS HALF-HEARTED.

If a man wants money he must hunt for it morning, noon, and night. If a man longs for knowledge he cannot take a book and ladle it into his brain with a spoon; he must read and study if he is to be a scholar. If a man desires to rise in such an age as this, he cannot do it without stern labor. Great discoverers, eminent artists, and powerful orators have all been men of hard work.

Handel, who composed such majestic music, practised so often on his harpsichord that he hollowed out the keys like spoons through his constant use of them. Nothing is to be done without earnestness, and you may not expect that God is to be found and pardon is to be received, and grace to be had, while you have only one eye open, and are not half awakened out of sleep.

What did Jesus say?—"The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Heaven's celestial bastions must be stormed by downright importunity. You must take the knocker of heaven's gate, and not drop it from your fingers with a dainty tap, but hammer at mercy's door again and again till you make the infernal deeps of despair resound with your desperate knocks, and cause heaven itself to echo with your hopeful determination that you will enter in, or know the reason why. Oh knock and knock and knock and knock again, for the door shall be opened when you knock with all your hearts.

Surely, dear friends, if any men have reasons to bring their whole hearts into action, you unconverted people are the men. I am sure that if I were to intimate to you that a hundred pounds of gunpowder were stowed away in yonder centre seat, and the probability was that it would soon explode, you would not remain very long in this Tabernacle, but would hurry out with all your heart. But any destruction that could be caused by gunpowder, as far as its effects on earth are concerned, could be nothing at all as compared with the overwhelming destruction which will come upon body and soul to men who are under the wrath of God. That wrath of God abides on every one of you who are unconverted. God is angry with the sinner every day, and if it be so your position is the most perilous one conceivable.

You will soon die. Do not be vexed with my reminding you of it. We are compelled to see it, some of us, who watch large congregations. Never does the same assembly meet in this place twice, and I suppose that between Sabbath and Sabbath it happens almost invariably that some one hearer goes to his account. Certainly in the church here we lose all the year round more than one per week of our friends. It is true, then, that you will soon have to die, and how will you bear to close your eyes on all mortal things without a hope of immortal joy? To go before the dread tribunal of your Maker and your Redeemer unwashed in the precious blood, with all your sins from the first day of your life till now about your neck like millstones, to sink you forever, how can you bear it? Do think of this, and if you do you will have good reason for seeking your God with all your heart.

Remember, also, that after death comes judgment. We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; and after the judgment comes the final award, which to those who have rejected Christ will be eternal destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of His power. Do not, I pray you, defy the wrath of God or dare His infinite displeasure. He Himself has said it, "Beware, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces and there be none to deliver." Surely every man in his sense, who knows that he is exposed to such an imminent risk as this will with his whole heart seek unto the Lord.

But why is it that when men search with all their heart they do find God? I will tell you. The only way in which we can find God is in Jesus Christ. There He meets with men, but nowhere else, and to get to Jesus Christ there is nothing on earth to be done but simply to believe in Him. It is a matter which does not take a moment. Believe God's testimony about Jesus Christ, and trust yourself with Jesus Christ, and salvation is yours. The saving word is near thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, and that is why when men seek the Lord with their whole hearts they find Him, for before they called the Lord was ready to answer.

Jesus was always ready; but other wishes and other thoughts made the seeker unready. Sins were there, and lusts of the flesh, and all manner of hamper to hinder the man. When a man comes to seek God with all his heart, he lets those things go, and soon sees Jesus. Then, too, a man becomes teachable, for when a man is in earnest to escape from danger he is glad enough to be told by anybody.

If I had lost my way, and feared I might fall over a precipice, I should be glad for the tiniest child to tell me my right road; and a man is likely to learn who is willing to be taught. This seeking God with all his heart makes a man quick in understanding. Before he was a dolt, because his heart was not in it, like a boy at school who does not want to learn. Where a man seeks God with all his heart you do not need to preach fine sermons to him; he does not crave elegance or eloquence; no, tell him Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and that "there is life for a look at the Crucified One," and he jumps at it.

"THAT IS WHAT I WANT,"

says he. The Spirit of God has made him eager to learn, and so he catches at once at the blessed message, and believes in Jesus. Half a heart, or no heart, or a double heart will not see what is as plain as a pikestaff, and will not accept a Gospel which is as glorious to God as it is simple to man. I charge you, then, you that seek the Lord, to be whole-hearted in it, for you cannot expect peace and joy in the Holy Ghost till all those straggling affections and wandering desires are tied up into one bundle, and your entire being is eager in the search for God in Jesus Christ.

II. I cannot spare the seeker any more time, for I want to have

FIVE MINUTES WITH THE BACKSLIDER.

Backsliders, you have left your Lord. Perhaps you have left the church, or the church has left you by putting you outside its pale; and deservedly so, because you were a dishonor to it. I am glad you come among us to worship. You have had to be cut off from our fellowship because of your sad conduct, but you stick to us still, and I am glad to see you. I always feel a hope of you so long as you love the old house. I am glad that though you are not recognized as a child in it, and do not feel that you ought to be, yet still you wait under the window to hear the family sing.

When the children of God are feasting together at the table I have marked you looking on, and wishing you were again in the happy household. I do not know whether you are God's children or not; I cannot judge your hearts. I call you backsliders, not because I am sure you are really so, for it is very possible that you made a false profession, and you afterwards did what was natural you should do—you broke down in trying to carry out a practical falsehood. I will not try to judge that, but I will say this to you—surely, if there are any people in the world who ought to be whole-hearted in seeking after God, you are the people.

How speechless you will stand at the last dreadful day, with your old regimentals hanging about you, to prove that you were deserters! You will not be able to lift a finger or utter a word in defence of yourself.

AND WHAT WILL YOU DO WHEN YOU GO DOWN TO HELL?

The prophet represents the king of Babylon as going there, and as he descended, the little petty princes whom he put to death, who were lying there in their dungeons in the prison of hell, rose, and leaning on their elbows, looked at him, and said, "Art thou become like one of us?" Methinks I hear the drunkard rising up and saying to you, "What, and are you here after all? You used to preach sobriety to me, and warn me of the drunkard's doom." Ah! my hearers, hypocrites are damned as well as drunkards. Then will speak the woman whom you talked about reclaiming, and what a sneer she will meet you with, and say, "You needed a refuge yourself, you hypocrite!"

Then, too, will speak your neighbors who never went to a place of worship, whom you thought were so very bad, because you went there and forgot what you heard. They will say, "This is what came of your going to the Tabernacle, and hearing Spurgeon! Is this the end of your joining the church, and going to the communion table?" What answer can you give when those eyes shall leer on you, and those lips shall hiss in derision of you?

Others shall say, "I never had the opportunities you had; I never was warned as you were; I never rejected Christ as you have done; I never stained the robes of His church and wounded Him anew in the house of His friends, as you have done." Then they will insult and triumph over you. If a prince of the blood were sent to a common gaol, what a misery it would be to him!

I pity every man who has to work upon the treadmill, so far as he can deserve pity, but most of all the man who has been delicately brought up and scarce knows what labor means, for it must be hard indeed to him. Ah! you delicate sons and daughters of Zion, you whose mouths were never stained with a curse, and whose hands have never been defiled with outward sin, if your hearts be not right with God, you must take your place with the profane and share with them. What say you to this? Do you say, "I would fain return and find acceptance in Christ?" To you the text speaks expressly. Then shall you "find Me when ye shall search for Me with all your heart."

III. My last word is to you, my brethren in Christ, and especially to you,

THE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH.

Thus saith the Lord, "Ye shall seek Me, and find Me, when ye shall search for Me with all your heart." Brethren, we want the Lord to be always among us. We have had His presence very graciously, but I am always troubled lest any sin of ours should cause Him to depart. I dread any thing like a decline in zeal and ardor and generosity and prayerfulness and holy living among any of us, lest the glory should depart and Ichabod be written on our walls. We hunger for our God, for I trust we can say we love Him. Can you say that? I heard—this last week—a story about that mighty preacher, Robert Hall, which touched me as I heard it. A friend related that through a little hamlet on his way to preach at a country town. It snowed very heavily, and Mr. Hall was passing through the village, unaware of the state of the road beyond. A Christian man, who knew him well, cried out, "Mr. Hall, you must not go farther; the snow is very deep, you cannot get through it; you must come in." Mr. Hall stopped in the house and rested awhile. He looked out of the window, and saw that it kept on snowing. He looked out again, and it snowed more heavily than before, and his friend said to him, "You cannot go, Mr. Hall; you cannot get there." But said he, "Sir, I must go." "Sir," said the good man, "you cannot, it is impossible. You cannot get to the place; the roads are blocked up."

So the great preacher agreed to remain if he could deliver his sermon. "I must preach, sir; I must preach, sir. I cannot remain unless I preach." His host went round the hamlet, knocked at the doors of the cottages, and got a few people together into his room. Mr. Hall preached a wonderful sermon. The good man seemed to mount to heaven in preaching from the words, "I saw no temple therein."

When the people had gone home he said to his friend, "My dear sir, I am afraid I am not a child of God." "Why, Mr. Hall, how can you say such a thing as that?" "But I am afraid I am a hyprocrite, sir." "Well, nobody else is afraid of that about you, Mr. Hall, and I cannot think how you can give way to such a notion." "Ah, but I want to ask you a question, sir. What do you think is a sure sign that a man is a child of God?" "Mr. Hall," said the good man, "you ought to know better than I do. I cannot undertake to instruct you." "I want to know, sir, and shall be obliged by your judgment," said Mr. Hall. "Well," said the man, "this is what I think is a sure sign: if a man really loves God he must be a child of God, and there must have been a change in him." "Thank you, sir; thank you, sir, for that word," said Mr. Hall, "that is just what I wanted. Love God, sir? I love Him with my whole soul."

"And," said the good host, in talking to my friend, "you should have heard how Mr. Hall went on about God; it was wonderful to hear him, sir. He praised Him above all things, he said all that was good about Him, and he kept saying, 'I cannot help loving such a being as God is, and if that proves that I am saved then I am sure of it, for I must love Him.'" Now, my brethren, we love God with all our hearts, and therefore we desire to have Him glorified in our midst. Do you not, my brethren, vehemently desire this? I know you do.

How, then, shall the Lord be honored? He may be glorified by holier living. How is that to be done? The text says we shall find Him if we seek Him with all our hearts, and in finding Him we shall find holiness. I have given up the idea that I shall ever get a church in which all hearts will seek God earnestly. I know you will not all be alive and full of fervor, for some of you are a dishonor to the church. You will never help us, but you will remain among us as dead weights. How I wish I could hope otherwise, but I dare not deceive myself or you. I do expect, however, that all who have the life of God really in their souls will give their whole hearts to the glory of God, and will do it always intensely. I look to them to seek the Lord by prayer, praying much for God to be glorified, and to back up their prayer by effort, cheerfully seeking to take their full share in the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Brethren, did Christ die for you? Yes or no? If He did, then in the name of common honesty live unto Him, for you cannot be your own; He has bought you with a price. When you were baptized in the name of the Sacred Three, did you mean it? If you did, in the name of truth live unto God, for you then confessed that you were dead to the world and buried with Christ, that henceforth you should live unto Him. When last time you came to the communion table, did you really believe that Jesus gave Himself for you, and did you know that you feasted upon His flesh and drank His blood by faith? Then, I say, in the name of both honesty and truth live as souls should live who have eaten better than angels' meat and have Christ within them.

If this Book be true, the most of us are not living as we ought to live. If there be a heaven, we are not living in the joy which the hope of it ought to inspire. If there be a hell, and some of our own children are going down to it, we do not act towards them as if we believed in their danger. We are acting like monsters, and not like men, if we suffer our fellow-creatures to be lost without lifting a finger for thier salvation.

Awake! arise! my brethren. O church of God in this place, and church of God everywhere, shake thyself from the bonds of thy neck. Arise, and sit down on thy throne of power, O daughter of Zion! Put on thy strength as in the ancient days, for strength shall be thine if thou searchest after the Lord with all thine heart. God grant that as a church we may be thoroughly earnest in seeking for a display of His saving power, and He shall have the glory. Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

A NEW LETTER FROM MR. SPURGEON.

[WE give here another most characteristic letter sent by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, to be published along with his sermon this week. It, like the last, was written at Mentone, in the South of France, where this man of God is recruiting his health. To how few is it given to maintain the same humble submission to God, the same zeal in His service, and the same unselfish concern for the people, year after year, in sunshine and in sorrow, in health and in sickness, under cruel adversity and amid the blaze of popularity! We all know Mr. Spurgeon did not work out this character for himself. It was the gift of God, bestowed according to the promise, "I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him: but ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you" (John 14 : 16, 17). This is the highest gift of God to us through His Son Jesus Christ. See Luke 11 : 13.]

MENTONE.

DEAR FRIENDS: The sermon is so long that only a line or so is left for me. I will say the less of myself. The warm, sunny days which I have spent in this retreat are, by God's blessing, bringing back to me health and strength. I shall be happy indeed if my mental and spiritual vigor should also be renewed by the removal of the daily care which pressed upon me; if it be so my hearers shall be the gainers, for all my strength has been and ever shall be laid out in my ministry.

I am right glad to hear that special services are commencing at the Tabernacle, and I entreat all the brethren there to throw all their energies into them. Pray that the Holy Spirit may work mightily and glorify the Lord Jesus in the midst of the congregations; and then set to work to fetch in the people from the outside. Gather them! Gather them from hedge and highway, and crowd the Gospel feast. The preachers are among you whom God has widely blessed, but how can they benefit the people if they do not come to hear them. Make the services known and press those to come who do not usually attend public worship. We long to see souls saved—do we not? My heart cannot be content while men are being lost. I cannot be among the crowds to preach, but my inmost soul prays for those who are indulged with that privilege, and for you also who have the joy of helping on the work of the Lord.

I am bound to thank those generous friends who continue to send aid to the various works under my care; the Lord reward them. To each and all my hearers and readers I send my hearty Christian salutations.

C. H. SPURGEON.

One cause of Mr. Spurgeon's richness in grace is suggested by the following extract from a letter sent to us by a subscriber a few days ago: "When in the army from 1861 to 1865, I read on the battle field Mr. Spurgeon's sermons. What comfort came to my heart from them in those trying times! I have followed him with prayer that God would bless him." Perhaps men of eminent piety do not always think how much they may owe to the secret prayers of other Christians who wish their work to prosper, and who fervently commend them to "the God of all grace."

PREVENTION OR CURE—WHICH?

An Oration by Mr. J. B. Gough, delivered a Few Weeks Ago in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London.

Alleged Objection to Bands of Hope—Children's Intelligence—Baby-talk—A Boy's Idea about the Creation of Flies—Children's Imitativeness — Dishonest Examples — "I'll Take What Father Takes"—A Boy's Last Hymn in a Garret—Be Manly and Brave—Fast Young Men—A Degraded Sergeant in Halifax—A Drunken Son Striking His Mother.

I AM here to speak to you again on the same old theme. The association represented to-night is the "United Kingdom Band of Hope Union," and I consider their work is one of the most important works—if not the most important work—to be achieved.

"PREVENTION IS BETTER THAN CURE." It is a great work to save a drunkard. It is worth a life effort to lift a man from degradation. It is worth a mighty self-sacrifice to lift a man up, and enable him to stand as a man, shaken free from his debasement and his fetters. But to prevent his fall is far better.

A boy, when asked, "Would you tell a lie for fifty dollars?" replied, "No; because when the dollars are gone the lie will stick." Though we may reform a man from drunkenness, no one can ever fully recover from the effects of years of dissipation and intemperance.

You put your hand in the hand of a giant and he crushes it. You shriek in your agony; and by and by, with a desperate effort, you draw forth your hand. It is crushed and torn and mangled and bleeding. That hand may be at last healed; but it will be a mutilated hand as long as you live. And so a man may be cured of this evil of drunkenness; but the marks are upon him, and will be to the day of his death. Therefore it is a greater work to prevent than it is to cure; and prevention is the work in which this association is engaged.

Now one would suppose that there would be no opposition to this work. But there are some persons who oppose every thing that does not suit their own narrow views, or that they themselves have not suggested; and so there is opposition. I have met with it in the United States, and meet with it here. One of the alleged objections is that these children are led and enticed to sign the pledge without appealing to their understanding. Now, we underrate the capacity of children to understand—altogether underrate it.

A temperance speaker said to me once, "The most severe rebuke I ever received in my life was from hearing two boys discuss my speech. One of them said, 'I don't like him a bit. He talked so much baby-talk to us boys.'" Now, boys do not want "baby-talk" talked to them. There is a kind of literature with us (I do not know that you have it here), growing out of an attempt to make the Scripture narratives familiar to infant minds, or comprehended by infant minds. You take the life of Jesus, the life of Moses, or the life of Joseph, and read it to your boy of five years old out of the Bible; and if he does not understand these narratives, he will understand nothing. And yet we have editions of the life of Moses after this fashion: "Moses was a very nice little darling love of a child, with blue eyes, and flaxen hair hanging round his shoulders, and little dimples on his knuckles, and the points of his fingers pink and beautiful; and his mother loved her dear, darling little child, and she found men wanted to kill him; so she made a basket of bulrushes, and called it an ark, and lined it with something to keep the water out, and cotton wool to make it soft and warm, and pushed it forth into the stream; and when the little child saw its mother it stretched out its dimpled hands and its pink finger-nails; and the mother began to cry"—and all such baby-talk as that.

Sir Walter Scott once said, "It is all folly to talk of writing down to the capacity of children. Give them something to grasp after, and they will grasp that which will astonish you." We often hear shrewd remarks from children, and we call them "haphazard." But they are not. They are the result of a process of reasoning, and I want to give you one or two illustrations.

A BOY'S IDEA ABOUT THE CREATION OF FLIES.

I knew two boys very well—at least I knew their father very well: one of them was about ten years old. His name was Willie, and the other's was Jamie. Jamie was seated on the doorstep, whittling a stick, as Yankee boys do. The other boy, Willie, had caught a fly, and, holding it in his fingers, he said, "What a queer thing a fly is—isn't it? Just look at its legs. Look at its wings. When I blow him he'll buzz! Ain't it queer? I wonder how God made him?" That has been a wonder to many. Professor Huxley cannot answer that question. No scientist can. "Jamie, how d'ye suppose God made a fly?" The little fellow whittling away at his stick said, "Why, Willie, God don't make flies as carpenters makes things—putting on 'em together and a-fitting of 'em. God says, 'Let there be flies!' and then there is flies." Call that "haphazard"? No! That boy had heard or read the sublime passage, "God said, Let there be light, and there was light;" and thence he reasoned out the creative power of the Almighty.

I say again, we underrate the capacity of children to understand. And then we underrate the capacity of children to imitate; or we forget that they have imitative natures. A boy with us (I will not suppose any such thing as that would occur here), when asked his age said, "At home I'm twelve, but mother says I'm only ten in the cars." I hope that does not apply to any one here; but it is really an awful thing with us. Conductors of railroad trains tell me that good-looking children, well-dressed children, educated children, are sometimes taught to lie for the sake of saving a half-fare on the railroad.

Now I ask, What is to be the honesty of the next generation if this sort of thing is continued? These children remember—and we underrate their capacity to remember as well as to understand; and they imitate. You do not want to destroy the respect of a child for his father or his mother, do you? I glory in the boy who said, "I tell you what it is; if my mother says a thing is so, it is so, even if it is not so." What a profound conviction that boy must have had of his mother's veracity!

Children understand well enough. What effect will a father's precepts have upon a boy when he can say, "I wonder what makes father laugh when he tells us how he ran away from school and put wax on the schoolmaster's seat, and plagued the other boys, and then turn round and shut me up and whip me when I just tried to be what he was?" Ah! we underrate the capacity of the young to understand and remember.

Rev. Charles Garratt, I believe, tells us that a little fellow of thirteen years of age sat at the table with his father. The waiter came round and asked him what he would take. There was wine on the table. "What will you take?" "I'll take what father takes." The father had the decanter in his hand, just about to pour out the wine, and he dropped it as if it were fire. Laying his hand lovingly on the head of the boy, he said, "Waiter, I'll take water." Now, this is what we want, that fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters, and all who have influence with children, shall help us in inspiring these children with a hatred of that which never benefited a human being, and has brought many to destruction and perdition."

I know people tell us sometimes, "It is no use working amongst children; it is no use laboring with them. They will sign your pledge and belong to your Band of Hope; and then they will break the pledge by and by." Why do you not raise the same objection against your Sunday-schools? You cannot make all your Sunday scholars Christians, can you? But there is a large proportion of them who do come into the church. And there is a large proportion of those who adopt the principle, and join these Bands of Hope, and sign the pledge of Total Abstinence, who do keep it; for I meet them by scores almost every week of my life.

A BOY'S LAST HYMN IN A GARRET.

These children are so impressible. A friend of mine seeking for objects of charity got into the upper room of a tenement-house. It was vacant. He saw a ladder pushed through the ceiling. Thinking that perhaps some poor creature had crept up there, he climbed the ladder, drew himself through the hole, and found himself under the rafters. There was no light but that which came through a bull's-eye in place of a tile. Soon he saw a heap of chips and shavings, and on them a boy about ten years old. "Boy, what are you doing here?" "Hush! don't tell anybody, please, sir." "What are you doing here?" "Hush! please don't tell anybody, sir. I'm a-hiding." "What are you hiding from?" "Don't tell anybody, please, sir." "Where's your mother?" "Please, sir, mother's dead." "Where's your father?" "Hush! don't tell him! Don't tell him! But look here!"

He turned himself on his face, and through the rags of his jacket and shirt my friend saw that the boy's flesh was bruised and his skin was broken. "Why, my boy, who beat you like that?" "Father did, sir." "What did he beat you like that for?" "Father got drunk, sir, and beat me 'cause I wouldn't steal." "Did you ever steal?" "Yes, sir; I was a street thief once." "And why won't you steal any more?" "Please, sir, I went to the Mission School; and they told me there of God, and of heaven, and of Jesus; and they taught me 'Thou shalt not steal'—and I'll never steal again if my father kills me for it. But please don't tell him!" "My boy, you mustn't stay here. You'll die. Now you wait patiently here for a little time. I'm going away to see a lady. We will get a better place for you than this." "Thank you, sir; but, please, sir, would you like to hear me sing a little hymn?"

Bruised, battered, forlorn, friendless, motherless, hiding away from an infuriated father, he had a little hymn to sing.

"Yes, I will hear you sing your little hymn."

He raised himself on his elbow and then sang—

> "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
> Look upon a little child,
> Pity my simplicity,
> Suffer me to come to Thee.
>
> "Fain would I to Thee be brought,
> Gracious Lord, forbid it not:
> In the kingdom of Thy grace
> Give a little child a place."

"That's the little hymn, sir. Good-by." The gentleman went away, came back again in less than two hours, and climbed the ladder. There were the chips; and there were the shavings; and there was the boy, with one hand by his side, and the other tucked in his bosom underneath the little ragged shirt—dead.

Oh, I thank God that He who said, "Suffer little children to come unto Me," did not say "respectable children" or "well-educated children." No! He sends His angels into the homes of poverty and sin and crime, where you do not like to go, and brings out His redeemed ones; and they are as stars in the crown of rejoicing to those who have been instrumental in enlightening their darkness in the Mission School, in the Ragged School, or in the Bands of Hope Union.

I might on this point give you incident after incident, but we have something else to talk about. This work, I say, is specially important because it is FOR PREVENTION; and it is to be carried on among the impressible children by whom we are surrounded.

WHAT IS IT TO BE MANLY AND BRAVE?

Now let me from childhood pass on to youth and early manhood. There are a great many young men here. I am glad to see you; with all my heart I am. Every one of you has ambition. There is not a young man here who means that his position next year shall be lower than it is this year. You are looking forward to something better. You want to be manly. Now what is it to be manly? What is it to be brave? What is it to be noble?

We have a class with us in the United States (and I do not know but what you have them here, too), a class who think that to be manly is to ruffle, and to swear, and to swagger, and to trample on the decencies of human life—to smoke and drink and gamble and to drive a fast horse. They think it is manly to toss off their glass like a man, and swear like a man. Are these men manly? We call them "fast young men." Now there is not in this world a more contemptible set of men than what are called "fast young men." It requires no genius, no education, no intellect, to drink and smoke and swear and drive a fast horse. Give the materials to the biggest lunatic out of the asylum, and he will do it as well as the best "fast" young man you have in London.

We are brave—when? We are brave when we overcome that which threatens to overcome us. Young men, we are heroes when we are able to chain some darling desire, and to say to some powerful passion, "Be still; I am your master!" To be bold against an enemy is common to the brute. Man's prerogative is to be bold against himself; to conquer his own lusts, and wicked ambitions and fancies, in the sacred name of duty to God. That is to be noble! that is to be brave!

The excuses young men give for entering into dissipation are various; but they are usually summed up in this—that they "must see a little of life." Why, my young friend, has not God spread out before you in His magnificent boundlessness of wealth every thing that can satisfy your noblest nature? You want to see life. You want to indulge in those forbidden (you may call them, if you please) "luxuries," supposing that you can touch pitch and not be defiled.

Young men begin to use intoxicating liquors, with no intention, or desire, or expectation of being injured by them. And yet what does Sir William Gull say?—"Many a man is poisoned by drink who has no conception that he is at all injured by it." The moderate drinker supposes that because he does not get intoxicated drink is doing him no harm.

THE DEGRADED SERGEANT IN HALIFAX.

When I was in Halifax, Nova Scotia, a most unfortunate circumstance occurred there. A sergeant of the regiment in the citadel, who was within six months of his discharge with a good-conduct pension, got drunk, and drew a weapon upon a superior officer. In view of his previous excellent good conduct the court-martial so far remitted his sentence that he was only degraded to the ranks, and put into the kitchen as one of the cooks. Four days from the time of that sentence being pronounced he hanged himself, and he told one of his comrades he knew nothing of what he did after he had taken his first glass at the canteen. Now, moderate drinkers, or those who call themselves so—BEWARE!

A DRUNKEN SON STRIKING HIS MOTHER.

One other fact—and I deal in facts. A young man said to me, "Mr. Gough, I never was intoxicated, or any thing like it, but once in my life—never; and on the occasion to which I refer I was not so far intoxicated but that I knew every thing which occurred. I went home. I had been with some young companions, and I ascended the stairs whistling. As I went up towards the top of the house, my room being at the very top, I saw the door of a room occupied by a servant girl open. I went in. I never should have gone in if I had not been drinking. I was not just right. The girl screamed.

"My mother came up and said, 'George, I never believed my son would be such a scoundrel.'" Said he, "I just shut my fist, and I struck her a terrific blow in the mouth. This hand was stained with my mother's blood! And now, sir, looking at that hand, I say sometimes, as Shakespeare makes Lady Macbeth say, 'Out, damned spot!' And I would give that hand to be cut off at the wrist if I could forget the blow given in that one act of intoxication, the first and last of which I was ever guilty."

I say to young men, Beware of this thing, because it is a snare. It is fearfully deceptive. Every man who drinks intends to do as other men do—intends to be a moderate drinker. I have said this over and over again, because I believe it to be important. Every man who becomes intemperate does so by a course of argument, from the beginning all the way down that fatal sliding-scale to ruin.

OUR REWARDS IN THE MILLENNIUM.

The Saints will Rule the Millennial Earth—Their Home will be in Heaven, not on Earth—a Freer Fellowship will be Established between the Earthly and the Heavenly Church—The Highest Places of Honor—Reward in Exact Proportion to Faithfulness.

As at Mount Sinai Jehovah employed angels to ordain the law when He was establishing His theocracy over Israel (Deut. 33 : 2; Gal. 3 : 19; Heb. 3 : 2), so after Christ's second coming the saints with transfigured bodies shall rule the millennial earth for and under Him. As they shall "reign," they must have subjects. The nations of the earth, and Israel, the foremost of them, shall be subjects of the Lord and His saints.

Though ruling over the earth, the transfigured saints shall not continuously remain on the earth, but live in heaven. They shall hold such blessed communion with mortals as Christ, Moses, and Elias, in glory, had with Peter, James, and John, in the flesh, at the transfiguration. That wonderful scene was a miniature prefiguration of the millennial reign.

As Elias, translated without death, represents the transfiguration of the saints found living at the Lord's coming, and as Moses represents the sleeping saints then raised to share the blessedness of the first resurrection, so Peter, James, and John represent the nations in the flesh. These, like Peter, who said, "Lord, it is good for us to be here,"* shall rejoice in the felt blessedness of frequent communion with the Lord Himself and His glorified saints.

There shall be a far freer fellowship than now between the earthly and the heavenly church. The type is afforded in the frequent and happy intercourse of the Lord with His disciples during the forty days after His resurrection. The transfigured saints shall feel it a sweet joy to lead their brethren on earth to the same Saviour whose preciousness they themselves know in all its fulness. Their power is that of attraction, winning all hearts in the day of the Lord's power (Ps. 110 : 3) not counteracted by devil or beast.

The heavenly transfigured ones are elected not merely for their own good and salvation, but to rule in love, and to minister blessings over the earth as its king-priests, unto God and His Christ. St. John says, that instead of the devil, over the earth shall be the transfigured church—Daniel says that instead of the heathenish beast, on the earth, the holy Israel shall rule (Dan. 7 : 27).

The privilege of this, our high calling in Christ, is limited to the present time of Satan's reign. When he shall have been bound, there will be no further opportunity to suffer for Christ so as afterwards to reign with Him. His word now is (Rev. 3 : 21), "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me on My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne." None in our age are saved by Christ who shall not also reign with Christ.

If we fail to gain the crown of service, we have had no part in the gift of grace. The martyrs are put foremost, because most like Jesus in suffering unto death: "I saw thrones, and the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the Word of God, and which (οἵτινες, all whosoever) had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

The highest place of honor is for those who in will or deed drink His cup of suffering and temptation (Matt. 20 : 22, 23; Luke 22 : 28–30). Next shall be all who have not given their allegiance to the world-power, but to the Lord and Saviour, looking at the things not seen and eternal. Paul, who was beheaded at Rome for the truth, shall then attain his one grand ambition, "that I may know Christ and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, if by any means I may attain the resurrection from out of the rest of the dead."

John, who was banished to Patmos for the Word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ, as he was companion of the saints in the tribulation and patience in Jesus Christ, so shall he be in the glory. It is our Lord's own promise, "Ye that have followed Me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for My name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life" (Matt. 19 : 28).

Thus, in exact proportion to our faithfulness, as being already the servants of Christ saved only by grace, shall be the degree of our reward. He who with one pound shall have made ten pounds for his Lord shall receive the Master's proportionate award of rule. "Well done, thou good servant—have thou rule over ten cities."

He who shall have made five pounds with his Master's one pound shall receive rule over five cities (Luke 19 : 15–19). As the vessels of glory are of larger or smaller dimensions, so shall each receive a larger or smaller measure of glory. Each vessel shall be filled full of blessing. But the larger the heart has been, the greater its capacity for blessedness (Isa. 22 : 24; 2 Tim. 2 : 21).

It should be remembered that the ministers whose gospel sermons appear from week to week in this journal are not to be understood as always concurring in the articles on Prophecy, a subject on which much divergence of opinion exists among Christian people.

A Willing Martyr.—The celebrated Chinese missionary Mr. Burns (a Presbyterian), accompanied by two native converts, while making an evangelistic tour in 1854, proclaimed the Gospel for the first time in a little town of 6000 inhabitants called Pechuia, and the result was so successful that in 1856 there was in that town an established congregation of thirty-six converted Chinese, and at a village eight miles further another congregation of eleven members. After the blessing came persecution; and when one day a mandarin officer entered the shop of a convert—an old cloth merchant, who still lives, bringing forth fruit in his extreme old age—the merchant guessed at once the intent of the mandarin officer, and said to him, "I know what you have come for," and taking down some of his goods he pointed to them, and he pointed to the rest of his shop, and said, "Take them all, and take me also. I am an old man and I am very deaf. You may take me and my boys and my little girl also. We are all Christians: we are all willing to go to prison." And so astonishing was the effect of this statement upon this mandarin officer and those who accompanied him, that they departed in amazement and left him undisturbed. That station at Pechuia was the first of the Chinese stations of the English.

* (Matt. 18 : 4.) "If Thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles, one for Thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias." Is there here an unconscious foreshadowing of the millennial feast of tabernacles (Zech. 14 : 16, 18, 19) thrice mentioned? also possibly in the prophetical Psalm, 118 : 15. Peter, with undesigned coincidence, uses two of the words used in the Gospel concerning the transfiguration, which he makes the pledge of Christ's coming Kingdom (2 Pet. 1 : 14, 15): "decease" (Luke 9 : 31), and "tabernacle."

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

Town and Country Life.

In the small but picturesque village of Wingsdale, in old England, two young ladies were seated together one sunny afternoon on a mossy bank under the shade of an oak. They were cousins, but their lives had been a complete contrast. Clara Arnot had lived in Wingsdale almost from her infancy, and she knew nothing of the world beyond its precincts. Pure in her mind and simple in her tastes, she drew her pleasure from the quietness of country life and found her recreation in rambles among the fields, where the fresh breezes gave health to her limbs and color to her cheek, and where her eye never ceased to be gladdened by the changing glories of earth and sky.

Clara's cousin, Ada Murray, was a member of fashionable society, and when we have said this it is not necessary to add any thing more. During the temporary break of festivities in the Lenten season, she had accepted the invitation of her aunt, Mrs. Arnot, to spend a fortnight with Clara at Wingsdale, and at the moment when our story opens the two girls were trying to interest each other in the modes of life to which they were respectively accustomed.

"And what are the delights which you prize so much?" inquired Clara, with some little curiosity. "You know that I have never spent two days together from my home, that I know nothing of what passes in the world, that though I was born in London, I was so young when we left Golden Square—"

"Golden Square!" exclaimed Ada with a shudder, for that is a humble quarter of the modern Babylon; "my dear, never mention such a place—nobody lives in Golden Square."

Clara colored, and felt uncomfortable, she scarcely knew why.

"You asked me," continued Ada, "what are the delights of town. It is hard to describe them, they are so utterly different from any which you experience here. Bustle and noise, incessant rattling of carriages and thundering raps at the door, late breakfasts—perhaps in bed—dinner at the hour of your supper; and when you, innocent dear, are retiring to rest, the maid is placing the flowers in my hair, and I am off in a flutter of muslin or tulle to mount step by step a crowded staircase, and enter some room where it is impossible to move, and barely possible to breathe!"

"And this night after night?" inquired Clara.

"Yes, night after night; that is to say, unless the season is a dull one."

"And do you not feel tired and weak in the morning?"

"Well, not inclined for a long country walk through fields garnished with stiles, nor for teaching stupid children in a school, nor for listening to a very sober, sensible book, such as that to which my dear good aunt is treating us; but just inclined to rest on a sofa with a diverting novel in my hand, to chat to amusing visitors, or to fill up the time till dinner with a concert or a botanical fête."

"Ah! these are what I should enjoy," cried Clara; "I am so fond of music and of flowers."

"Dear simplicity, do you imagine that any one goes to a concert to listen, or to a garden to look at the flowers? You go to talk, and to see your friends, and quiz the company, and—kill time!"

"And do you never grow weary?" asked Clara.

"Weary? yes, half tired to death, quite ennuyée; but then the only way to restore one's jaded spirits is to plunge deeper into gayety; the excitement and the bustle and the diversion become quite a necessity at last."

"It reminds me—but I'll not say of what it reminds me."

"Not say? but you must, and shall. What does it remind you of, little philosopher?"

"The craving which some very vulgar people, to whom I should never dream of comparing my friends, have for another kind of stimulant."

"It is a sort of intoxication, you mean," said Ada gayly. "I will not deny it; a very pleasant sort of intoxication. I wish that you would come to Grosvenor Square and try it."

Clara gently shook her head.

"What! you are afraid of being contaminated by my evil example, I suppose! You look on gayety as a dangerous glass of champagne; and have all here taken the pledge not to go beyond a cup of the very weakest green tea?"

"It is not that," said Clara, looking diverted.

"Then I shall carry you off with me—I positively shall; you shall be the belle of the London season; your time shall be crammed so full with engagements, balls, operas, concerts, fêtes, that you will scarcely know day from night!"

"I do not think that my mother would approve of that."

"Well, then, you shall go to no place of which your mother, and Mr. Ward [Mr. Ward was the clergyman of the village] and the whole clerical body from bishop to curate, would not approve. We'll take you to Exeter Hall, and the Museum, and the Royal Institution, panoramas, cycloramas, dioramas! Oh! there is no place like London for opening the mind. A green bud of rusticity expands at once into a full-blown rose there."

"May there not be such things as over-blown roses?"

"No fear; I'll answer for you, coz, if you'll only go back with me to London. Say that you will—only say that you will!" and Ada placed her arm caressingly around Clara.

"I really cannot, at present," replied her cousin, "though I should very much enjoy paying you a visit. But it would be impossible for me to quit home just now, when we are expecting my sister-in-law from Barbadoes—"

"Ah! yes; the widow of your half-brother," said Ada. "John married a Creole lady, did he not, rather against the wishes of your poor father?"

Clara bowed her head in assent.

"Then your sister-in-law is a perfect stranger to you?"

"Quite; and as she dislikes her pen, and never answers a letter, we have not even the knowledge of each other which one gains from correspondence."

"I think I heard that there were children," said Ada.

"Yes; four poor, dear little orphans."

"And all coming to your home?"

"My mother will welcome them all."

"Ahem! I wish you joy of your West Indian importation. My aunt must have been remarkably fond of her step-son!"

"On the contrary," replied Clara, lowering her voice to a confidential whisper, though the birds that twittered on the branches above them were the only living creatures near—"poor John was never any thing but a trial to mamma. He behaved very ill to her indeed, at the time when poor, dear papa's affairs were settled; he wrote in so insolent a manner; he cost my precious mother such bitter tears when she had been already suffering so much, that no one but an angel, as she is, would ever have forgotten or forgiven his conduct. You do not know how I felt it," continued Clara, her color rising at the recollection; "I could have better borne unkindness to myself, but insolence to my widowed mother was not to be endured! Yet, no sooner did we hear that John had died, leaving his family poorly provided for, than the heart and home of my mother were opened at once; no feeling was left in her bosom but generous sympathy and compassion; and I believe that she will receive the widow as warmly and tenderly as if she were her own cherished child."

"That is Christianity!" exclaimed Ada. "Ah! if profession and practice thus always went hand in hand—if 'good people,' as they are called, were always really good, they would win a great deal more respect from the world than they do now, and have a great deal more influence in it, besides! But what I can't bear is, when people talk as though they believed themselves to be saints and all the rest of the world sinners, and look as though they thought it wicked to smile or raise their voices above a whisper; and when you come really to know them, when you can glance a little behind the curtain, they are as selfish and avaricious and mean and spiteful as the veriest worldling in creation! This is what disgusts one, and inclines one to set down great profession at once as hypocrisy!"

"My mother says that it is more by our lives than by our lips that we should show what we are, and to whom we belong," was Clara's quiet reply; and it was the best remark she could have made if she did not feel equal to saying more. But the truth is that remarks such as Ada's betray many people into the idea that it is possible to live a Christian without making any profession, which is the next worst thing to making a false profession. For while it is true that "by their fruits ye shall know them," it is also true that "if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. 10:9, 10).

Ada was glad to change the subject: "Now, charming as I find this mossy seat," she said, "and the waving boughs and the lights and shadows and the beautiful view before me, and, above all, the lovely companion beside me, it strikes my unpoetical mind that if we sit longer here we may find rheumatism added to other country delights."

Clara sprang up at once from her seat. "I quite forgot that you were not a country lass like myself," she said; "as it must be almost tea-time now, perhaps we had better return home."

"Dinner at one, tea at six—how deliciously old-fashioned and rural!"

"Would you object to return by the village? I wish to inquire for poor old Mrs. Arkwright?"

"Object! I am only too much delighted to go where there is any thing stirring, be it only a baker's cart!"

"I think that some day, Ada, I must introduce you to some of my favorite poor people."

"I must get up a little appropriate small-talk first," laughed her cousin. "I should feel almost as much out of my element in a cottage as one of your plough-boys would do in a ball-room. I could neither speak of amusements, nor fashions, nor pictures, nor parties; I cannot imagine what one would say after the first 'good-morning' and the usual observations on the weather."

"Oh! how diverting it would be," cried Clara, with sudden animation, "to set you to teach a class at the school!"

"I'd make it a dancing-class at once, and substitute graceful courtesies for the little short bob which always reminds me of Jack in the box; and the little boys should learn to make elegant bows, instead of pulling down their own heads by tugging at the forelocks!"

"You would not be so hard upon the simple salutations of our little rustics, Ada, had you seen our village in the old time, when a bob or a bow was an unheard-of piece of politeness."

"It is a very pretty village," said Ada, as the picturesque row of white cottages opened on their view; the latticed windows glowing bright in the sun's setting rays, the small neat gardens gay with many a flower; while in the foreground the church, of simple but graceful architecture, raised its glittering spire towards heaven.

"It was a very different place twelve years ago," said Clara, "when my dear parents first came to reside here. There was not a church then within four miles, and the people here lived in a state of almost heathen darkness. The cottages were miserable hovels, I have heard, and seemed purposely contrived to keep out sun and air, and admit the snow and the rain. Half of the children had never been baptized, and ran about barefoot and bareheaded, as dirty and as ignorant as the very pigs with which they associated! The only thriving establishments were the ale-houses, and the character of the place was altogether so bad that it was really dangerous to be out after dark."

"And what worked such a wonderful change?"

"Oh, every thing was gradually done, by patience and untiring zeal and benevolence. My dear father expended much money, and more time, in improving the dwellings of the poor, combating prejudices, inviting the lazy to exertion, raising a spirit of order. My mother exerted herself amongst the women. They regarded her with suspicion at first, and were very jealous of interference. They seemed to consider it as their privilege to be ragged and dirty. But nothing could withstand the power of her gentleness and kindness. The first great step was gathering some of the children to a little class in our own house."

"Oh!" exclaimed Ada, "and could your mother really endure to have a set of ragged, barefooted little wretches, with unwashed faces and uncombed hair, in her house?"

"She not only endured them, but she loved them; and soon, very soon, they were neither ragged nor untidy. A smile and a word from mamma accomplished more than a long lecture from another would have done. As the children learned to read, they carried Bibles and little religious publications into their parents' miserable homes; gradually a taste for reading was produced, and my father took care that it should be gratified by useful and improving works. All this time my parents were making every effort to collect subscriptions for building and endowing a church—regular schools followed, until at length our poor village became the dear, peaceful, happy little place that you behold it now."

"Well," cried Ada, "it must have given your parents a great deal of pleasure to see all the good that they had done."

"You do admit, then," said Clara archly, "that even the country may have its pleasures?"

"Yes; but only think at what a price the pleasure was purchased! Only think of the misery of being imprisoned in a place quite out of the world, with no society at all; your only occupation—picking your way into dirty hovels through rivers of mud, tumbling over ragged urchins, lecturing poachers and sheep-stealers, coaxing and coddling sick old women, and then returning home to write begging-letters for subscriptions to friends who are sure to have 'so many calls' that they wish you at Nova Zembla for adding another!"

Ada interrupted herself as a sweet, golden-haired little boy lifted the latch of the gate of a tiny garden, and timidly, as if abashed by the presence of a stranger, offered a bunch of violets to Clara. She received them as graciously as though they had been a chaplet of pearls, and her words of thanks made the face of the child radiant with joy.

"Quite a chivalrous attention," said Ada, as they moved on.

"Oh, my children love me, and often bring me their little offerings. On my birth-day our myrtle was quite covered with their garlands of early spring flowers."

"It seems a new thing," continued Ada, "to be loved and respected by such people; but I suppose it is true all the world over, that kindness evokes gratitude in the humblest breasts."

"It does, indeed," replied Clara. "Gratitude! why, my friends and pupils here would do any thing for me, and be proud of the opportunity. I believe they would sacrifice their lives to save mine, if that were necessary. But you should see how mamma loves them. Indeed, it was she who taught me how 'it is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

She now stopped at the door of a cottage and knocked. A feeble "come in" sounded from the interior, and she entered, followed by Ada, who gathered together the folds of her silk dress, afraid to let them come in contact with the walls of the lowly dwelling. But her own luxurious home could not have presented a picture of more perfect cleanliness and neatness than that humble abode; there was nothing to shock even the refined taste of a lady of fashion.

DELIGHT IN GOD'S HOUSE.

S. S. Lesson for March 16th.—Psalm 74. Golden Text, verse 4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"How amiable are Thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." So begins our Psalm. The Psalmist experienced an inward necessity which led him to praise and worship God. It was not enough for him to receive at God's hand all he needed: he must also render unto the Lord the honor due unto His name. He longed for communion, not as a beggar who comes to the door of a rich man with the object of enriching himself; the Psalmist came to offer, and not to receive. His soul fainted, not because of personal need, but for the courts of his King, where he might do Him honor. His soul cried out, not for joy or peace or any thing personal, but for the living God, His presence, Himself.

Many of God's children have never yet experienced this necessity for worship; their first idea in communion with Him is what they can get of spiritual or of earthly blessing; that which concerns them lies nearer to their hearts than that which concerns God, and thus their whole communion with Him is contained in asking, receiving, and thanking. An offering of pure worship to Him, such as they offer who stand before the throne—this enters not into their minds. There is no soul-deep response to the blessed song of praise, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." This last is pure adoration. The soul craves to let itself out in such an expression of wondering glory to Him when all the threads of life and being are knotted together in one centre—Christ.

In Rev. 21 : 3 we read, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them and be their God." But this shall be only when the bride of Christ is "adorned for her husband" (verse 2). And it is in separation from the spirit and interests of the world that the bride makes herself ready. See Ps. 45 : 10, 11; and again, 2 Cor. 6 : 14–18.

The spirit of self is, perhaps, stronger in spiritual things than even in temporal things. And it is this spirit which the whole example and teaching of Christ were directed to correct in us, and which His life in us is powerful to overcome. This is why we are not left apart as separate Christians, but "builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2 : 22). If we live as members one of another and learn to "bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ" (Gal. 6 : 2), we have a constant exercise in the denial of the spirit of self, and that which we learn in our relations one with the other we practise without effort in our relations with God.

Moses identified himself so with the people of Israel that he could say, "Now, if Thou wilt, forgive their sin; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book which Thou hast written" (Ex. 32 : 32). And again (Ex. 33 : 14, 15), when, in answer to his prayer, the Lord had said, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest," Moses replied, "If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." While God Himself spoke of him personally, his heart was yearning for his people. We can well conceive how a man who lived in such complete abnegation of himself could utter the song of adoration in Rev. 15 : 3, 4, which is called "the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

The Psalmist goes on to say, "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God." The nest for her young, the true home for the young converts, this is the sore question for every evangelist. In the midst of a general defection in all our churches, and a declension in doctrine, in holiness, and in separation from the world, which is continually increasing, the word is ever upon our lips, and the cry goes up to God continually, "What must we do with the young converts?" The house which the sparrow found was God's altars, the place of offering and of sacrifice, the place where self lies down to die, and the fire from heaven consumes it. Here will the young convert be no more alone upon the housetop, but will find warmth and shelter in the very fact of giving himself over to the interests of others. There is a largeness of heart in accepting the responsibility, in partaking the joys and sorrows, the shame and honor of the whole family of God, in belonging to all who belong to Christ, in making ourselves servants to all, even though we be free from all. The life of sacrifice is the normal life and the healthy life of a child of God. This position is above all our Church differences, and we may abide in the Church where our circumstances, or the light we have received, have led us, while we may live above the spirit which actuates it, and be unhindered by its unfaithfulness.

"Blessed are they that dwell in Thy house; they will be still praising Thee." Such was the Psalmist's idea of dwelling in the house of the Lord. It was not "they will be so happy, they will get so much good," but they will be still praising Thee. Now, where is our dwelling-place? In ourselves? Then no wonder that the song of the heart is hushed. There is no matter for singing in the dismal caverns of our own self life. Is it in the Lord we dwell? Then it is also in His house, for "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him" (1 John 4 : 16). And this love is not only love to God, for "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and His love is perfected in us" (1 John 4 : 12). "Every one that loveth Him that begat, loveth Him also that is begotten of Him" (5 : 1).

> "A heart at leisure from itself, to soothe and sympathize," is also a heart at leisure from itself to praise.

"Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee; in whose heart are the ways of them" (or, as the German of Luther, "Who from the heart follow after Thee"). "Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools. They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God." God our strength, and we faithful in following Him, nothing can hinder our progress. If the ways of God are in our hearts, not outside of us, but accepted and identified with our will and our desires, then the valley becomes a well, for "He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of him shall flow rivers of living water" (John 7 : 38).

But, beloved readers, are we really going on from strength to strength; from forgiveness of our past sins to power over sin by the blood of the Lamb, from power to purity, from purity of heart to a life divine and eternal in its source and inall its issues, is this our life?

"O Lord of hosts," continues the Psalmist, "hear my prayer; give ear, O God of Jacob. Behold, O God, our shield, and look upon the face of Thine anointed." Here is our true plea, not look on me, but look on Jesus. "For a day in Thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." The office of doorkeeper in God's house is surely that of evangelist. They who lead souls through the door which is Christ. Are we doorkeepers?

"For," turning his eye again on God, the Psalmist says, "The Lord is a sun and shield," light and shade together; heat and coolness. He "will give grace and glory," as in Is. 60 : 19, "The Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory:" "no good thing will He withhold from him that walketh uprightly." Thus, while we are occupied with God, He is occupied with us. While we have an eye to His glory, He has an eye to our good. The Lord is first of all, and then the Lord will give all we need. "O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Distress in London, to which we have referred more than once of late, has been investigated by a Government Special Commissioner, who reports that: First, there is a great increase of inmates in the workhouses, and consequent overcrowding. On January 8th there were 497 paupers in the Farringdon Road Workhouse, though the building is only certified to hold 330 inmates. Secondly, there is a notable decrease in the consumption of meat in poor districts. It is not only the eating-house keepers who complain of this, but the butchers have also been loud in their complaints. Those in the neighborhood of the Seven Dials state that they never knew times to be so bad. One butcher declared that he was "idle by the hour together, whereas formerly he never had ten minutes to spare." A noted coffee tavern in the Seven Dials can no longer sell its confectionery as formerly; the demand is limited to the cheapest dishes, and the customers very generally bring in their own bread, which shows they are compelled to make the most of their money. A third point established is that there is a great increase everywhere in the consumption of bread, which indicates that meat can no longer be afforded.

The present Winter in England has, according to two great weather observers, Messrs. Plant and Symons, been the coldest, with only four exceptions, during the last ninety-one years. Its essential characteristic is pronounced to have been "long-continued moderate frost." One substantial consolation is suggested by these two distinguished meteorologists, namely, that for one remarkably inclement winter the statistics of weather prove that there are half a dozen mild winters. From a comparison of eighty-six years Mr. Plant demonstrates that the proportion of severe winters is one to six. This does not mean that next winter will certainly be a mild one, because, for instance, the winter of 1812–13, which annihilated Napoleon's host in Russia, was followed by one equally severe in 1813–14. On the other hand, there may be a respite of double seven years before the late experience is renewed. But still the chances are six to one in favor of next winter being a mild one.

The British war in Afghanistan appears from recent telgrams to be not so near a conclusion as earlier intelligence led us to expect. The Russian General, Rasgonoff, who was in the suite of the Ameer of Afghanistan, stated in an interview with the correspondent of an American journal his own strong conviction that whether the illness of the Ameer terminated fatally, or he recovered, the war would be vigorously prosecuted. Moreover, the General professes to believe that the force at the command of the Ameer, or his son Yakoob Khan, is powerful enough to drive the British out of the country; and he narrates a story of an attempt, on the part of England, to secure, in a circuitous manner, the non-intervention of Russia, by a bribe of $400,000. In predicting the result of the war the Russian General was probably giving utterance to his desires as to its issue; and in the story of the British attempt at bribery he doubtless drew altogether on his imagination, guided by his knowledge of what Russia would do in like circumstances, if she could only persuade some confiding friend to loan her the money to bribe with.

Prince Napoleon going to fight the Zulus—It is announced from London that the French Prince Imperial was to sail for the Cape on February 27th. He intends to join as a volunteer the column which is likely to have the sharpest fighting, his earnest petition for a commission in the British army having been rejected. He will be permitted to join the staff of the Royal Artillery. Behind the military ardor which may have first suggested this idea to the young Prince, there is no doubt the deeper design of dazzling the excitable subjects of his late father by brilliant exploits in the field, and thus preparing a way for his being called to the throne. If, as nearly all students of prophecy believe, God has purposed that a Napoleon shall be the future Antichrist and tyrant of the world, this may be regarded as one of the strange but certain steps by which the decrees of Jehovah come about. The present Government of France, under M. Jules Grevy, which is mightily popular, simply because it is a change, cannot possibly last, for the French people are by constitution and taste unfitted to be ruled by any man but a soldier.

Mrs. M. Baxter has returned to the scene of her unremitting labors in Germany after a fortnight's visit to London and Brighton, where three days' Conference for the Deepening of Spiritual Life was held on January 28th, 29th, and 30th. Her experience of the gift of ability to preach in the German language has been somewhat similar to Miss Reade's, of Punrooty, in Southern India. Miss Reade was enabled, in answer to prayer, to preach in Hindustanee after a month's study of the language. (See John 1 : 50.) The Baron Von Gemminger and Pastor Stockmayer also went over from their own country to the Brighton Conference.

A Princess's Monument.—In a little church at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, England, there is a beautiful marble monument, erected by the Queen. It depicts a young girl reclining with her head on an open Bible, and on the marble page we read the words, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It represents the young Princess Elizabeth, who, during the wars of the Commonwealth, languished in Carisbrook Castle, and was found by the gaoler lying dead on the floor, with her cheek upon the open page, and just at this particular text. We may hope that the young princess had found in her loneliness and solitude how true were the Master's words, and had learnt by experience that even in the prison-house the weary soul can, and does, find rest in the Saviour.

The disaster on board the English war vessel Thunderer, on January 2d, by which ten men lost their lives and thirty-three were badly injured, has been made the subject of investigation, with the following result:

"The committee are agreed as to the cause, and they report that the gun having missed fire when loaded with a battering charge, was again loaded with a full charge and fired with both of the charges and the projectiles in the gun at the same time." Or the committee might have said, these men lost their lives through the gross carelessness of the official intrusted with the command of the gun.

A young French sculptor, named Vidal, who has attained high distinction in his art, has been totally blind ever since the age of twenty-one. He persevered in the profession he had adopted, and after months of patient labor found that he could really make his fingers do the work of eyes. His touch has, in truth, become so sensitive that by means of feeling his model in every part he is able to reproduce it with an exactitude often not gained by those who merely see it. He generally takes animals for his subjects—lions, stags, panthers, hares, horses—and his skill in modelling their forms in various attitudes is so great that it gained him a medal at the Salon of 1861. The State has also purchased several of his marbles and bronzes.

The Rev. Charles Chiniquy is now in Australia. He was formerly a priest of the Romish Church in Canada, but for many years he has been a zealous Protestant, and has labored indefatigably as a preacher and lecturer, exposing the errors of Popery. And to such an extent have his labors been blessed, that no less than 25,000 persons have, through his instrumentality, been led to leave the Romish Church in Canada. He is now lecturing in Sydney (Australia) and the suburbs night after night to crowded and enthusiastic audiences, and his visit seems likely to be in a high degree serviceable to the cause of Protestant Christianity.

Sunday Afternoon in Germany.—The close of the afternoon service is the signal for the commencement of the Sunday revels. On ordinary Sundays the men play skittles at the public-houses, while the women sit together in groups at their doors, and gossip, or sing, or do nothing; but whenever the people have any money in their pockets, and can afford to pay for a band, they get up dances and amusements. An excuse for such festivities is never wanting—a school feast, a wedding, or a patriotic anniversary. The Government, in its anxiety to keep up a military spirit in the country, encourages every thing which will recall the victories of the Franco-German war; and as every village furnished its contingent at that time, opportunities of revelry are not wanting.

A London grocer's abandonment of the sale of intoxicants is one of many beneficial results of Mr. William Noble's Temperance Meetings at the Standard Theatre and the Hoxton Music Hall. His name is Mr. B. Townsend, of the firm of Townsend, Crampton & Co., wholesale and retail grocers, 132 High Holborn, E.C., London. He has written the following letter to Mr. Noble:

"I have been struggling for years with the demon of drink, aiming at moderation, and persistently missing the mark. About three years ago we added the wine, spirit, and beer trade to our grocery; since then my difficulties have increased, for 'you cannot touch pitch without being defiled.'

"The first Sunday night of the season I went in the company of an abstainer to the Standard Theatre. What I heard there about the drink traffic did not increase my self-esteem, but I could not see my way out of it. 'How can I,' I asked myself, 'profess total abstinence and sell the stuff at the same time?' But I am glad to tell you I have cut the Gordian knot by giving up the trade. I have persuaded my partners to agree to it, and we have banished every bottle of the accursed stuff from the premises; the hateful sign, 'Wines and Spirits,' is painted out, and, with God's help, I hope this year, instead of selling (as we did last year) about 600 dozen of wine and spirits, to be instrumental in preventing the consumption of some.

"I have no fear but that I shall be just as well off, notwithstanding the loss it will entail, and, being released from bondage myself, I feel I ought to do something towards helping others. Something has been telling me this week that I ought at least to pay the rent of the theatre for the night that I may say I was saved from the drink traffic. I therefore inclose you a cheque to make up that amount, wishing you and the cause God speed."

The Reconciliation of two Brothers, gentlemen of position in Liverpool, was once curiously effected by the late Rev. Dr. McNeile, long and well known as one of the most fiery opponents of Popery in England. Although, on account of an unhappy feud which was publicly known, the two brothers scarcely recognized each other, yet they both attended Dr. McNeile's church. He therefore preached on one communion Sunday on the duty of brotherly reconciliation, taking his text from Matthew 5 : 23, 24. The blessed effect upon the alienated brothers was simultaneous. They remained, as if by consent, t communicate, and as they advanced from thei respective pews towards the communion-tabl the pastor motioned them into juxtaposition a the rails, and as they knelt side by side, he, i silent but expressive action, joined their hand together in the mutual grasp of restored frater nal affection, continuing till they sealed thei reconciliation over the memorials of their Lord' dying love. Their widowed mother rejoiced a only a fond Christian mother could over th reunion of her children.

Why was Dr. McNeile never made a bisho has been asked many times. He himself ga the answer on the occasion of a great Protesta meeting at Liverpool in the year 1855, when was rudely interrupted, while speaking, by Romanist, who shouted out, "You want to made a bishop!" Turning on the speake McNeile instantly replied, "No, no; if I wou only have patted Popery on the back I shou have been a bishop long ago."

MR. P. P. BLISS.

Grief of the Church at the Death of Mr. Bliss—The Charm of His Character—His Simplicity and Geniality—His Birth—Intimacy with Mr. Moody—His Happy Marriage—Work at Chautauqua—The Last Night There—Assisting Major Whittle—The Fatal Railroad Catastrophe.

THE fearful railway tragedy at Ashtabula, Ohio, on December 29th, 1876, sent a thrill of horror through those who heard of it before the names of the unfortunate victims had been announced. But what was the consternation and grief of the American church when the fact was made known that, among the unrecognized or unrecovered passengers, was the evangelist and singer, P. P. Bliss, who, through his many songs, and especially through his association with Major Whittle in evangelistic labor, was so well and so widely known.

Mr. Bliss was on his way to Chicago to engage in special labors. He was accompanied by his lovely and devoted wife, who went down with him in the fated train, and who, with him, entered the Father's house.

Mr. Bliss was one of the noblest and one of the gentlest of men. He had the delicacy of a woman and the strength of a man. His physique was magnificent, large, well-proportioned, graceful, with a fine, manly face, full of expression. His voice was a grand instrument of music, and from its strength came forth sweetness and power. It was deep, of wonderful compass and pathos. As it rang out through the woods at Chautauqua Conference, the most thoughtless would stop and listen. Its marvellous magnetic charm was intensified by the energy of the Divine Spirit, which so thoroughly possessed the body and soul of the sweet singer.

To the utmost transparency of his pure and simple character he added a fervent and childlike faith. He was a rare Christian. He knew and believed, and enjoyed and lived, and preached and sang the Gospel of Christ. His songs were for the glory of Christ. He had one aim and one work in life. He was always on the look-out for souls. He coveted, above every thing else, spiritual results. At "Sunday-school Assembly," in private conversation, in the prayer-meetings, in the eventide conferences, on the platform, everywhere, he seemed absorbed in this one great work. He came to the Chautauqua meetings of 1876 full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and all his work was accompanied by Divine power.

One of the holiest, Mr. Bliss was one of the cheeriest of men. His was not a sombre piety. There was no touch of asceticism in his nature. He was as simple as a child, and full of genial humor. His personal letters overflow with playfulness, puns, rhymes, and personal thrusts of the wittiest but always of the most generous character. He lived in the light. It was the light of the Lord, and that is the light of love. He never had any thing but good to say of his brethren. He never carped nor criticised. He saw in others what he had most of in himself. He took "to" people. He loved his fellow-men.

Many of his songs have real merit, and will live and be sung for many years to come. They are charged with the sentiment and the force of the living Gospel. "I am so glad that our Father in heaven" will be a child-song in the church of the future. "If there's only one Song" of his that remains, it will be that one. His "Almost Persuaded" has the solemnity of eternity in it. Many a soul has been led by it to immediate decision. "Still there's more to follow" has kindled the faith of the believer, and led him to seek more of the wondrous "grace" and "love" and "power" which are the burden of it. "The Light of the World is Jesus," is a song which derives peculiar significance from the tragic end of its author. Did he sing at the last,—

> "No darkness have we who in Jesus abide"?

That the prayer of the song "When Jesus comes" was fulfilled in his last moments, I cannot doubt:

> "Oh let my lamp be burning
> When Jesus comes."

I can hear him sing again out of the tempest in which his earthly barque was foundered, as his redeemed spirit looked upon the shores of the glorious land just beyond—

> "Bright gleams the morning, sailor, uplift the eye,
> Clouds and darkness disappearing, glory is nigh!
> Safe in the life-boat, sailor, sing evermore,
> 'Glory, glory, hallelujah!' pull for the shore."

MRS. BLISS was in every way worthy of the noble companion of her life and death. She was the means of his conversion, and she encouraged him to put forth his earliest efforts as a musician. How her rich alto voice would pour forth its volumes of music as they stood together on the Chautauqua platform! Again and again they sang to an immense concourse of people, and amidst the stillness of the grave the people would hear these voices of the Lord calling to them as out of eternity.

Mr. Bliss was born in Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, July 9th, 1838. He was a popular music-teacher in the West, somewhat prominent in the musical conventions conducted by Bradbury, Root, and others. He afterwards became a successful conductor of such gatherings, and devoted much time to that branch of labor, until, as the intimate friend of Mr. Moody, the way opened for engaging in evangelistic work. Meantime, he had become more widely known as a writer of pleasant Sunday-school and prayer-meeting songs, sometimes both words and music, some of which attained to remarkable popularity, as, for instance, "I am so glad that Jesus loves me," which went like a sunbeam round the world.

His hymns and music generally appeal to the emotional nature. Such a song as "Only an armor-bearer," or "Let your lower lights be burning," will do more towards rousing sluggish hearts to immediate action than a grand Te Deum rendered in the most artistic manner.

A noble specimen of physical manhood, of commanding presence, naturally dignified in movement, and of easy address, he possessed, in a rare degree, the elements of personal popularity, which always attracted the attention of the multitude, whenever he appeared in public, and won hosts of friends, who held a cosey place in his great loving heart.

Mrs. Bliss was a modest, lovable, Christian woman, a real helpmeet for him. Possessing a fair share of musical ability, a good contralto voice, and excellent taste, she supplemented her husband's labors most admirably, aiding whenever there was any thing she could do—a true Christian wife, a loving and faithful mother, and sincere friend; and > —"hand in hand

> They passed into the silent land," and together began the new song.

A friend says, "The last time I joined in song with them we were under the grand old trees at Chautauqua. A sister of Mr. Bliss (a soprano) with Mr. and Mrs. Bliss and myself made up the quartette. They were about leaving. We turned to his song, "Meet Me at the Fountain," and Bliss sang, with unusual sweetness, the solo:

> "Will you meet me at the fountain,
> When I reach the glory-land?"

And when we together responded for the last time, "Yes, I'll meet you at the fountain," the emotions were too deep for utterance, while with uncovered heads we bowed at the rustic seat, and Mr. Bliss offered a fervent but peculiarly sweet and tender prayer, that, if we should not stand to sing again on the banks of the beautiful lake which shimmered in the sunlight before us, we might meet "beyond the river, by and by."

But Mr. Bliss's work is not yet done. His songs will sing themselves into many a weary heart; will awaken many a dull Christian to new zeal; will alarm the careless, carry sweet messages of home love to the prodigal, encourage the timid, and be the means of winning many souls to Christ. And so it shall long be said of him, that, "being dead, he yet speaketh," throughout all Christendom. It will be a glorious result if the usefulness of his life and the suddenness of his death shall prove a lesson that is heeded by all, as it should be, quickening the impulses, kindling the zeal, and purifying the motives of those who remain to work in the harvest-field where the efficient laborers are too few.

Mr. Bliss for a time was in the employment of the publishing firm of Root & Cady, Chicago, and held musical conventions at leading points through the Northwest. His early religious connections were with the Methodists, but, on going to Chicago, he united with the First Congregational Church, under the pastoral care of Rev. Dr. Goodwin, and became the leader of the choir and the Superintendent of the Sunday-school during a period of several years. Such was the kindness of his heart, the warmth of his piety, and the personal interest which he took in the members of the choir and school, that he won the affection as well as the regard of the whole church, which now mourns him with a special sense of bereavement.

When Major Whittle, induced by the example and urgent entreaty of Mr. Moody and other Christian friends, surrendered the lucrative business post at which he was receiving a salary of five thousand dollars, and gave himself in simple faith unreservedly to the work of a lay-evangelist, Mr. Bliss decided to become his fellow-laborer, and to "sing the Gospel," while Mr. Whittle preached it. And this he did for three years with great success, visiting not only numerous places in the Western States, but also Louisville, Nashville, Atlanta, Memphis, and other points at the South. Being tall and well developed in his physical frame, with clustering black hair an a handsome face, and possessing easy and polished manners and a very joyous temperament together with a wealth of sympathy, he impresse most favorably those who saw and heard him whether in public or in private. His singing like that of Mr. Sankey, often led sinners t Christ by its touching presentations of gospe truth. What multitudes have been thrilled b his lines:

> "Hallelujah! 'tis done!
> I believe on the Son;
> I am saved by the blood of the Crucified One."

The catastrophe in which Mr. and Mrs. Bli lost their lives was one of the most terrible c the records of railroad disasters. It occurred c the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Ra road, which is the western extension of the Ne York Central, and runs from Buffalo to Chicag Sixty-five miles east of Cleveland, in Ohio, th railway crosses a deep ravine, through which flo Ashtabula Creek. It is a narrow, shallow strea flowing between high banks, and the railw bridge crosses at an elevation of about seven feet above the water, the single span of the ir Howe truss bridge being one hundred and fi feet long. On the west side of the creek, an few rods from it, is the railway station for t village of Ashtabula, which is from half a m to a mile distant from the station.

During December 28th and 29th, 1876, sn fell almost incessantly in that region, a hi wind drifting it, so that it was everywhere least two feet deep, and in some places mu more. Railway trains were run with great di culty, and the "Pacific Express," which Buffalo for the West about noon on the 29 had to have two locomotives to drag it, and th was about three hours behind time when it proached the creek, at eight P.M. The tr consisted of eight passenger coaches and th baggage cars. As it neared the bridge it slo preparatory to stopping at the station just yond. The train had stretched itself across bridge, the locomotives being almost over, w suddenly the structure fell. The cause is known. Every car fell into the chasm, and two locomotives were drawn back, one of th falling bottom upwards upon the wreck belo

OUR EARTH IN THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

Vhen the Millennium will Commence—The Physical Condition of the Millennial Earth—A Partial Conflagration Commences the Millennium —The Earth Perfected During the Millennium —Many People Destroyed in the Fire—The Life of the Survivors—The Curse Partially Repealed—Important Changes in Nature.

WHEN Christ descends personally with His lorified saints upon Mount Olivet at the close f this Gentile dispensation, as predicted in echariah 14 : 4 and Acts 1 : 11, then the Millen-ium of one thousand years will commence (Re-elation 20).

The leading features of the Millennial earth may be noticed under four heads as regards the hanges in its condition. 1, Physically ; 2, Po-tically and Socially ; 3, Religiously ; 4, As re-pects the Jewish nation.

1. As regards the physical condition of the uture Millennial earth, it is important to remem-er that the earth will not be completely burnt up r depopulated at the Second Advent. The day f the Lord, in which the general conflagration s to occur (2 Peter 3 : 10), is not a day of twenty-our hours, but is explained, in 2 Peter 3 : 8, to e a period of 1000 years, and is, in fact, the ame period as the Millennium. The conflagra-ion will take place partially at the beginning of he 1000 years (Rev. 18 ; Is. 66 : 15 ; Ezek. 39 : 6 ; Thess. 1 : 8), and more completely at the end of the 1000 years (Rev. 20 : 9, 20, 21), when there will be no more sea.

Thus, also, the New Heavens and New Earth eem to commence partially with the Millennium (Is. 65 : 17 ; 66 : 22), but are not completely erfected until the end of the Millennium, when the sea, having given up its dead, altogether disappears (Rev. 21 : 1). After the battle of Armageddon some of the less hardened sinners will be spared and converted, and will be sent as missionaries to the nations and to the isles afar off that have not heard the fame nor seen the glory of the Lord (Is. 65 : 19).

But, although a few men are left (Is. 24 : 6), yet a great many of the remaining inhabitants of the earth are burned at that time, for the Lord Jesus will send a fire on them that dwell carelessly in the isles (or different continents of the earth) (Ezek. 39 : 6), and will execute judgment upon all (Jude 15) with flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God (2 Thess. 1 : 8), and by fire and by His sword will plead with all flesh : and the slain of the Lord shall be many (Is. 66 : 16).

After the incorrigible rejectors of the Gospel are cut off, the surviving population of the earth (probably a tenth or twentieth part of its present population) will quickly increase and multiply, and live in successive generations ; births, deaths, and marriages continually taking place as at the present time. The glorified saints that will have been previously caught up to the heavens at the Resurrection and two Translations will live in the Heavenly Jerusalem, and constantly descend and ascend between it and this earth, over which they will, visibly or invisibly, reign as kings (Genesis 28 : 12 ; John 1 : 51).

The curse that has rested upon the animal, vegetable, and mineral creation ever since the fall of Adam will be to a great extent repealed. As soon as all the people praise God, then shall the earth yield her increase (Psalm 67 : 7). The hitherto sterile soil will become extraordinarily fruitful, and will require very little labor in order to produce abundant crops (Amos 9 : 13 ; Joel 3 : 18 ; Is. 30 : 23). Weeds will almost cease to grow naturally upon it. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree (Is. 55 : 13).

There will be important atmospheric, meteorological, and geological changes, by means of which waste, wildernesses, such as the Great Sahara, and frozen regions, like those of Siberia, will become clothed with fertility and beauty, for the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose . . . . and the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water (Is. 35). Entire exemption from sickness does not seem to be promised to the Gentile nations as to the Jews : but the leaves of the tree of life in the New Jerusalem are for the healing of the nations (Rev. 22 : 2), and will apparently be brought down from the New Jerusalem to those upon earth who are sick. All the blind, deaf, dumb, and lame that are spared at Christ's descent will be healed (Is. 35 : 5).

Venomous serpents will become quite harmless, and ferocious animals, such as the wolf, the leopard, the lion, and the bear, becoming graminivorous instead of carnivorous, will live peaceably with sheep and cattle (Is. 11 : 6 ; 60 : 25), and may, perhaps, be used as beasts of burden. Man's lifetime will, perhaps, be prolonged ; the express promise of longevity appears, however, to be only given to the Jewish nation (Is. 65 : 20). These changes will necessarily cause an unparalleled increase of the earth's inhabitants, so that they will become as numerous as the sand upon the seashore (Rev. 20 : 8).

It will be interesting to observe, during the Millennium, how the difficulties arising from the great increase of population will be provided against. In England, the population, which is now 330 persons to the square mile, has doubled itself in fifty years, from A.D. 1800 to 1850, and political economists consider that, if unchecked by wars, scarcity of food, etc., it would easily double itself every twenty-five years. At this rate the earth's inhabitants, if only fifty millions at the beginning of the Millennium, would become 204,800,000,000 in the three hundredth year, which would be about 3400 persons to every square mile of land, for only 60,000,000 out of the 200,000,000 square miles of the earth's surface consist of land.

This would perhaps be as great a population as the earth could well contain, and would require about three fourths of its soil to be under cultivation, and sufficiently fertile to yield on an average from each acre (the 640th part of a square mile) enough food for seven persons. (Even now, one acre has been known to yield, by spade cultivation, enough to support twenty persons.) There will, doubtless, be special Providential arrangements which will prevent too great a multiplication of the human race.

This estimation of about 200,000,000,000 as the possible maximum of the earth's population (being 150 times greater than its present population of 1,300,000,000) will make the unglorified inhabitants of the Millennial earth to be 500 times more numerous than the glorified saints of the First Resurrection (Rev. 20 : 6) who will reign over them—that is, if these latter (exclusive of deceased infants) be approximately estimated to amount to about 400,000,000. There would also thus be probably more people living on the earth at one time than the whole sum of all the successive populations during the past 6000 years.

(To be concluded.)

A TOWN IN FLAMES.

THE terrible spectacle of a whole town in flames was witnessed in the State of Nevada on March 2d. The prosperous and thriving town of Reno, in the western part of that State, was the scene of the sad calamity. About a quarter before six o'clock in the morning a fire broke out in some wooden buildings at the west end of the business streets. A strong gale was blowing from the west, and before water could be thrown on the fire it was beyond control.

The flames spread from house to house and block to block with the rapidity of lightning, and the panic-stricken people leaped from their beds, seized handfuls of their most valuable property and escaped, leaving all else to the devouring flames. The firemen were helpless, as the strength of the gale and intensity of the heat rendered close approach to the flames impossible.

In three hours the whole business portion of the town was in ashes. Among the buildings destroyed are freight depots, Bender's bank, the Post-office, the Pollard, International, and Arcade hotels, jewelry stores, Penninger & Osburn's drug-store, both telegraph offices, the railroad and baggage rooms, the Baptist and Catholic churches, the Academy of Music, dry-goods stores, clothing stores, and grocery stores.

Two or three Central Pacific trains, including the lightning train, were also destroyed. The condition of the track made it necessary to transfer passengers to the Virginia and Truckee train across the river for Virginia City.

The loss, as nearly as can be calculated at present, is about $1,000,000, and the insurance only about $150,000. Only five lives are known to have been lost. A number of persons were injured, but at this writing it is impossible to obtain correct information regarding them.

The gale blowing was the fiercest known for many a day, and it carried blazing pieces of timber miles away and several farm-houses two miles down the meadows were burned by this means. After working until exhausted the whites forced the Chinese to work on the engines. Homes are in great demand, and the citizens are throwing open their doors to the homeless, and are doing all they can to relieve the distressed.

THE METHODIST GARDENER AND LORD CORNWALLIS.

METHODISM in Ireland was at the time of its union with England looked upon with suspicion, and this was especially the case during the time of the Rebellion. Lord Cornwallis happened to spend a few days with Speaker Foster. At that time Mr. Barber was stationed in that circuit as the minister. He and Mr. Foster's gardener, who was also a Methodist, were walking in Speaker Foster's grounds one day, when Barber, who was instant in season and out of season, asked the gardener to engage in prayer. They both knelt down, and Barber was praying aloud, when Lord Cornwallis and Speaker Foster, who were out walking, heard voices, drew near, and listened. Among the requests made to God were appeals for assistance to the Government, who were placed in such trying circumstances, and that God would bless and direct the counsels of the Lord-lieutenant—Lord Cornwallis. Barber in his prayer breathed the deepest loyal devotion, and concluded by imploring a blessing upon the Methodists, and that they should be saved from the devil and Squire Ruxton of Ardee. "Who is this squire?" asked Lord Cornwallis, and Mr. Foster replied that he was a neighboring squire, who persecuted the Methodists. "And what does this praying mean?" asked Lord Cornwallis. "Oh," replied Mr. Foster, "this gardener of mine is one of those Methodist fellows, and I must dismiss him." "You will do no such thing," said the other. "Did you hear how he prayed for me, for the Council, for the King, and for the Government? Indeed, these Methodists must be a loyal people ; and as for Squire Ruxton, just take my compliments to him, and tell him that I think these Methodists are very good people, and that he must leave them alone." That prayer of poor Barber's put a stop to the worst persecution ever endured in that neighborhood, and, while passes were required of others, free permission was given to the Methodist preacher to go where he liked and do what he liked.

Henry Martyn's Prayer.—On the occasion when the British flag was hoisted on the Dutch fort of the Cape, on the 10th January, 1806, Henry Martyn, the noble missionary, on his way to India, being present, offered up the following prayer : "That the capture of the Cape might be ordered to the advancement of Christ's kingdom, and that England, while she sent the thunder of her arms to the distant regions of the globe, might not remain proud and ungodly at home, but might show herself great indeed, by sending forth the ministers of her Church to diffuse the Gospel of peace." Subsequently, by Dr. Moffat, and many others, the Gospel has been widely preached in South Africa.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The extra session of Congress summoned for March 18th will probably witness a test of the Constitutional question of money appropriations. English history records several instances in which the legislative body has forced its will on the king by withholding supplies; it remains to be seen whether like methods will enable the Democratic party, under our Constitution, to force the passage of their three points by tacking them to a money bill. The three bills demanded by the Democratic party are thus stated by Senator Beck: "To repeal all laws that authorize the soldiers of the Republic to be sent to the polls at State elections; to repeal all laws which prevent any competent person being impanelled on a jury; and to declare that the United States shal not, either through Supervisors, Marshals, or Deputy Marshals, interfere with the States in condncting the elections held within the States.

The choice of Speaker is thought to lie between Mr. Randall and Mr. Blackburn. The former has the advantage of experience, and it is said that the Republicans will vote for him, on the ground that it is better to have a good Speaker than to snatch a mere party advantage.

The Democratic nomination for the next presidential election is stated to have been demanded for Mr. Samuel J. Tilden by his friends on the plea that he suffered injustice at the last election. It is no secret that many Democrats would prefer some candidate whose prospects would not be injured by the imputations attaching to Mr. Tilden on the cipher-telegram score; but it is said that Mr. Tilden's friends threaten, that if he do not have the nomination, New York State will not vote the Democratic ticket, and say that without the Empire State no Democratic candidate could hope to win the election.

A reform in the state of tenement-houses is so urgently needed that the agitation for their improvement has not been allowed to rest at the sermons which were lately preached in New York upon the subject, and to which allusion was made in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Two meetings have since been held at the Cooper Institute, when various plans for improvement were discussed, and resolutions passed with a view of giving a practical turn to the subject. The true offenders in the sad state of affairs are clearly marked out by the following resolution, which was passed at the second meeting: That this community will hold to strict accountability public officers who may be charged with the execution of the laws now in force, or which may be secured by the present movement for the amelioration of the tenement-house population.

The Questions involved in the Chinese Emigration bill, which are the general topic of political discussion throughout the country, have been forcibly stated by Mr. Joseph Cook as follows:

Here are the great propositions that underlie our whole debate concerning the Chinese:

We cannot have in China the rights of the most favored nation there, unless we give the Chinese the rights of the most favored nation here. We ought to be above asking or hoping for more than the rights we grant.

If we do not here treat the Chinese fairly, and if we do not respect our treaty obligations when they are once settled in the regular form, we are sure to strike a blow at this gigantic commerce which is the best hope of the political and religious regeneration of Asia.

A catastrophe which might have resulted in great loss of life has occurred in New York. The latest development of the craze for feats of pedestrianism is an "International Walking Match," in which the representatives of four nations were last week engaged in walking around Gilmore's Garden, the large building in which Mr. Moody formerly held his meetings.

Some 10,000 persons, many of them ladies, had congregated on the evening of March 12th to witness the spectacle, the charm of which it is somewhat difficult to understand, when as the four men were hurrying around the track a series of alarming cries were heard and men and women were seen falling from an upper gallery on the heads of the people below. The front of the gallery had been extended, and boxes had been erected on the new floor, which had no support from beneath. The floor bent beneath the weight of people in the new boxes, and finally tilted them down, with their chairs, etc., into the area of the building. Some signs of a panic were observed and a rush was made for the doors, but quiet was finally restored, and nine persons, more or less seriously injured, were removed to the hospital.

Deputy United States Marshal Roe on February 27th arrested at Pekin and Peoria, Illinois, some fifty persons under indictment at Springfield for complicity in whiskey frauds. Some of them are among the most prominent and wealthiest citizens. The arrested men represent every branch of business, and startling developments are promised. No occurrence has produced so much excitement in that section for years. One of the chief witnesses is said to be a son of the heaviest distiller in theregion.

Mr. Moody's work at Baltimore differs from his labors in other cities in the fact that no tabernacle was built for his services. He has distributed his efforts through the churches o the city, with the result that a general revival has been felt, and every class of society and every denomination of Christians have experienced the blessed power of the Spirit. It i said that "even the Catholics have somethin very like inquiry-meetings, and some of th priests have developed a gift at exhortation The general result is, that there was probabl never before a large city so generally under revival influence as Baltimore is at the presen time. The main question of personal salvatio has been raised and pressed to an answer in a wonderful degree." Mr. Moody's "rest" has bee thus abundantly blessed of God to the spiritu rest of many weary souls.

The grandest petition ever presented to legislative body was laid before the Legislatur of the State of Illinois on Wednesday, Marc 5th, by the Woman's Christian Temperanc Union. It was 1800 feet long and containe 107,000 names, of which about 50,000 were th names of voters. Four hundred and thirty seven towns were represented. The petition wa for the enactment of a law by which the que tion of licensing liquor saloons in any precin shall be determined by ballot, in which wome of lawful age shall take part. It is claimed b the liquor interest that such a law can only b enacted as an amendment to the Constitution.

The Cable's Silver Wedding was celebrat at the residence of Cyrus W. Field, Gramer Park, New York, on Monday evening, Mar 10th. Twenty-five years before, in a back parlor that same house, Cyrus W. Field, Peter Coop Marshall O. Roberts, Moses Taylor, and Chandl White pledged themselves to the execution of enterprise of as surpassing importance as a which this century has witnessed. That was undertaking to lay an Atlantic telegraph ca which should unite the Continents of Europe a America, and it has now become a grand succe but it first had to pass through great vicis tudes, sufficient to discourage less determin men. Of those five projectors of a sche which has marked a new departure in t history of civilization, four were present to ce brate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the for tion of the Company, Mr. White having died the interval. The assemblage was a very b liant one, including Secretary Evarts, the Brit and Russian Ministers, and a very numer throng of distinguished persons.

Messages of congratulation from Lond Valentia, Glasgow, Berlin, Montreal, Atlan Newfoundland, and Jamaica, besides many pa of this country, stretching from the Atlantic the Pacific Oceans, were conveyed by a t graphic wire into the very room where the gu were assembled, which expressed a communit feeling geographical separation was power to prevent.

ces ; Spain has lost a great deal of her power ; any of the thrones of the world are being vered ; many of the sceptres of the world are ng shortened ; but every tract-distributor, ery Bible printer, every Christian institution ablished, spreads abroad the mighty name of rist. It has already been heard under the nese wall, and in the Siberian snow castle, and he Brazilian grove, and in the Eastern pagoda. at name will swallow up all other names. at crown will yet cover up all other crowns. at empire will yet compass all dominations.

By have you made up your mind to call n you first meet Him in heaven? ll Him "Anointed One," or "Mes- will you take some one of the sym- s which you read in your Bible on s by which Christ was designated? y perhaps you will be wandering gardens of God on high, the place abloom with eternal springtime, infinite luxuriance of lily and rose and amaranth, and perhaps you will look up into the face of Christ and say, "My Lord, Thou art the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley." Some time there will be a new soul come into heaven to take its place in the firmament and shine as the stars forever and ever, and the lustre of a useful life will shine forth tremulous and beautiful, and you will look up into the face of Christ and say, "My Lord, Thou art a brighter star, the Morning Star, the star of Jacob, the star of the Redeemer." Some day you will be walking among the fountains that toss in the sunlight, falling in crash of pearl and amethyst into golden and crystalline urn, and wandering up the round-banked river to the place where the water first tinkles its silver on the rock, and from chalices of love you will be drinking to honor and everlasting joy, and you will look up into the face of Christ and say, "My Lord, my Lord, Thou art The Fountain of Living Water." Some day you will be wandering among the banks and the sheep of heaven feeding by the rock, rejoicing in the care of Him who brought you out of the wilderness world into the sheepfold, and you will look up into His face, and say, "My Lord, my Lord, Thou art the Shepherd of the Everlasting Hills."

But there is another name by which you can call Him. Perhaps that will be the name I have not mentioned yet. I imagine that

HEAVEN IS ALL FULL.

Every throne has its king. Every harp has its harper. All the wealth of the universe has come into heaven. There is nothing to be added. The song full. The ranks full. The mansions all full. Heaven full. The sun will set afire with its splendor the domes of the temple, and burnish the golden streets into a blaze, and be reflected back from the solid pearl of the twelve gates, and it will be noon in heaven. Noon on the river. Noon on the hills. Noon in the valleys. High noon. And then you will look up, gradually accustoming your vision to the sight, shading your eyes at the first lest they be extinguished with the insufferable splendor, until after a while you can look upon the full irradiation, and you will cry out, "My Lord, my Lord, Thou art The Sun that Never Sets."

But at this point I am staggered with the thought that there may be persons in this house for whom this name has no charm, though it is so easy, though it is so beautiful, though it is so potent, though it is so enduring. Oh! come to-day, and see whether there is any thing in Christ. I challenge you to test with me this morning whether God is good, and whether Christ is precious, and whether the Holy Ghost is omnipotent. Come, my brother, I challenge you. Come, and we will kneel at the altar of mercy. You kneel on one side of the altar and I will kneel on the other side of the altar of mercy, and we will not get up from our knees until our sins are pardoned and we are able to ascribe all honor to the name—you pronouncing it and I pronouncing it—"the name which is above every name."

"His worth if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love Him too."

I pray God He may move upon this assemblage now, that we may see Him walking all through these aisles, that the Holy Spirit may spread His wings over this auditory. Now is your time for heaven. O my friends! meeting once, perhaps never again until the books are opened, what shall we say of this morning's service? Have I told you the whole truth? Have you listened to the whole truth? Now is your time for heaven. Come into the kingdom. If you never had an invitation before, I give it to you now. I do not ask what your sin has been, or what your wandering. That is not pertinent to the question. The only thing is whether you want Christ. Come in, the furthest off. Come, the nearest by. "Where sin abounded, grace shall much more abound." Is there in all this august assemblage a man who feels he is too wicked to come? You are mistaken. Come now. "Now is the accepted time ; now is the day of salvation."

O ye who are young! come now. It is no gloomy religion that I preach. It will take no lustre from your eye. It will take no color from your cheek. It will take no spring from your step. I know what I am talking about. I have felt the consolation of this grace in my own heart. It is not a theory with me. I know in whom I believe, and He has been so good a friend to me, I have a right this morning to commend His friendship to all the people. Oh! come into the kingdom. Do not say you are too bad. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts." "Look unto Me, all ye ends of the earth." How is He going to do—drive you into the kingdom? He will not do it. If you get in at all, it will be because you are drawn in by His love. What does He say? "Look unto Me, all ye ends of the earth." He was lifted up. What for? To drive? No! lifted up to draw. Oh! come now, come now into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus. You have heard of who went into a battle against Christ. He hated Christ, and he went into battle, fighting Christ ; but in the battle he got wounded, he was struck by the arrow and he fell, and as he lay with his face up to the sun, and the life-blood was oozing away, he put his hand to his heart and took a handful of blood from the wound, and held it up towards the sun, and cried out: "O Jesus! Thou hast conquered." And if to-day, my hearer, struck through by the arrow of God's gracious Spirit, you realized the truth of what I have been saying, you would surrender yourself to the Lord who bought you ; you would say: "I will no longer battle against Christ's mercy. Lord Jesus, Thou hast conquered." Glorious name! I know not what you will do with it ; but I will tell you one thing before I stop—I must tell it. I will tell you one thing here and now, that I take Him to be my Lord, my God, my pardon, my peace, my comfort, my salvation, my heaven. Blessed be His glorious name forever. "The name which is above every name."

A TELEGRAPH CLERK CONVERTED BY A TELEGRAM.

A YOUNG telegraph operator in an English provincial town was anxious about his soul. But he could not have guessed that a message would reach him as it did. He had been sleepless all night, thinking of his need of a Saviour, and in the morning he went to his work with his heart uttering the publican's prayer. The sunny weather and beauty of summer scenery did not engage him now, for he was longing after that peace of God which the Christian feels.

Absorbed with his desire, he continued to pray, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and was constantly repeating the words, when the click of the signal told him that his office was called. He took his place at the instrument, and quickly and with unusual emotion spelled this message, from "Herbert," at Windermere, to J. B., at Warkworth:

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!" "In whom we have redemption through His blood."

Such a telegram as that the young man had never known to pass the wires before. It was sent to a servant-girl, who, in her distress of mind, had written a letter to her brother "Herbert," at the Lakes ; but it proved a double benediction, for it came to the operator as a direct reply from heaven to his prayer. He accepted it as such, and his faith saw and rested in the Lamb of God.

Meantime the golden telegram went to its destination, and brought peace to the anxious soul of the poor servant-girl. It saved two instead of one. And those words are living words still, and as potent to bless and save—not only two, but ten thousand times ten thousand.

THE STORY OF FELICIA CUFFE,

The Long-Lost but Rescued Nun.

An Original Narrative by Henry Martin.

The Rescued Nun recovers under the Care of Mr. Kirby's Mother—Mr. Kirby, on his Return from Belfast, is delighted to Meet her—Subsequent Arrangements—Happy Denouement.

THE road where Felicia Cuffe had fallen was, indeed, in the country parish of the converted priest, and his house was not far off. Thither, after a short debate, was she borne upon the shoulders of the sympathizing Orangemen. Very carefully did they step in the darkness so as not to shake their burden, and respectfully and decently did they keep Dr. Magrath's large and long cloak closely wrapped around her.

Knocking at the clergyman's door, they found he was not at home; he was in Belfast. But his mother, who, accepting his new opinions, had come to live with him, was in the house, as was also a faithful elderly domestic. They were retiring to bed, and rather late, for, expecting Mr. Kirby, they had been waiting up for him. Not arriving up to twelve o'clock, they made sure that he would not come that night, so, after fastening up the house, they had gone to their respective chambers. The sound of footsteps in front of the house led Mrs. Kirby to think that, after all, her son had returned. Hastening down, she had the hall door unbarred and opened almost as soon as Andy Boyd knocked at it. Glancing at the group before the door in the light of the candle which she held, and seeing a human form wrapped in a cloak upon the men's shoulders, she was seized with great alarm—she naturally thought it was her son, who had suddenly fallen dead or who had been murdered. Andy Boyd, however, soon allayed her agitation by a rapid recital of the actual circumstances.

The body of the still unconscious nun was carried, at Mrs. Kirby's direction, to the dining-room, and laid upon a sofa. After a little all the bearers of the body were dismissed, with the exception of one, the man whom McAdam had summoned to the road from his cottage. His wife, too, was invited to remain, for, fortunately, she had accompanied her husband to Mr. Kirby's dwelling. Long did these ministering angels use every means that their intelligence could suggest or their loving hands supply, before signs of returning life rewarded their endeavors; but warmth and nourishment, carefully administered, can work wonders in such a case as that of Felicia Cuffe. Gradually the vital powers were restored, and in a couple of hours or so, with the help of Mrs. Kirby and her maid, the young nun, brought back from the jaws of death, was able to move to a comfortable chamber. A soft bed had not been known to her since a child she slept in her mother's house. It is not, therefore, surprising that, allured by its luxuriousness and utterly weary, notwithstanding all her recent experiences, she was soon lost in sweet oblivion.

Next morning Mrs. Kirby had a note from her son to say that unexpected business would detain him in Belfast, and that probably he could not be home for a week. In that case he would arrange with a clerical friend to supply his lack of service next Sabbath.

Felicia Cuffe slept on far into the hours of the day following her deliverance. When she awoke she found herself, though still somewhat sore and stiff, much restored in strength, and, so far as mind was concerned, hopeful and tranquil. Mrs. Kirby visiting her, was highly pleased to perceive the favorable condition of her patient. Further on in the day Felicia Cuffe could converse, and the surprise and joy of her hostess may be conceived when she came to know who the fugitive nun was, for she had heard from her son the reason of his visit some time ago to Dublin, which has been related, and how the attempt to recover Mrs. Cuffe's long-lost one had been baffled. Her first impulse was to send the good news she had to tell at once to her son, but, on consideration, she thought she would wait and give him a surprise. She, however, wrote off at once to Felicia's mother.

Felicia Cuffe had no wardrobe—nothing but her nun's dress and Dr. Magrath's cloak, and his fur cap, which John McAdam had found on the road, and had taken to the parsonage. The fur cap was thoroughly spoiled, the cloak was torn, and the nun's dress was now to be discarded for ever. Apparel for her young protégée Mrs. Kirby felt must, therefore, be provided in a day or two. A visit to Armagh, only something more than six miles away, soon enabled Mrs. Kirby to return with all suitable requisites, and little more than half the week was out when Felicia Cuffe could make her appearance in the sitting-room. "And very charming she looks," was Mrs. Kirby's remark to herself, as she glanced at the graceful form and pretty face and intelligent eyes of the ex-nun, once again restored to society. On the same day her mother arrived from Dublin. We will not describe the meeting, it would be to a large extent but a repetition of the rapturous recognition told before of mother and daughter in the apartment of the nunnery.

In due time Mr. Kirby arrived home, and he saw at a glance, from his mother's embarrassed manner and cheerful excitement, that there was on foot some unusual intelligence; Mrs. Cuffe's greeting, too—for, as he entered the sitting-room, she ran forward and seized his hand—excited his curiosity. Above all, her introduction to him of her daughter, Miss Cuffe, filled him with glad surprise and astonishment.

There is little need, we think, to work out the remaining details of our narrative. Mr. Kirby, no less than his mother, found out that Felicia Cuffe was "very charming." He had long since been convinced that celibacy, imposed by the Romish Church upon her clergy, is a cruel and unwarrantable tyranny over the individual—is a fruitful source of immorality—and a practice injurious and perilous to society at large. He had read in his Bible St. Paul's direction that a bishop was to be "the husband of one wife;" and his heart, now kindling with a pure and elevating love, prompted him to obey the injunction.

A few days after his coming home—days, however, which gave him time to discern the noble qualities, the unwavering affection, the mental independence, and the true religiousness which lay at the basis of Miss Cuffe's character—she went with her mother to Dublin. Need it be said that he often found his thoughts moving in that direction? At first he shrank from the idea of asking one who had been a nun to become his wife. Early preconceptions and prejudices, however irrational, are not easily cast aside, and the sacredness of a vestal vow was one of them. Calm reflection, however, soon gave him clearly to see that there was no sacredness—but rather *un*sacredness, as Carlyle says—in a vow taken under restraint and in ignorance, and which, in any case, had no warrant from Scripture, and also which history gave him to know was not Christian, but pagan in its origin. Besides, he perceived that, in becoming his wife, Miss Cuffe would really fulfil the spirit of her vow, which was to devote herself to a religious life.

The clergyman's wife, when true to her position, is the good Samaritan of a town or village: the sick, the wretched, and the poor are the subjects of her ministrations. Miss Cuffe, as his wife, would help him in his parish work; and "pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father" is not to live a useless life, secluded in a convent, but—as he read in the divine Book—it is this: "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted from the world."

A careful consideration of the case, then, did away with all his hesitation. After some correspondence and personal courtship, he travelled again to Dublin—not this time, however, to aid in a rescue, but—well—to "propose." When, having obtained the lady's own consent, he came to break the matter to her mother, Mrs. Cuffe—with her quick, womanly instinct divining the purport of his visit—assailed him with a little playful raillery: "No, sir," she said, before his lips were opened; "I know what you mean to say, and I really cannot allow it. I have been robbed of my daughter once, and that is quite enough. What! you, the champion of my wrongs, about to repeat them! Mr. Kirby, I'm quite ashamed of you, sir!"

The person addressed — not quite certai wished to witness a supreme moment of happin in her daughter's life. That moment s came. Felicia Cuffe, while the color rose to

There re about one hundred and eighty persons in train, and it is a miracle that all were not led by the terrible fall. The survivors say at the greater part would have been saved had not been for the fire, but many of those who aped the fall were burned or drowned, while ny others reserved from these horrors were zen to death. Every horror that could enter o a disaster of the kind made havoc here, and general was the destruction that only seven sons escaped unhurt, while only about sixty aped alive.

MARKABLE RECOVERY OF A LOST DAUGHTER.

By Dr. Barnardo.

appearance of a Young Lady Eighteen Years ld—Her Father's Application to Dr. Bar- ardo—His Discovery of her near Edgware oad—Cure of her Drunkenness—Restoration o her Home, and Marriage.

HE following case I have always felt it diffi- ct to speak about; but within the past two nths I have heard of the unexpected death the lost daughter, who was the chief actor in it and as I shall take care to set forth the facts efully disguised, I think there need be no fear t any of the surviving family will be pained injured by the recital.

few years ago, I received a letter from a tleman occupying an excellent social position a country town. It was to the effect that his ghter, an only girl—eighteen of age, beauti- and accomplished—had suddenly and unex- tedly disappeared from home. No clue was of her whereabouts.

n examining her bedroom some days after disappearance, they found, on bursting open door of a locked cupboard, a number of pty brandy bottles. These, and the confession a groom, that he had occasionally, by his ng mistress's wish, purchased brandy for , pointed irresistibly to the conclusion that a long period this girl was a victim to drink- habits. Her mother was dead; and this, pled with the circumstance that no other y was living in the family, may account for secrecy with which she had acted thus.

he distracted parent spared no pains or ex- se in the endeavor to trace his child. It was even known whether she had gone to Lon- n or Liverpool, so successfully had she at the way-station thrown her pursuers off the nt. The police were communicated with, detectives employed. Advertisements, care- y worded to attract her attention, were in- ted in the leading papers day after day, but no tidings came to assuage the grief of her almost frantic father.

Nearly two months passed thus hopelessly. Somehow, one of my papers, written in the early part of our mission work, came into the father's hands, and he wrote at once, telling me in confidence the facts of the sad story, and urging me to take every means I could to search for the missing girl. At the same time he inclosed two photographs and a personal description.

Obtaining the services of an officer of long experience in such work, I visited many of the most objectionable places in London, but for some time without discovering any traces of poor Miss X.

One night we stopped at the door of a house not far from Edgeware Road, and, after a little delay, obtained admission. Engaging the hostess in conversation, the officer left me to enter the drawing-room, which was elaborately furnished. Half a dozen ladylike young women in evening dress were engaged at a game of cards at a centre table. One girl stood near the mantelpiece with her back to the door, gazing pensively into the fire.

When she turned round at the noise I made on entering I at once received the impression that I had seen her face before; but where I could not say. But in a moment it flashed upon me. It was the face depicted in the photograph of Miss X., which had been sent to me. I immediately verified this impression by examining the photograph, then in my pocket, and being satisfied that the likeness was so striking as to warrant the attempt, after a brief consultation with the officer outside the room, I returned to the drawing-room, and, walking up to the young lady referred to, I said, addressing her by her real name in a low voice, "Miss X., will you give me a few minutes' conversation?"

She started with bewilderment. "How do you know me?" she cried. I replied, "I can say nothing here; but if you show me into another apartment I will explain." I then told her that I was there by her father's authority, and had with me an officer who was determined that she should accompany me; if not, we must employ force.

At this juncture the owner of the house came in, and upon my errand being explained, became most violent. But the exhibition of the officer's authority made the matter clear; and, notwithstanding their remonstrances, in a few minutes we had the young lady in a cab, and were driving rapidly to the East End. I stopped, however, at the post-office to telegraph, late as it was, to her father the welcome message, "She is found. Come to —— hotel." Leaving her in the care of the officer and my landlady, I entered the cab again, and drove to a nursing institution, where I engaged the immediate attendance and services of a nurse—an excellent Christian woman whom I had long known, and to whom I explained the facts of the case.

When I again reached my lodgings nurse Wilson assumed immediate charge of the young lady. I surrendered the premises to their use, and went to the hotel at which I had invited the father to meet me.

Next morning, at an early hour, Mr. X., the lady's father, arrived. I told him that in my opinion his daughter was even then suffering from the consequences of continued drinking, and I was sure removal to her home now would be dangerous and useless. I added, however, that I felt there was a chance of a thorough cure if he would allow me, with the consent of a medical man to whom I referred him, to try a certain course of treatment for one month.

An interview then took place between him and his poor wandering girl. I was not present, but he came out after a conversation which lasted a quarter of an hour, and looking at me hopelessly, said, "I wish she was dead."

It appears the poor young creature had again and again said, in response to his remarks, "I must have brandy, if I die for it." He told me she was so changed he would scarcely have known her. After an interview with a Christian physician to whom we both submitted the case, Mr. X. decided to leave his daughter in town for the application of such remedies as we thought best under the circumstances. Through the gracious blessing of God, our treatment was successful, and the lady lost her craving for strong drink.

It was now right that she should again see her father, who all this while was stopping at an hotel, and had a daily bulletin from me as to the progress of his child. I was present when he entered the room, but soon retired. Quite overcome, the poor girl had fallen on her knees at her father's feet, utterly broken and contrite, beseeching his forgiveness, and begging him to take her home, and try her once more, asserting that she never would touch the dreadful drink again.

I spent that evening with them both. God had made the events of the last few days, and the wise and faithful conversation of the nurse, the means of a higher blessing to this poor girl, brought so very near to temporal and eternal ruin. Indeed, I had hopes that when next day Mr. X. returned with his daughter to their far-off country home in ——shire, he took back with him a deeply penitent and changed girl.

For several months after this Mr. X. regularly wrote to me of his daughter's welfare, and she occasionally added a line expressive of her own gratitude for the firmness with which she had been treated, and the success God had given to the means used.

Of her life in London after she first ran away from her father's house I have said nothing, feeling that little good could be attained by detailing the awful experiences she had passed through between the time when she left her home and her discovery by me.

Suffice it to say that, a year after she returned with her father to their country home, she was married to a gentleman who had known and loved her before her wanderings, and whose affection was too strong and real to be uprooted by what had occurred.

That she was happy in her married life I had no doubt. Her letters satisfied me on that score. That she was eventually cured I have also had ample proof. But that the case presents an awful warning to all who are parents not heedlessly to expose their children to the possibilities of such temptation will, I am sure, be felt by most of my readers.

Vicious tendencies or physical defects are often inherited not in a direct line. Sometimes they are missing in one or two generations and then suddenly reappear in the third or fourth. Upon inquiry I found that Miss X.'s grandfather had been a drunkard, and died of delirium tremens. He was the only one of the family who was known to have been so afflicted.

Which of us can tell but that some of our predecessors may have suffered from the ravages of that dreadful passion for drink which, although not yet manifest in us or in our own children, may be latent in them, and like a smouldering fire, only await favorable circumstances to burst out into a flame that shall consume their fairest hopes? If there is even the remotest possibility of such a contingency—and who can be certain that there is not?—it is our bounden duty to rear our children in habits of total abstinence. Only thus can we be sure of shielding our helpless offspring from the relentless demon.

When old Bishop Beveridge was about to die, and one asked him if he knew those about his bed, he said, "No." His wife bowed over his pillow and asked, "Do you know me?" "No." Another asked, "Do you know Jesus Christ?" And the venerable prelate folded his hands and said, "I have known Him for forty-four years. He is my best friend." When Jonathan Edwards was dying, after he had dismissed all his family, he gathered his limbs up in the bed, and said, "And now where is Jesus, my faithful Friend?"

"THE SWEETEST SOUND ON EARTH."

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage; preached March 16th, 1879.

"The name which is above every name."—PHILIPPIANS 2 : 9.

Names Potent for Good or Ill—I. It is an Easy Name—An Aged Father Dying—II. It is a Beautiful Name—Its Beautiful Associations—"Give my Love to Jesus"—III. It is a Mighty Name—All other Names Swallowed up in that—IV. It is an Enduring Name—It would Endure were all else Destroyed—How will you Accost Christ in Heaven?—Symbolical Names—Those for whom the Name has no Charm—A Challenge.

PAUL is here making rapturous and enthusiastic description of the name of Christ. There are merely worldly names that sometimes thrill you through and through. Such was the name of Henry Clay to a Kentuckian, the name of William Wirt to a Virginian, the name of Daniel Webster to a New Englander.

By common proverb we have come to believe that "there is nothing in a name;" and so parents sometimes at the baptismal altar give titles to their children, reckless of the fact that that title, that name, will be a lifetime hindrance or a liftetime help. You have no right to give to your child a name lacking either in euphony or moral meaning. It is a sin to call a child Jehoiakim, or Tiglath-pilesar—by any thing that is disagreeable. Because you have had an exasperating name yourself is no reason why you should inflict it upon your progeny. And yet how often it is that we see a name full of jargon rattling down from generation to generation, simply because a long while ago some one happened to be afflicted with it.

Institutions and great enterprises sometimes without sufficient deliberation take nomenclature. Mighty destinies have been decided by a name. While we may, by a long course of Christian behavior, get over the misfortune of having been baptized with the name of a despot or a cheat, how much better it would have been if we could have all started life without any such incumbrance!

When Paul, in my text and in other passages of Scripture, bursts forth in ascriptions of admiration for the name of Christ, I want to inquire what are the characteristics of that appellation, "The name which is above every name." Oh! that I might be filled with the presence of Jesus while I speak, for you and I have found out long ago that we cannot speak on these great themes of religion unless we have in our own heart felt the truth of them!

I. In the first place, speaking to you in regard to the name of Christ, I want to tell you

IT IS AN EASY NAME.

You are sometimes introduced to people with long and unpronounceable names, and you have to listen cautiously to get the names, and you have to hear them pronounced two or three times before you risk trying to utter them; but within the first two years the little child folds its hands and looks upward, and says "Jesus." Can it be that in all this church this morning there are representatives of any household where the children are familiar with the names of father and mother and brother and sister, yet know nothing about "that name which is above every name"?

Sometimes you forget the name of a quite familiar friend, and you have to think and think before you get it; but can you imagine any freak of intellect by which you should forget the name of Jesus? That word seems to fit the tongue in every dialect. Down to old age, when the voice is tremulous, and uncertain, and indistinct, even then this regal word finds potent utterance.

When an aged father was dying, one of the children came and said, "Father, do you know me?" and in the delirium of the last sickness he said, "No, I don't know you." Another child came and said, "Father, do you know me?" "No," he said, "I don't know you." Then the village pastor came in and said, "Do you know me?" He said "No, I don't think I ever saw you." Then said the minister, "Do you know Jesus?" "Oh yes!" said the dying man, "I know Jesus; chief among ten thousand is He, and the One altogether lovely." Yes, for all ages and for all languages, and for all conditions it is an easy name.

"Jesus, I love Thy charming name,
'Tis music to my ear:
Fain would I sound it out so loud
That Heaven and Earth might hear."

II. But I remark further in regard to this name of Christ, that it is

A BEAUTIFUL NAME.

Now you have noticed that you cannot disassociate a name from the character of the person who has it. There are some names, for instance, that are repulsive to my ear. Those names are attractive to your ear. What is the difference? Why, I happened to know some persons of that name who were cross, or sour, or queer, or unsympathetic, and the persons you have happened to know of that name were kind and genial. Since, then, we cannot disassociate a name from the character of the person who has the name, that consideration makes the name of Jesus unspeakably beautiful.

I cannot pronounce that name in your presence, but you think of Bethlehem and Gethsemane and Golgotha, and you see His loving face and you hear His tender voice, and you feel His gentle touch. As soon as I pronounce His name in your presence you think of Him who banqueted with heavenly hierarchs, yet came down and breakfasted on the fish which the rough men hauled out of Genesaret; you think of Him who, though the clouds are the dust of His feet, walked footsore on the road to Emmaus. But I cannot speak His name in your hearing this morning, but you think right away of the shining One who restored the centurion's daughter, and who helped the blind man to sunlight, and who made the cripple's crutch useless, and who looked down into the laughing eyes of the babe until it struggled to go to Him; then, flinging His arms around it, and impressing a kiss upon its beautiful brow, said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Oh beautiful name, beautiful name, the name of Jesus, which stands for love, for patience, for self-sacrifice, for magnanimity, for every thing that is good and glorious and tender and sympathetic and kind! It is aromatic with all odors. It is accordant with all harmonies. Sometimes, when I look at that name of Jesus Christ, it seems as if the letters were made out of tears, and then they seem to be gleaming crowns. Sometimes that name seems to be twisted out of the straw on which He lay, and then it seems to be built out of the thrones on which His people are to reign. Sometimes I sound that word Jesus, and I hear in it the sob of Gethsemane and the groan of Calvary, and then I speak His name and it is all a-ripple with gladness and a-ring with hosanna. Glorious name.

Take all the glories of bookbindery and put them around the page on which that name is printed. On Christmas morning wreath it on the wall. Let it drip from harp's string and let it thunder out in organ's diapason. Sound it often, sound it well, until every star shall seem to shine it, and every flower shall seem to breathe it, and mountain and sea, and day and night, and earth and heaven acclaim in full chant, "Blessed be His glorious name forever." "The name which is above every name."

Have you ever heard in a Methodist church, during a time of revival, a score of souls come to the altar and cry out for mercy under the power of just two lines of glorious old John Wesley?

"Jesus, the name high over all,
In heaven, or earth, or sky."

To the repenting soul, to the exhausted invalid, to the Sunday-school girl, to the snow-white octogenarian, it is beautiful.

The aged man comes in from a long walk, and he tremulously opens the door of his home, and he hangs his hat on the old nail, and he puts his cane in the usual place, and he lies on his couch, and he says to his children and his grandchildren: "My dears, I am going away from you." And they say: "Why, where are you going, grandfather?" "Oh!" he says, "I am going to Jesus;" and so the old man faints away into heaven.

And the little child comes in from play, and she flings herself in your lap, and she says, "Mamma, I'm so sick, I'm so very sick;" and you put her to bed, and the fever is worse and worse, and some midnight, while you are shaking up the pillow and giving the medicine, she looks up in your face and says, "Mamma, I'm going away from you." You say, "Why, where are you going, my darling?" And she says, "I am going to Jesus." And the red cheek that you take to be the mark of the fever turns out to be only the carnation bloom of heaven.

A MESSAGE TO JESUS.

Oh! was it not beautiful when a little child heard that her playmate was dying, and she went to the house, and she clambered up on the bed of her dying playmate, and she said to the dying playmate, "Where are you going to?" and the dying girl said, "I'm going to Jesus"? Then said the little girl that was well, as she bent over to give the parting kiss to her dying playmate, "Well, then, if you are going to Jesus, give my love to Him."

Oh! it is a beautiful, beautiful name, whether on the lips of childhood or on the lips of the old man. When my father was dying the village minister said to him, quoting over his pillow this passage: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners;" and there he stopped. Then my father finished the quotation by saying, "of whom I am chief."

III. But I remark again, in regard to this name of Christ, that it is

A MIGHTY NAME.

Rothschild is a name mighty in the commercial world, Silliman is a name mighty in the scientific world, Irving is a name mighty in the literary world, Washington is a name mighty in the political world, Wellington is a name mighty in the military world; but where in all the earth is a name so potent to lift, and thrill, and arouse, and rally, and bless, as the name Jesus? Why, the sound of that one name unhorsed Saul, and threw Newton on his face on ship's deck; and that one name to-day, while I speak, holds a hundred million souls under omnipotent spell That name in England to-day means more than Victoria. In Germany that name to-day means more than King William. In Italy that name to-day means more than Garibaldi or Victor Emmanuel. O mighty name!

I have seen a man bound hand and foot of th devil and captive of all evil habits, at the soun of that name dash down his shackles and marc out forever free. I have seen a man overcome misfortune and trial, every kind of trouble ha he; but at the sound of that name the sea dro ped and the clouds parted, and the sunburst eternal gladness poured upon his soul. I hav seen a man hardened in infidelity, defiant of Go full of jeer and scoff, jocose of the judgment-da reckess of eternity, at the sound of that nan blanch, and cower, and groan, and kneel, a weep, and repent, and pray, and believe, and joice, and triumph.

Oh! it is a mighty name, a mighty nan Under its power the last temple of superstiti will come down, and the last Juggernaut of iquity will be shattered to pieces. The red ho of carnage, spoken of in apocalyptic vision, a the black horse of death must come back on th haunches, while the white horse of victory g forth, mounted of Him who hath the moon der His feet, and the stars of Heaven for tiara. Mighty name! It will first make whole earth tremble, and then it will make the nations sing. Mighty name!

Other dominions seem to be giving w France had to give up some of her favorite p frowns upon Russia with all the hard and tried faces and forms of British valor, and the stern power and unlimited resources of England are "couching down as a lion"—the British lion—awaiting the next attack. This does not brighten the outlook.

Russia will remain unchanged and undeterred. The sacred traditions and legacies of her land urge her on to "hasten the downfall of Persia," to "push on to the Persian Gulf," "establish the ancient commercial intercourse with the Levant through Syria," and "force her way into the Indies," which she holds to be the "storehouses of the world." She holds herself destined to "fertilize worn-out Europe," to "advance over every obstacle and progress towards Constantinople," and when intrigue and violence shall strike Turkey to pieces the strong position of Austria at Novi Bazar will not scare her from rushing with all her strength upon the Bosphorus.

There is no rest—no abiding peace yet. All is unrest and uncertainty in human affairs. But the sure drift and tendency of the policies and schemes of the world is to one disastrous issue.

The "unclean spirits" out in the world are the inspiration of it all. The description is graphic enough, and stirring enough, and appalling enough, surely. "And I saw," says John, "three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty" (Rev. 16 : 13, 14).

Fresh from hell there are seen three unclean spirits under the full sway of dark and fiendish designs against the peace of the world.

They traverse its cities and fields with this fell purpose as the supreme and ruling passion and desire of their being—and with steady and unwearied determination plod on through nations, and peoples, and tongues—mingling with kings and armies and races, mustering from every clime and realm forces arrayed in all manner of costume, bearing all sorts of standards, and also equipped with every form and shape of arms and weapons of warfare—in a word, gathering the armies of the world to the "battle of that great day" of the Lord. Alas! what treaties may be strong enough to check these subtle, malignant, and daring disturbers of the world's peace! What barrier may stand in the way of these moving masses of peoples, kings, and nations, raging in high passion against the Lord of Hosts as they rush madly on to their own certain and inevitable destruction on the last battle-field of Armageddon!

The mists and the fogs shall clear away before the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. The "Lord shall be King over all the earth," and the peace which angels sang shall return and find a lasting home in the hearts of people and nations and tongues, and shall settle with abiding sweetness and repose upon every land. The Eastern Question will be settled.

The Great Fountain.—An aged gentleman at a watering place said to a lady, a stranger to him, as she came up to take her usual draught of water, "Have you ever drank at the Great Fountain?" The lady colored, and turned away without replying. The following winter, in another place, he was asked to visit a lady who was dying. As he entered her room, she said, with a smile, "Do you not know me? Do you not recollect asking a woman at the spring last year, 'Have you ever drank at the Great Fountain?'" "Yes," said he, "I do remember." "Well, sir, I am that person. I thought at that time you were very rude; but your words kept ringing in my ears. I was without peace or rest till I found Christ. I now expect shortly to die, and you, under God, have been the means of my salvation. Be as faithful to others as you have been to me. Never be afraid to talk to strangers on the subject of religion."

MR. SPURGEON'S PASTORS' COLLEGE.

Writing of this valuable and powerful agency, Mr. Spurgeon says: "When it was commenced, in 1856, I had not even a remote idea of whereunto it would grow. There were springing up around me, as my own spiritual children, many earnest young men, who felt an irresistible impulse to preach the Gospel, and yet, with half an eye, it could be seen that their want of education would be a real hindrance to them. It was not in my heart to bid them cease their preaching, and, had I done so, they would, in all probability, have ignored my recommendation. As it seemed that preach they would, though their attainments were very slender, no other course was open to me but to give them an opportunity to educate themselves for the work."

"An admirable tutor was found, who has in every case secured not merely the respect, but the filial love of every student. Into this beloved minister's house the first students were introduced, and for a considerable period they were domiciled as members of his family.

"The students were mostly poor, and most of the colleges involved necessarily a considerable outlay to a young man; for even where the education was free, books, clothes, and other incidental expenses required a considerable sum per annum. Moreover, it must be frankly admitted that my views of the Gospel and of the mode of training preachers were and are somewhat peculiar. It seemed to me that preachers of the grand old truths of the Gospel, ministers suitable for the masses, were more likely to be found in an institution where preaching and divinity would be the main objects, and not degrees and other insignia of human learning. I felt that, without interfering with the laudable objects of other colleges, I could do good in my own way.

"The college thus commenced grew and increased. The success that attended the work encouraged all connected with it, and the question of providing funds was the only one causing serious anxiety. For a long time Mr. Spurgeon defrayed nearly all the expenses from his own resources, at an annual cost of from $3000 to $4000; but as this could not continue, the pastor told his difficulties to his people, and the result was a regular weekly offering for the college was established. But the supplies from this source were insufficient, and more money was sorely needed.

"On one occasion the college fund was reduced to $5, and earnest prayer for help in the sore strait was offered. Next morning a letter came from a banker in the city, informing me that a lady, whose name I have never been able to discover, had deposited a sum of $1000, to be used for the education of young men for the ministry. How did my heart leap for joy! I threw myself then and henceforth upon the bounteous care of the Lord, whom I desired with my whole heart to glorify by this effort. The college grew every month, and the number of students rapidly advanced from one to forty. Friends known and unknown, from far and near, were moved to give little or much to my work, and so the funds increased as the need enlarged. Since that hour the weekly offering has been a steady source of income.

"There have been during this period times of great trial of my faith; but after a season of straitness, never amounting to absolute want, the Lord has always interposed and sent me large sums (on one occasion $5000) from unknown donors.

"From the year 1856 to 1861, the students continued to assemble in the house of Mr. Rogers, which served for a college. Increasing in number, early in 1861, by which time seven or eight of the young men had become pastors of churches, the students were wont to raise up the cry of the sons of the prophets of old, 'Behold! the place where we dwell with thee is too strait for us.' In March, 1861, the congregation of New Park Street made its exodus to the new Tabernacle, and the students commenced work in the well-appointed class-rooms under the Tabernacle. In their new location their numbers increased, and fresh plans of usefulness were devised and carried out. In 1863 there were under daily instruction for the work of the Christian ministry sixty-six young men.

"The necessity for new college buildings was plainly indicated, and a friend, in May, 1873, sent $5000 towards that object. On October 14th, 1873, the foundation-stone of those buildings was laid, and other contributions flowed in until the present building was completed; thus has God answered prayer, and rewarded the faith of His servant in the important work."

GOD'S SPARROWS.

A Christian woman was visiting among the poor in London one cold winter's day. She was trying to open the door of a third story in a wretched-looking house, when she heard a little voice inside say, "Pull the string up high." She looked up and saw a string. She pulled it, when it lifted the latch, and the door opened into a room where she found two little half-naked children all alone. They looked cold and hungry.

"Do you take care of yourselves, little ones?" said the woman.—"No, ma'am; God takes care of us," replied the elder of the children.

"You have no fire on this cold day. Are you not very cold?"—"Oh! when we are very cold we creep under the quilt, and I put my arms round Tommy, and he puts his arms round me, and then we say, 'Now I lay me down to sleep; I'll sing my Maker's praise'—and then we get warm," said the little girl.

"And what do you have to eat, pray?" asked the visitor.—"When granny comes home she brings us something. Granny says we are God's sparrows, and He has enough for us; and so we say, 'Our Father' and 'daily bread' every day. God is our Father."

Tears came into the eyes of this good woman. She had sometimes felt afraid that she might be left to starve; but these little "sparrows," perched alone in that cold upper room, taught her a sweet lesson of trust in the power of God which she felt that she could not forget.

Entering Halt into Life.—"It is better for thee," says our Lord, "to enter into life halt or maimed, than, having two hands or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire." This is sometimes verified in the literal sense. We are told of Professor George Wilson, of Edinburgh, that he began his career full of ambition to scale the heights of science and master all knowledge. In the midst of his triumph he was laid low with an illness, which ended in the amputation of his foot and the crushing of his health. In that deep valley of pain and humiliation he found God. And he asked a friend to preach his funeral sermon from the above solemn words.

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

The Rajah's Dream.

CLARA had a talent for poetry, and naturally chose for the usual theme of her verse the most sublime and glorious of subjects, and that which the circumstances of her education and position most constantly presented to her mind. She knew that her sweet hymns were read with delight by her mother, copied out in her handwriting, treasured in her memory, looked upon by the pious lady as evidences that her dearest hopes had been realized in her daughter. Clara's poetry was regarded as the exposition of her mind. Alas! her writings were far more holy than their authoress! Thus a false opinion was formed of her character, aided in no small degree by the singular sweetness of a face upon which no rude passion had ever traced a line.

When the course of duty is down the current of inclination, the leafy branch floats smoothly along the stream. But that motion is not life; that progress is owing to no inherent power in the bough. The least impediment is sufficient to stop it—the smallest eddy to turn it aside!

"I have made such a discovery!" exclaimed Ada, with a look of triumph, as she entered the drawing-room one morning. "Ah, Clara! demure, sensible, philosophical Clara—you who listen to Alison with such profound attention, and whose brain is a silent library of solid and intellectual literature, I have found you out at last!"

"What do you mean?" asked Clara gayly, while gentle Mrs. Arnot looked up with an expression of inquiry.

"You don't read novels! Oh no; you are too wise! But who keeps Eastern tales in her boudoir, quietly hidden behind a vase of innocent flowers, to feast upon when nobody sees her?" And Ada displayed a book, in singular binding, which she had carried off from the room of her cousin.

"Oh, I have not had time to read it yet! It is a book which Mr. Ward lent me."

"Mr. Ward! Now, that is too good! Who would have dreamed of Mr. Ward's patronizing a new edition of the Arabian Nights?"

"My dear," said Mrs. Arnot, "I have no doubt that any book lent by our excellent clergyman will be very improving."

"Oh, I'm so glad that you think so," replied Ada, nothing abashed at her discomfiture, "for this looks amusing besides! I propose that for one day—you know that this is my last day at Laurel Bank—we substitute it for Alison."

"As you please," said Mrs. Arnot, taking the quaint volume from the hand of her niece, and turning over some of the pages. "This appears to be a kind of Eastern fable."

"Then I'll have the story, and Clara shall have the moral, and we'll both be suited exactly."

In a few minutes the young ladies were seated, Ada at her embroidery, Clara at her drawing, when Mrs. Arnot, who was usually the reader, commenced the following tale:

Mighty was the Rajah Futtey Sing, and great were the deeds which he had done. His granaries overflowed with corn, and his coffers with gold; the hungry were fed by his beneficence, and the needy supplied by his wealth. He was like a magnificent banyan-tree, whose branches having stooped to the earth, there take root, and extending on all sides, the tree becomes as a forest. Beneath it the beasts of the field take shelter; the bright-winged birds roost on its boughs; the sunshine rests brightly upon it; it stands glorious and beautiful to the eye of man.

The Rajah lay reclined on cushions in his lordly dwelling. The calm of evening was over earth; the red orb of the sun had almost touched the horizon; he seemed glancing, ere he departed, on the world which his beams had clothed with brightness and beauty; and a calm was upon the soul of the Rajah—a joy was within his heart. He said to himself, where he lay: "I have been a blessing in my generation; I have gone on my course like the sun, and the world has been the brighter for my smile. I have benefited man, and I have glorified the Supreme. I have fasted long and I have prayed much; I have wasted my flesh by abstinence, and spent the long night in devotion. And now, am I not holy? May I not stand upright before my Creator? Are not my hands stainless? Is not my heart clean? Who can lay any thing to my charge?"

A Brahmin in his white robes now entered, and bent reverently before the Rajah.

"Friend of the needy!" said he, "thy will hath been obeyed! In nine different parts of thy spacious domains, nine wells, dug deep into the heart of the earth, now offer their waters to the pilgrim, plenteous as thy liberality, clear as thy nature."

"It is well!" cried the Rajah. "Let their number be trebled! Let the travellers from the north, from the east, from the west, bless the name of Rajah Futtey Sing."

Another Brahmin approached, and made obeisance.

"Hope of the friendless!" said he, "behold, at thy command three hundred indignet and sick, the leper and the blind, wait at thy gate for the accustomed alms bestowed by thy princely bounty!"

"It is well!" cried the Rajah. "Let their numbers be thrice three hundred! Let no poor man stand hungry at my gate. To supply the wants of the needy shall my fields grow yellow with golden maize, and the rice-plant lift its head above the spreading waters; and let those who come to me in rags retire in fair white garments such as are worn by my servants!"

A third Brahmin entered, and bowed his head before the Rajah.

"Mirror of piety!" said he, "the foundation of the great temple has been laid which thou wilt raise to the honor of the Deity. Stones are being hewn in the distant quarry; yellow brass is brought from afar; an edifice is rising from the earth which will be lofty as thy devotion, firm as thy power!"

"Leave the stones in the quarry and hew me white marble!" cried the Rajah; "lay aside the brass, and supply its place with beaten gold. No mean sacrifice will I offer to the Creator; He shall look upon my gifts and be satisfied, and future generations shall witness the vastness of my liberality and of my devotion!"

And all who heard exclaimed, "Praise to the Rajah! Praise to the pious and the holy! High is his place in this life; higher shall be his place in the next! His offerings shall be accepted on high; his prayers and his fasting shall bring great reward! Wisdom is on his lips and virtue in his heart. He stands faultless before God and man!"

The red sun had sunk beneath the plain, and darkness spread her sable wings over earth. There was silence where the axe and hammer had rung, in the spot where the temple was rising; the poor had departed satisfied from the gate, and no pilgrim bending to drink of the wells dug by Futtey Sing disturbed the image of the quiet stars that were reflected in their motionless depths.

Sleep came to the Rajah with the night; and as his eye closed to the world around, the eye of his mind opened to the world of dreams.

Behold! he dreamed that his temple was completed, and that it was fairer to look upon than ever before was temple erected by man. Its marble dome and cupolas were white as snow from the summit of the Himalaya mountains. It was incrusted with precious jewels in every form which could charm the eye. There the diamond glittered like a petrified dew-drop; there shone the ruby, and the sapphire blue as the Nerbuddah river; and wreaths of pearls of magnificent size twined round the lofty pillars of gold!

In this temple stood the Rajah in his dream; and his heart was lifted up with pride. He looked above, around, below him, and all was beautiful and glorious. "Am I not holy?" he repeated to himself. "Shall I not rejoice in my works?"

He wondered in his dream to behold a bright ray, more intense than any which the sun ever shed, stream down from an opening in the dome; and down this ray, as down a path of glory, descended a being who would have been too bright to be looked upon, had her form not been shrouded in a wide veil, which encircled her like a silver cloud. The Rajah trembled as the unearthly visitant descended to his side.

"Who art thou," he cried, "that comest as from above? and wherefore do I behold thee?"

"I am Truth," replied a sweet but solemn voice from the veil, for the face of the bright one was not seen. "It is my office to open the eyes of the blind, to draw aside the curtain of delusion, to dispel the mirage upon the desert, to waken mortals from the dreams of their fancy. Hast thou! O Futtey Sing! courage to follow me—courage to explore, with me for thy guide, this Temple of the Human Heart?—for what we now survey is thine own."

The Rajah paused in his dream; a strange feeling of awe was on his soul.

"Dost thou fear," pursued Truth, "to know thyself?"

"I fear not," replied the Rajah. "He who knows not himself knows nothing. I shrink not even from thy searching eye! I have fasted long, I have prayed much, I have freely given to the poor; my hands are stainless, my heart is clean; I am holy in the sight of all men!"

"But in the sight of God what art thou?" exclaimed Truth. "Ye see not the motes in the air, though numerous as the leaves of the forest, till the glowing ray reveal them to the eye. The river seems to flow stainless and clear, but there are, concealed from the view, a hundred loathsome reptiles inclosed in every drop that glitters beneath the sun! But if thou fearest not to know that which it most concerns thee to know, follow me, and thine eyes shall be opened!"

She led him to the lofty entrance of the temple, from whence they could gaze into the fair garden which surrounded it.

"We will not now speak of thy sins," said Truth; "perhaps thou deemest that thou art defiled by none. But show me first, O Rajah! thy virtues, that, if they merit the favor of the Deity, I may join my praises to those of all men."

Then the heart of Futtey Sing revived, for the topic of his virtues was ever sweet to him; and even if his life could be proved to be not quite free from sins, his merits, he felt assured, would far outweigh them.

So in his dream he beheld before him three fair and lofty trees, bending beneath the weight of the fruit which loaded their branches. The eye of the Rajah brightened as he gazed on them, and, turning to Truth, he exclaimed: "Lo! these are the trees of love to God and love to man, and thou knowest that they are mine! Behold how they are loaded with fruit, so that the boughs bend down to the earth! There is the first, that bears deeds of beneficence, rosy as the clouds at sunrise. The second bears deeds of justice, in ripe clusters of shining gold. The third bears deeds of self-denial, resting like snow-flakes on the dark leaves." And as he spake, again he seemed to hear the voices of men blending in loud chorus together,—"Praise to the Rajah! praise to the holy and pious! High as is his place in this life, higher shall be his place in the next. Wisdom is on his lips, and virtue in his heart; he stands faultless before God and man!"

"When I passed by the trees of love to God and love to man"—such was the reply of Truth—"I looked, and beheld they were barren: they bare neither blossom nor fruit. Whence, then, are these clusters, red, yellow, and white? Are they indeed fruits which grow on the trees, or have they been placed there to charm and to deceive? Has the sap of life swelled them, the sweet juices filled? Approach, O Rajah! the tree upon which hang the rosy clusters; for methinks it is the love of praise that has placed on it seeming deeds of beneficence!"

She approached it without motion of foot or of wing, gliding towards it like a cloud impelled by the festoons which I imagined to be special decorations were huge cobwebs heavy with dust; the vegetation, too, I saw was all blanched, and much of it a noxious growth, while the life which I had somewhat boasted of I was ashamed to look upon or even to think of. That candle shining in the cellar of my soul had wrought a melancholy change in my thoughts of myself, and foolishly I resolved never to permit so bright a light to enter there again, as if to hide the evil was to remove it. But things could not remain as they were, for on a day there came another who did me a worse, yet better turn, for he descended into my cellar and removed certain shutters which had long excluded the light of day.

When next I entered the vault I was ready to swoon for very fright, for a dunghill was sweetness to it: it was the concentration of abominations. There were all manner of creeping things, loathsome and polluting; I was ready to die at the sight. Truth to tell, I did not even then see it all, for the window was still so much covered over with thick cobwebs and filth that the whole of the light did not enter; yea, I fear I have not even yet seen all the pollution of my nature, but I thank God I have seen enough to make me cry to Him who is able to cleanse. Hercules turned a river into the Augean stable and purified it, and my Lord Jesus has with His own blood purged my nature: but this I know, I am nothing, and less than nothing, in my natural estate.

I have but given you a parable of what the apostle saw in himself when the law came with its condemning power into his soul. During those three days in which the scales were on his eyes and he was blind, not seeing the sun for a season, he turned all his sight within, and saw himself. Then great Saul dwarfed into little Paul, and the learned rabbi shrivelled into a poor brother who was glad to receive humble Ananias, and to learn from him what he was yet to do. He who hectored over the church of God now meekly arose and was baptized, calling upon the name of the Lord. Three days of glorious light, so bright that it made him blind, had corrected his estimate of himself; and it was in memory of that lesson and of all that he had learned subsequently that he said, "Though I be nothing."

3. The force of that estimate had increased by a growing belief in the doctrine of grace. If you wish to find the free will of man very much extolled, you must not read in the epistles of Paul. If any of you desire to write an essay upon the dignity of human nature, or to preach a sermon upon the glory which still remains in man despite his fallen state—the recuperative power of human nature despite its disease—you will gain little help from our apostle.

I could refer you to certain modern divines for a good deal of stuff of that kind, but the apostle of the Gentiles does not deal in that material. His indictment against humanity in the first chapter of Romans is as terrible as it is true. "Dead in trespasses and sins" is his description of man's condition; sovereign grace is his only remedy. He tells us of being born again, and of being new created by the work of God; and of justification by faith through grace by the righteousness of Jesus Christ, but he has not a word to say of human power or merit. If ever a man could say, "Grace! grace!" and did say it, and kept on saying it, most distinctly it was the Apostle Paul. In proportion as he learned the fulness, freeness, richness, and sovereignty of divine grace did he see, side by side with it, the nakedness, the filthiness, the nothingness of man, and so he who could best glory in the grace of God thought less and less of himself, and said, "Though I be nothing."

4. In addition to this, his own internal experience had very much helped him to feel that he was nothing, for he had experienced great spiritual struggles. "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" was not once nor twice his cry, but he often felt the law of his old nature struggling against the law of his mind, and he lived in lifelong conflict with the evil which he saw within himself, therefore feeling daily that salvation must be of grace alone, and that he himself was nothing, and less than nothing.

5. He meant, next, that he was nothing to boast of; that albeit he had been a night and a day in the deep, and had been stoned, and had been beaten with rods, and had been a faithful sufferer for Christ, albeit that he had preached the Gospel in the regions beyond, not building upon another man's foundation; yet in all these he saw nothing whatever of which he could boast, but he was still nothing. I remember well who supposed herself to possess very remarkable attainments. Now, this superior person was talking of the marvellous things which she had felt, known, and done. She was, if not quite perfect, in remarkable danger of becoming so. She turned to an aged Christian in the company, and said, "But you, dear brother, do not say a word." Now, you know there are individuals who say little who think all the more, and our old friend was one of them, and still remained silent. "Come," said she, "have you no religious experience?" The old man said very quietly, "I never had any to boast about." That remark I heartily indorsed.

If we attain to the highest experience and rise very near to God and conquer open sin we shall still have to look within and say "I am nothing." Boasting is a sure sign of failure wherever it is found; even a giant like Goliath had hardly done boasting before he fell beneath the sling and stone of a ruddy youth. Restrain every feeling of pride; nay, chase it from your soul, for it is foolish, and will lead to further folly; it is a noxious insect, which will corrupt whatever it lights upon, gaudy though its wings may be.

6. The apostle meant, next, that he was nothing to trust in. "Though I be nothing." We begin our Christian life by trusting in Christ alone, and we shall continue so to trust as to His merit, but we are very apt to get wrong in other matters. We begin with a sense of being very weak and foolish, and we look to Jesus only for strength and guidance, but after awhile we think ourselves growing into deeply experienced and well-instructed Christians, and the temptation is to lean somewhat to our understanding and stability. All this cometh of evil, and will lead to further evil.

I recollect well a person asking a brother of my acquaintance to lend him a certain sum of money. This my friend was willing to do, but the man added, "You know you can trust me. I have been a Christian now five-and-thirty years, and I am past temptation." My friend, like a wise man, buttoned his pocket very quietly, and said he must decline to make him a loan. He had intended to do so till that vainglorious speech was made. That boaster failed the next day, and was discovered to have been an arrant rogue.

Whenever a man says, "I am past temptation," he reveals the pride of his heart; and whenever any of us even dream of such a thing about ourselves, we have need to tremble for fear that some terrible fall is near. Yet that thought does come across us, though we do not utter it; we half think in our hearts that those inexperienced young men may go wrong, but that we who are middle-aged men are not so likely to be overthrown. Yet grievous sins in churches are as common among the more advanced as among the young. Most, if not all, the great falls recorded in the Bible happened to middle-aged and old people; think of the drunkenness of Noah and of Lot, and the sin of Reuben and Judah and David and Peter, and you will see that these were not hot-headed boys, but experienced men, who should have acted better.

I shall yet speak of

and may we all be made by divine grace to say, "Though I be nothing." I will tell you why I wish that we may come to this. It is because it will be exceedingly beneficial to us, if with deep sincerity we feel that we are nothing. It will prevent pride, and that which will prevent pride is worth a Jew's eye. It will prevent our being mortified, as we sometimes are, because notice is not taken of us when we have done something that we thought was greatly praiseworthy.

This humility will also prevent severe censures of others. We are all very handy at picking holes in our brethren's coats; but when we are nothing we shall draw back our hand and say, "It does not become a nothing and a nobody to be finding fault with other people." I sometimes wish that those who criticise ministers would think of this. I do not believe that a public person can nowadays say five plain words which some critic or other will not misunderstand or misrepresent. I wish they would try to speak or write themselves, and see whether others could not pull them to pieces quite as readily. You will be greatly helped in avoiding censoriousness if you have a lowly view of yourself, so as to say, "Though I be nothing."

This will also help you to avoid all self-seeking. Why should you seek your own if you be nothing? There is no good in seeking for great things for a nothing. If you be nothing, you will keep your motives clear; you will seek the glory of God, and not your own glory. If you be nothing, self-denial will become very easy to you.

He who knows himself to be nothing, is also full of gratitude. If you catch him alone you will find the tears in his eyes, and if you question him he will tell you that he was weeping to think that God should ever have loved him, for he is such a nobody.

Now I finish with this one thought. When the apostle says, "Though I be nothing," that word shows that there was a fact in the background. He had been telling us that he was once caught up into the third heaven, and had enjoyed a special revelation of Christ. Yes, beloved fellow-believer, we have had our banqueting days when the banner over us was love; we have been very near the Beloved, and we have been made to drink the spiced wine of His pomegranate, and He has manifested Himself to us as He does not unto the world. All this you know, and I also know it, "though I be nothing."

We can also believingly say: "Though I be nothing," yet the Spirit of God dwells in me. "Though I be nothing," the Spirit of God uses me. I want you not to forget the background of mercy which sets out this poor nothing, and make it look all the less, albeit that it makes it all the sweeter for it to be so little.

Oh yes, and there is a heaven for me, and there is eternal life for me, and there are the three persons of the divine Trinity sworn to save me; and heaven and earth may pass away, but I shall never perish, neither shall any pluck me out of Jesus' hand, "though I be nothing." His angels are commissioned to keep me, and He Himself in covenant has given His oath and promise to preserve me, "though I be nothing."

O soul! you must be nothing, if God is to save you. You must come down from your high horse; you must give up your trust in works and ceremonies and natural goodness, and be nothing; and when you are nothing, then will Jesus Christ be all in all to you. He is a full Christ for empty sinners. He gives life to dead sinners, healing to sick sinners, and clothing to naked sinners; but if you be full and rich and lively in yourselves, you may go your way, He will have nought to do with you. If you are nothing, clean emptied out and stripped and done for, ground to powder, crushed, and rendered helpless, you are of those for whom Jesus shed His precious blood. Come, trust in Him, and find eternal life.

PROPHETICAL ASPECT OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.

By Rev. E. Wilkes.

A Final Settlement Certain—The Berlin Settlement is not Final, because it neglects Palestine—The Jewish Question the Key of the Eastern Question—Palestine to be Severed from Turkey—The Jews must be Independent, and under a Protectorate—Jerusalem a Burden—Coming Trouble—Light after Darkness—Russia's predestined Course—The Unclean Spirits now at Work—They produce War and Change—The Issue Fixed—Final Peace.

THE apparently incurable corruption of Turkey, her misgovernment of the subject populations under her rule, her bankrupt exchequer, and the general incapacity to govern wisely, she has displayed for many years, indicate that even if she do not fall by the assaults of her enemies, she will sink in process of time from internal decay.

For a long time Turkey has been known to European politicians as "the sick man," and but little commiseration has been bestowed on the sufferer. True, Turkey has had no cause to complain of a lack of interest or attention. Wars have been waged on her account. Congresses of illustrious men have debated over her condition, and she has been the source of anxious thought to every statesman of Europe. But this solicitude has not been excited by affection, nor admiration, nor even sympathy with Turkey; it is simply the product of jealousy and cupidity. The place and power in the hands of the decaying nation constitute a treasure for which more than one of the bystanding nations crave, and it is the consciousness that whoever seizes that treasure will have to fight for its possession with other disappointed claimants, which has so long kept vultures off the prey. But the sick man will inevitably die and the heir be proclaimed. Who shall be that heir? That is the question which perplexes the statesmen of Europe, that is the problem so many have tried to solve, that forms the knotty subject, the bugbear of cabinets and councils, the question generally known as "the Eastern Question."

In dealing with it in the light which prophecy casts upon it, we remark: There is to be a final settlement of the great "Eastern Question" which shall result in "abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth" (Psalm 72:7). But that predicted long-continued peace will not be brought about by the arrangements of the recent Berlin Congress. The "finality" of this vexed and anxious problem is not yet reached.

Yet there soon shall be "peace on earth" for one thousand years. Not a mere temporary, patched-up, delusive peace of fallible man's contrivance, but God's own peace, lovely and lasting, that shall smooth all the troubled and tossing surf of a weary world, soothe all its fevered inquietudes into sweet repose, and bathe its sad and tearful face in the beautiful sunshine which shall stream from the presence of Jesus when He "shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

But in order to this the Jewish Question—which is essentially the great "Eastern Question"—must come to the front as one great step towards that happy age when "nation shall not rise up against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isaiah 2:4). Indeed, any elaborate schemes which avoid those considerations which touch the solution of the position of the Jew and his fatherland are no more than the "baseless fabric of a vision," because that is really the Question upon which the condition and fate of the whole earth revolves, whether for happiness or misery—for peace or for war.

The Treaty of Berlin has achieved independence for some vassal principalities, and autonomy or partial independence, together with amelioration and other advantages, for other suffering and oppressed peoples and provinces. But Palestine is yet left out in the cold, to be still "trodden under foot of the Gentiles;" therefore, we repeat, there is no "finality" in any of these settlements, and therefore, again, the peace which it guarantees is a very transitory and most untrustworthy thing—a mere "breathing-time" before the impending storm.

In Rev. 16:12 "the sixth angel pours out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." Thus it is clearly manifest that, whether from some private and pacific arrangement, resulting from the position and influence accorded to England under the "Convention of Constantinople," or as a violent disruption from some impending and fierce shock of war, Palestine must be separated from Turkey, the "way for the kings from the sun rising" must be "prepared."

But Turkey must do more than this. The Jews must be recognized as a distinct people in the Holy Land, either wholly or partially independent of other nations. With the privilege of exercising authority among themselves, with liberty of self-government, and with the power to elect their own "governors" from among their own people. That this will happen we learn from prophecy, for it is graphically depicted by the prophet Zechariah in the twelfth chapter of his prophecy, in which the partially restored Jews are found at the dreadful time of "Jacob's trouble," when the Lord will "smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness.

Even the faintest symptoms of Palestine's emerging from obscurity may therefore seem to intensify expectation, and cheer the "pilgrim of the night" by some flickering tokens that that "day is at hand" when "of the increase of Christ's government and peace there shall be no end" (Is. 9:7). Indeed, events seem to move with interesting precision and accuracy on the line of the prophetical current towards this land.

So many lines of truth converge and brighten as they gather in glorious clusters around the spots endeared by associations and memories—memories that are thrown back upon a past full of guilt and tears and sadness, but starting now into a future so brilliant and beautiful that "eye hath not seen nor ear heard" of all the glories and blessed repose of that age, "so bright and so fair," that is to be erelong.

We doubt not that the position occupied by England at the present moment is given to her in relation to the Jewish question. Lord Beaconsfield, most unconsciously no doubt, has become a sort of "latter-day" Mordecai. England, with her vast resources of enlightenment and civilization, is brought into close contact with Asiatic Turkey. The mistress of the seas, the "land shadowing with wings," the "Tarshish" of latter-day fame (Isa. 18, 60; Ezek. 38), is gradually taking her true position—clearing the way of difficulties, preparing herself for the work Jehovah has destined her to do.

The "Convention of Constantinople" affords considerable scope for her benign offices. While reforms are instituted, and abuses diminish, and hateful deformities of moral, social, and political life are lessened, and much is done to develop the resources of the land of the "seven churches," so Palestine will come in for a share of these benefits as pledges of future and fuller ones. And thus things are moving on to one glorious climax. The movement is just as it is predicted. A Jew is at the head of affairs in England. Moreover, it is by his wonderful sagacity that this influence in Asiatic concerns has been obtained, and it would not be greatly surprising, perhaps, if the world should awake some morning, not long hence, to find that some new development in the profound and mysterious policy of this prominent Jew had secured a restoration of Jewish nationality, clearing the way, so far, for the last unutterably dark tragedies which are to lead into the age of millennial repose and peace.

Then again, as the independence, or partial independence, of Palestine is a necessary step toward a final settlement of the only real "Eastern Question," namely, the Jewish one, and hence is a step towards the peaceful times of a better age, so we have yet to look forward to the time when these Jews, partially restored, shall be shut in and besieged by "all nations." This is positively unavoidable; for "Behold the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee" (Jerusalem). "For I," saith the Lord, "will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished; and half of the city shall go forth into captivity" (Zech. 14:1, 2). So, again, "I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there." And, preparatory to all this, the proclamation goes forth, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near" . . . beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears:" and thus there are seen, in response to this summons, "multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision." "Then the sun is darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining." And at last the "Lord roars out of Zion, and utters His voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens shake" (Joel 3). And so "a tumult from the Lord" is among the enemy; and the "Lord goes forth to fight against those nations, and defends the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Zech. 12 and 14). This is the "time of Jacob's trouble;" but the "Lord is the hope of His people, and the strength of the children of Israel" (Joel 3:16).

The awful struggle ends. The shout of victory is raised. This last day of darkness and battle and blood closes upon a vanquished host. But the darkness passes away, and the heavens clear, and the shadows flee away, and Jerusalem is seen to be bathed in the sunshine of an age covered all over with brightness, beauty, and peace-abiding, universal, blessed.

The future is yet dark, then, with gathering and thickening woes. Treaties, and "conventions," may not serve to clear and freshen the sultry atmosphere, charged with explosive element which will shake all nations to their very centres. For so certainly it is written, "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, and the dry land"—a great and unusual earthquake (Hagg. 2:6). And there shall be a time of trouble "such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (Matt. 24:21). Yes, indeed, and "upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; . . . men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (Luke 21:25–28).

The march of events must be towards this awful and appalling crisis. Treaty after treaty must deliver up its safeguards, and all such fruitless guarantees will be contemptuously spurned by the haughty tramp and imperious demands of ambition, and the tide of battle will still roll defiantly, but with a fatal, unswerving constancy, towards the valley of Jehoshaphat, where the "Lord will plead with all flesh" (Joel 3). Human sagacity may be strained and taxed to the utmost of its powers to arrest it—humanity may plead pathetically but unsuccessfully against it the bleeding battlefields and tragical holocausts of those savage and barbarous onslaughts in the past—benevolence may seek to allure by its charms and divert by its gentle fascinations from the fatal march; but, alas! in vain—and national and imperial exchequers may raise burdened and sighing protests, but with stern and solemn inflexibility the movement will steadily progress to its awful goal.

The Treaty of Berlin handed over the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austria; but the smouldering feelings of distaste and opposition to this may greatly disturb, and possibly lead to complications which may tend to undo all that has been done. Russia obtained Batoum as a free port; but the sturdy unwillingness on the part of the inhabitants may ultimately derange the settlement arrived at. Besides, Kars and Ardahan have been allowed to be swallowed up in the Russian Empire. The outcome of it all is, that the Asiatic frontier Bayard Taylor's remains arrived in New York from Germany March 13th. They were enthusiastically received, and were deposited in the City Hall with every token of respect from the authorities and inhabitants. The body was afterwards removed to Philadelphia, to be laid in Longwood Cemetery, near Kennet Square. It is but eleven months since Bayard Taylor left New York on his mission to Germany with such a marked expression of public favor as falls to the lot of very few men. Honors and success in life can ward off from none the stroke of the fell destroyer—Death.

The Rev. E. P. Hammond is at Brantford, Ontario, and has been for two weeks holding union services in the different churches of the city, at which all the ministers except the Episcopalians attend, and a good number of their members put in an appearance.

Brantford is a beautiful city, 75 miles from Buffalo, with a population of 11,000; it is a great manufacturing town, as well as the centre of the garden farming country of Canada. Mr. Hammond is holding three meetings a day, in as many city churches. The morning service is at en, and even at that early hour one of the argest city churches is sometimes uncomfortably crowded. This is almost entirely an "experience meeting." The afternoon service at our fills one of our largest churches with an audience mostly of children, whose demeanor shows the power Mr. Hammond has of making he children love him. Already over five hundred have expressed a hope in Christ, and the end is not yet.

The permanent character of Mr. Hammond's work is proved by the fact that numbers are working in these meetings who were converted at his meetings in Hamilton, Ontario, seventeen years ago.

With Mr. Hammond, and assisting him with his weet voice, is a blind lad named Charlie Hale. Tears have been shed while Charlie was singing "The Ninety and Nine," and other sacred songs.

Thirty years a hermit is the self-inflicted punishment of a man now living in Boston. Many years ago a young man in that city was guilty of an offence against law—an offence which brought social ruin to himself and his amily. The man and his offence are forgotten by the public, yet from the day his offence was discovered—although, having escaped the law, he is free to come and go as he pleases—he has never been outside of his own house in daytime. Sometimes, under the cover of night, he walks broad to take an airing, and note the changes hat 30 years have wrought, but an ever active onscience makes him shun the light of day and he faces of men, and he walks apart, a stranger in the midst of those among whom he has always ived, a living example of the power of concience.

The tide of emigration is flowing with inreased force in a westerly direction. In a single ay, last week, over 3000 home-seekers passed hrough Kansas City, Missouri. And now, to a arger extent than heretofore, the better classes re moving. Fathers who have sons and daughers to provide with homes are selling out, and oing with all their goods to plant themselves, with their children around them, in the rich ands which are still available in the South-west. t will not be long before the population will fill very available part of the West as full as Illinois ow is. The agricultural resources of those ast States are not developed to one fourth of heir capacity. There is something sublime in he growth of the Western country under the ndustry and enterprise of our busy millions.

An Archbishop's broken bank has produced rave trouble in Cincinnati. The Roman Cathlic Archbishop Purcell, in conjunction with his rother and one or two other ecclesiastics, estabshed a savings-bank some forty years ago, hich, owing to the character and position of he founders, commanded the confidence of the Roman Catholic community. It has now become evident that the confidence was misplaced, for the conduct of the business shows utter incapacity on the part of its managers.

The bank has suspended payment, with a grievous balance-sheet. The liabilities are said to amount to about $4,000,000, while the assets, all told, are not more than $500,000. This, if these be the correct figures, leaves a deficiency to be made up in some way, or fall as a dead loss upon the depositors, amounting to $3,500,000. The books seem to have been loosely kept, and the record of business is very imperfect. The money flowed in and was received as if it was permanently to remain. It has gone into churches and seminaries, with which the city of Cincinnati and suburbs abound. The cathedral and other buildings under the control of the Archbishop have been attached under a writ, and many suits have been commenced by depositors. Some hopes are entertained that a general subscription in the Romanist churches of the country may produce a sum sufficient to considerably reduce the loss of the sufferers, and to some extent lift the odium now attaching to these sacerdotal bankrupt bankers.

Chalk marks on gate-posts, etc., are more significant, it appears, than is generally known. Mr. Joseph Cook, of Boston, in a recent lecture explained some signs which many persons have seen but have not understood. He said, "Let us suppose ourselves to be travelling in disguise with a group of tramps, and that we led them into a frank expression of their plans concerning pelf. Nearly every tramp has a piece of chalk, of which the mark will not wash out in the rain. One of the vagabonds explains to the company how he marks gate-posts. A single circle, without any line across it, means that you can obtain bread and clothing in the house behind the gate on which the mark is made. A similar circle with a single line across it means that you can obtain food there, but no clothing. A circle with two lines across it means that you will find a dog there, and will do well to beware. All up and down the Mississippi Valley gate-posts are marked by cabalistic signs."

An extraordinary death is announced from Indianapolis. On Tuesday night, March 11th, Leonidas Grover, who resided in the vicinity of Newtown, Fountain County, met his death in a strange way.

Mr. Grover was a widower, living on his farm with a married daughter and her husband. On the evening referred to the married couple had been absent on a visit to some neighbors, and upon returning at a late hour entered the house, finding every thing to all appearance in usual order, and supposing that Mr. Grover had already retired, went to bed themselves.

Next morning the daughter arose, and having prepared breakfast went to the adjoining room to call her father, and was horrified to find him lying upon his shattered bed a mutilated corpse. Her screams brought her husband quickly to the bed-room, and an inspection disclosed a ragged opening in the roof, directly over the breast of the unfortunate man, which was torn through as if by a cannon-shot, and extending downward through the bedding. Other holes showed the direction taken by the deadly missile. Subsequent search revealed the fact that the awful calamity was caused by the fall of a meteoric stone, and the stone itself, pyramidal in shape, and weighing twenty pounds and a few ounces avoirdupois, and stained with blood, was unearthed from a depth of nearly five feet, thus showing the fearful impetus with which it struck the dwelling. The position of the corpse, with other surroundings, showed that the victim was asleep when stricken, and that death to him was painless.

ONE NOTHING BY ANOTHER NOTHING.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Though I be nothing."—2 COR. 12 : 11.

Effect of Divine Discipline on Paul—Humility without Cant—I. Other Men's Estimate of Paul —1. He was Nothing in the Estimation of Hatred —2. Nothing in the Valuation of Envy—3. Nothing to the Advanced School—II. Paul's Estimate of Himself—1. A great Correction on his Original Estimate—2. The Result of Enlightenment at his Conversion—3. The Result of his Belief in the Doctrine of Grace.—4. Of his own Internal Experience—5. He had Nothing to Boast of—6. Nothing to Trust in—Our Estimate of Ourselves—Humility prevents Censure of Others —Prevents Self-seeking—Produces Gratitude.

THE divine discipline had succeeded well with the Apostle Paul. There was danger of his being exalted above measure by the abundance of the revelation which he received, and therefore there was given him a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet him: this trial fully answered its purpose, and Paul remained a lowly-minded servant of Jesus Christ. His humility comes out in the incident before us. He was compelled to defend himself and prove his apostleship, and this he does very thoroughly but very modestly. In the midst of strong expressions of self-assertion, every one of them truthful and none of them exaggerated, his true humility is as manifest as if he had been unveiling his inward faults, or writing his "Confessions." Read verse eleven, and see the lowly heart of the man: "I am become a fool in glorying; ye d, and compelled me: for I ought to have been c mended of you: for in nothing am I behind th ar- very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing."

Beloved, when we have to take the same medicine, may it have as sure an effect upon us as it had upon Paul. If it should be needful for us to be buffeted, or to endure a thorn in the flesh, may the affliction be as much sanctified to its end as it was in his case. Alas! I am afraid that some have many thorns in the flesh, and yet are not humble; many buffetings, and yet are lifted up; and, what is worse still, they have never enjoyed a perilous abundance of revelation to lift them up, but rather they have been surfeited with an abundance of that which is gross and earthy, and yet they are not humble. Though they have no good thing to glory in, they have exalted themselves above their brethren, and have spoken harshly of them and to them, and have been exceeding high and haughty in all that they have done.

Such persons may expect to be stayed in their glorying erelong. May God grant that a little thorn may be enough for us, that one touch of the lancet may suffice to let out our proud blood, that a little buffeting by the messenger of Satan may avail to prevent our being exalted above measure; for hath not the Lord said, "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle"? A little trial ought to suffice to ballast us, for I am sure we have nothing so abundant in the way of revelations and spiritual attainments that we should feel inclined at all to glory. It is a great shame if we have fallen into the danger which Paul escaped, and have fallen into it without rhyme or reason. He who is proud about nothing is a fool in capitals.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that although Paul was undoubtedly humble, and the discipline of God had helped to keep him so, yet there is not a particle of cant in any of his expressions. There is no trace of the whine of hypocrites, revealing rather than concealing their self-conceit. Humility has been well defined as having a just estimate of yourself. There is no humility in such self-depreciation as would lead you to deny what God has wrought in you, or wrought by you: that might be wilful falsehood, and certainly would be grievous error.

The mimicry of humility is a very common piece of masquerading. You shall find persons speaking in very lowly terms of themselves, but they do not expect you to believe them. A brother who has called himself worldly in prayer, if you should tell him in private conversation that you were glad to hear his truthful description of himself, would not take it at all kindly, but would ask who and what are you that you should judge him; he is as spiritual as you are, and perhaps more so. A monk, we remember, confessed that he was so great a sinner that he had broken all the commandments, and when afterwards one of his friends began to charge him with breaking first one commandment and then another, the hypocrite averred that he had not broken any one of them. Men are so little humble that when they smite on their breasts they may be still boasting in their hearts. Mock humility creeps around us, cringing and fawning, but every honest man loathes it, and we may be sure that God loathes it too.

Now, if the apostle had said that he was not an apostle at all, that he had never suffered any thing for Christ, or done any thing to spread the Gospel, he would have been speaking, as some say, "humbly"; but this is a mistake,—he would have been telling lies. He therefore does nothing of the kind. He says that he is not a whit behind the very chief of the apostles, speaks of his sufferings and his toils, and of the manifestations of divine grace to his soul; and yet for all that he finishes his detail of experience by saying, "Though I be nothing." Brethren, not deny what God has done for you, or by Look at all of it and value it, and bless the for it; but still when all is said and done st—nay, I trust you cheerfully will—come to this, "Though I be nothing." Truth aking all the while, and not using a good expression for a sort of religious fashion's sake, but because it is deeply felt to be quite as true that you are nothing, as it is true that God has blessed you.

I. We shall say of it that

THIS WAS OTHER MEN'S ESTIMATE OF HIM.

Every one did not value the great apostle as we do, but many spoke ill of him. Perhaps he meant, though I be nothing in the opinion of my detractors. I hardly think he so intended it, but still he may have included that in its meaning. "I am not," saith he, "a whit behind the chiefest of the apostles, though in the judgment of others I be nothing." I mention this point, first, because it may comfort any earnest servant of God who is faithfully serving his Master, but finds himself undervalued and despised by those from whom he expected sympathy and help.

You may be starting in the Christian life as a young man full of zeal and fervor; but you dwell among a people who count you hot-headed and self-conceited, and do their best to thwart you. You are like Joseph among his brethren, and the archers sorely shoot at you; you are looked upon as a dreamer, and a pretentious fool. Your companions are as rough to you as were David's brethren when he came down to the host: they charge you with pride and wilfulness. Be comforted about this trial if you are indeed a true-hearted soldier of Jesus Christ, for if Paul heard that, in the judgment of many, his personal presence was weak and his speech was contemptible, and if many other eminent men have been frowned upon and misjudged, you need not wonder if the like thing happens to you. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth; bear it and profit by it.

The case is harder with older servants of God. After a long life of usefulness the churches often forget all that a man was and did in his vigorous times, and now that the elasticity of his mind has abated, they treat him with indifference. His ministry is now more solid and full of experimental teaching; an ungenerous race of hearers do not say that his preaching has become weighty, but they complain that the old gentlemen is "very heavy," and they cannot endure his prosiness. The good old man, who deserves to be honored by his congregation, runs the risk of being elbowed out, and reckoned as a worn-out nobody. You must not marvel, my dear brother, if foolish lovers of novelty should so treat you; it is inexcusable, and yet it is too common. It wounds your heart and makes you wish to be gone to the better land; but do not let it too sorely vex you, for the same thing happened to him at whose feet you would be glad to sit—I mean the apostle of the Gentiles—who, when he was "such an one as Paul the aged," knew that to many he was nothing.

1. In following up the subject we observe that Paul was nothing, first in the estimation of hatred. His Jewish brethren, when he was with them, the slave of their prejudices and an advocate of their principles, thought him some great one. He was a leader among them, a Pharisee among the Pharisees, a man deeply taught in rabbinical lore, a scholar to be gloried in, a zealot to be trusted. Then Paul was something; but when he went over to the hated sect and became a worshipper of the Nazarene, he was nothing. The bigot spat at the very mention of his name. He was an apostate, a worthless fellow, a madman, a nothing. He became an alien and worse, a castaway and a curse.

Such is in a measure the case when men become thoroughly and bravely followers of Jesus. The world's market price of them falls a hundred per cent. If a scientific man is of infidel principles he is cried up as an eminent thinker and discoverer; but should he be a true Christian, and know twenty times as much as his fellows, he is a person of antiquated views and narrow notions. If a preacher proclaims novel heresies, then he is a man of advanced thought, a leader abreast of the times, though, indeed, there may be nothing in him but an affectation of singularity and a lack of reverence for the Word of God.

2. He was also nothing in the valuation of envy. There arose even in the church of Christ certain brethren who loved pre-eminence, and found the apostle already in the highest place. False brethren claimed to be apostles, and, in order to maintain their pretensions, they questioned the apostleship of Paul. They strove to rise by pulling down one who was superior to themselves. Who was Paul? they asked. He could write a weighty and powerful letter, but if you came to listen to him, his weak eyes, his short stature, and his cramped resolve to know nothing but Christ crucified, caused him to make a sorry figure as an orator. They themselves with enticing words and fair speeches boasted that they far excelled him. Where was the excellency of his words? Where was the depth of his wisdom? He was nothing, and they sneered at him, and exalted themselves. The apostle knew all this, and was by no means crushed thereby, for he could stand even before envy.

Ah! brethren, envy has a wonderful skill in the cruel arts of slander and detraction. If the envious cannot quench the sun, they can at least point to his spots, or raise a dust to blind men's eyes to his brightness. Many a hero of the truth has been despised, for the very reason which ought to have secured him honor. It is an unfortunate thing for some men, if they love their own ease, that they have risen to conspicuous usefulness, for in a middle place they might have been allowed to be something, but jealousy is now resolved to rate them at nothing.

3. Again, the apostle was, evidently, nothing to those who desired that Christianity should make a fair show in the flesh. Certain brethren had come in among the believers who brought with them human wisdom, and thought therewith to adorn the doctrine of Christ, and cause the offence of the cross to cease. Gnosticism was the "modern thought" of the apostle's age, and of the era which followed it. It was a translation of the Gospel into the language of the schools, and the evaporation of its true life and meaning in the process.

Our apostle abhorred the wisdom of words. "We use," saith he, "great plainness of speech." He tore the mask from off those half heathens who made the cross of Christ of none effect by their philosophizing, and therefore they retaliated by declaring that he was not a man of great mind, that in fact he was nothing.

Other teachers arose who were opposed to the philosophical way, but they must needs take the way of tradition and ritualism, declaring th men must be circumcised, or else their faith i Christ would be of no avail. Such persons dwe much upon the observance of holy days an months, and so on, and thus stirred up th spirit of the apostle till he came forth and crie "I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcise Christ shall profit you nothing. By the dee of the law shall no flesh be justified." By d claring the clear plain Gospel of salvation b grace through faith he laid the axe at the ro of all ritualism, as he had before done at th root of all rationalism. Straightway the Hig Churchmen discovered that Paul was nothing.

May the Lord grant to all of us who preac the Gospel a willingness to be lightly esteeme The Lord give us all grace to be fools in the est mation of modern wise men. May we hav enough backbone of holy firmness to be conse vative of the old truth, and to be careless of th ridicule of the worldly wise. May we hav enough loyalty to Christ to be willing to b despised for His sake, manliness enough not t care one atom whether we are in honor or di honor, so long as our conscience is clear that w have faithfully preached Jesus Christ and Hi crucified.

The day shall come when he who has bor the most obloquy for Christ will be esteemed th happiest and most honored man alive; and whe he who was counted the greatest fool for Chri shall be acknowledged to be among the wisest men, and shall shine as the stars forever ar ever. The verdict of earth will be reversed the judgment of heaven, for that which is high esteemed among men is abomination in the sig of God. When any measure of injustice griev us, we should console ourselves with the reme brance that so persecuted they the prophets th were before us, and yet the prophets have l no real honor; so also despised they the Mast and yet His throne has lost none of its glory.

II. But now, secondly, we have here in t words of the apostle

HIS OWN ESTIMATE OF HIMSELF.

1. "Though I be nothing." Our first obs vation upon the apostle's valuation of himsel that it is a very great correction upon his origi estimate of himself, for in former days he carr a high sail, and would by no means lower flag to any man. When he was on the road Damascus to hunt the saints he was on fi class terms with himself, and thought that was doing God service. He was somebody t both good and great, a Hebrew of the Hebre as touching the law, a Pharisee; you might h ridden many a mile to find his equal. Saul like his namesake of old, head and shoul above all others; but Paul was of quite a di ent stature, short, and even diminutive: I re of course, to his height in his own esteem. would not then have owned that he was noth for he was a student of the law, and a great more besides.

2. This corrected estimate very much res from the enlightenment which he received a conversion. What a flood of light does the l pour in upon a man's soul when he brings to himself! At first it almost blinds him that like Paul he owns, "I could not see fo brightness of that light." It was so in MY OWN CASE.

I had often been down into the cellar o heart, and I rather admired the purity and of the place. It seemed to me to be festo and decorated, and it boasted a good sha vegetation and a considerable life of its own dim, flickering light sufficed to show me thought, that it was by no means a very place, but rather the reverse. I could not vain as to say that I thought it absolutely p in cleanliness and beauty, but still it was a as could be expected, and far better tha most of other hearts.

Now, it was ordained that this flatterin sion should be dispelled. On a day, as I into this vault, there came one with a candle than I had been wont to carry, and I saw surprised me beyond measure. I sa eezes ; and even thus, in his dream, did Futtey ng appear carried on beside her. She stretch- out her hand towards the fair and stately tree, d even as she stretched it, down fell the rosy ower of fruit like hail, reddening the ground which they lay. Not one remained fixed upon e branches !

"They grew not upon the holy tree," cried the ight one ; "love of praise had but fastened em on, and the waxen fastening melted at the proach of Truth ! Thy alms were not given om love to God ; thy alms were not given from ve to man ; they were done to be seen, they re done to be praised, and surely thou hast d thy reward ! Fool, fool ! dost thou claim erit for this ? Lo ! the dust of earth hath filed thy deeds of beneficence !"

Futtey Sing heaved a sigh of bitter disappoint- ent ; he had deceived others, but himself had en most deceived.

Then, irresistibly impelled by Truth, the Rajah proached the fair and stately tree upon which ng the golden clusters. Truth stretched rth her hand, and, even as she stretched it, wn fell the yellow shower of fruit like hail, ding the ground on which they lay. Not one mained fixed upon the branches.

"They grew not on the holy tree," cried the ight one ; "interest had but fastened them on, d the waxen fastenings melted at the approach Truth ! Well has it been said by the wise : 'an judges of our motives by our actions, God dges of our actions by our motives !' Thou ewest that the strength of thy throne was stice ; and therefore, O Rajah, wert thou just ! rely thou hast had thy reward ! Fool, fool ! st thou claim merit for this ? Lo ! the dust of rth hath defiled thy deeds of justice !"

And Futtey Sing sighed more heavily than fore ; he had deceived others, but himself had en most deceived.

So in his dream the Rajah approached the rd tree, the fair and stately tree upon which ng the milk-white clusters, the deeds of self- ial! Truth stretched forth her hand, and, en as she stretched it, down fell the snowy ower of fruit like hail, whitening the ground which they lay. Not one remained on the anches !

"They grew not on the holy tree," cried the ght one ; "pride had but fastened them on, d the waxen fastenings melted at the approach Truth ! Thou didst feel exalted in thine n eyes by thy humiliations, thy fastings and oblations raised thee in thine own sight ove the level of common men. Surely thou st had thy reward ! Fool, fool ! dost thou im merit for this ? Lo ! the dust of the earth th defiled thy deeds of self-denial !"

Then Futtey Sing groaned aloud ; he had de- ved others, but himself had been most de- ved.

"What see I yonder," said Truth, "on the rble before the porch of thy temple ? Every d of goodly plumage appears to be there, with ngs of emerald and sapphire, and necks of anging hues, like the varied colors of the al. Tell me, O Futtey Sing ! what are se ?"

Again the spirit of the Rajah revived—again heart throbbed with a feeling of pride, as he e answer in his dream : "These are the thou- ds of prayers which I have uttered, at morn, noon, and at the hour of sunset. Have I not rn the marble with my knees ? nay, have I stolen the hours from sleep, and with the ce of my supplication pierced the dull air of ht ! These, my prayers, like birds of strong ng, shall rise above the clouds, appear for me ore the eternal throne, and draw down a bless- from on high !"

"Yea," replied Truth, "the Supreme loves receive the prayers of His people. The faint- sigh from a true humble heart, mounts far ond the twinkling stars. But wherefore rest ne upon the ground ? Will they not take ht at our approach ? Are their goodly wings clogged that they cannot rise ?"

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for March 30th. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE have come to the end of the first quarter of the new year in our series of lessons. We were first called upon to consider the building of the second Temple in Ezra 3, and its dedication in Ezra 6. We learn how wondrously God fulfils His word, and how, in the midst of apparently insurmountable difficulties, His people are "more than conquerors" when they put their trust in Him. Oh, how foolish we are to look at our difficulties, or to think of our weakness and helplessness, instead of looking away to God that performeth all things for us (Ps. 57 : 2). When we are in the will of God, and trusting Him, it is impossible that we can fail, for we can say with our Master, "the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works" (John 14 : 10). Here, then, is a lesson of trust.

Our next four lessons were taken from the history of Nehemiah, who may be called the man of prayer. Practical, business-like, capable in all earthy matters, one might have thought that great natural capacity was the cause of it ; but God lets us into the secret, and shows us the strong undercurrent of prayer which pervaded his life ; that really he was a man who was timid, weak in himself, but binding his cause to God in prayer, he became mighty through Him. Neither the King of Persia nor the Jews in Judea, neither the priests and Levites among his own people, nor yet their enemies, could resist or prevail against this man of prayer.

We see him standing before the king while his hand is on his God, for he has previously come to a full understanding with Him, and he knows that the Lord reigneth. He waits until the Lord has opened his way, and then makes preparations with a boldness which is startling, because he does not consider the likelihood or even the possibility ; that is God's affair, and he stands there to speak only what God puts in his mouth. He does not think whether he shall please the king or not, he does not live to please him or any other man ; but in the most utter self-abandonment he acts as one who has no eyes for any but God, seeing and hearing only through Him.

Beloved Christian reader, are you thus free ? Do you walk so freely in a clear understanding with God and in the light of his countenance that outward circumstances have lost their power to trouble you ; you know that He can unravel every tangle, that He sees the way out of every labyrinth, that He has unlimited power over every obstacle, and that because your cause is His cause no power on earth or in hell can prevent that cause from succeeding ? Had Nehemiah looked to himself, he might have thought, How can my people put any trust in me ? I am no ruler, nor yet am I an architect that I should build Jerusalem. But Nehemiah did not see Nehemiah : he saw God only ; God was going to rebuild Jerusalem.

The mockery of his enemies and their plots against him had the same effect one as the other ; both drove him closer to God. And what would have been far more difficult if he had considered man or courted popularity—i.e., to reprove his own people—this also he did in the spirit of prayer and reliance upon God. And he set before them no lower motive in order to attract them ; he took high ground and said, "It is not good that ye do : ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies ?" (Neh. 5 : 9.) And while he encouraged the people to renounce unlawful advantage over one another, he himself renounced the lawful advantages of his position. He says, "But the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver ; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people : but so did not I, because of the fear of God" (Neh. 5 : 15).

Thus we see that a man of prayer is a practical and high-principled man, who does not pass away all his time in contemplation, but comes fresh from the presence of God, strong with His authority, which he brings to bear upon others. We see also that he does not only sigh over, but he seeks to reform, the abuses of his day ; brings Bible-reading into practice again, and insists on a strict keeping of the Sabbath day. And all which was brought about through his means began in the secret place of the Most High ; alone with God he took his counsel, alone with God he gathered strength, and alone with God he insured victory.

Our next lesson was on the way of the righteous—his standing, sitting, walking ever in the Lord, his fruitfulness, etc., and the painful contrast of the ungodly. And then we considered our beloved Lord in the glory of His reign when God shall "put all things under His feet" (Ps. 8 : 6 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 25).

Next, we had the prayer of the penitent, and we found that the deep self-abasement of the fallen king of Israel was that of a man who had known close intimacy with God, and who was shrinking from himself, as one who on whom the light of God's searching eye had fallen. "In Thy light shall we see light" (Ps. 36 : 9), but in Thy light shall we discover darkness too. We have seen the intense longing of David for purity, and how in all his deep humiliation he does not so much as name that which brings the deepest sense of shame to such as are not walking closely with God, "What will men think of me ?" Deeply as he had sinned against Bathsheba, Uriah, his family, his kingdom, the thought of all was swallowed up in the greater consciousness of having sinned against God, "against Thee, Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight."

Next we have the joy of forgiveness, the pardon—full, free, perfect, and just—which He gives to us in Christ when He imputes no more to us our iniquity. And this blessing is the foundation of all others. How can any one so walk as to please God if he does not know the terms on which he stands with Him ? God keeps no man in suspense. If any of my readers are not rejoicing in the glorious liberty of sin forgiven, and sin conquered by the blood of Christ, the fault does not lie with Him who has provided grace for every man, but with him who has failed to accept that grace and to believe that God means what He says. God's part of the transaction is complete. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5 : 19). If God is reconciled to you, if God does not impute your trespasses to you, what power is there under heaven, except your own unbelief, which can hinder you from being reconciled unto God ?

Finally, we have the All-seeing God. Terrible to the sinner, blessed to His own children, is the consciousness that we have a God who neither slumbereth nor sleepeth (Ps. 121 : 4). In so many things in which injustice is done us we can be perfectly content to know : "My Father is aware of it ; He has seen it all." In the misjudgment of men there is an intense repose in knowing : "My life is hid with Christ in God, and my Father knows." And then, when we are rightly accused, and some faithful brother or sister has lovingly warned us of a fault, how blessed to trace the warning back to Him who has put the word in their mouth, and who could not tolerate imperfection in His child ! In all things, how safe to be under the watchful eye of an Almighty and loving Father !

In all the lessons of the past quarter, direct, personal, and practical dealing with God has been enforced. Nothing else can prepare us for the position of power and blessing to which God calls His children on earth ; nothing else can fit us for a reign with Him in glory. But a life hid with Christ in God must be a life in which self has nothing to say, no claim to make ; and therefore is it a life so rare, so little known. Yet to make such a life possible the Son of God thought it worth His while to leave heaven. Shall we then "neglect so great salvation ?"

An important success of the British forces against the Zulus is announced from South Africa. The Zulus attacked about 4000 of the British troops under Colonel Pearson's command, and were defeated with enormous loss. All fears of a successful invasion of Natal have disappeared; also the news from the Transvaal looks more reassuring for the English, as the inhabitants, being threatened with attacks from surrounding tribes, will naturally throw themselves upon the protection of the British, and cease agitating after independence.

Two defeats of the British forces in Afghanistan have been reported by the New York Herald. It is announced that two English battalions, consisting of about eleven hundred men, had been completely defeated and pursued by the Eldji tribes in the Akosta Valley, where the English had already established an administration of their own. It is also reported that the British troops sustained a severe defeat at Lagna Fort, sixty miles south of Gazni. The fort was taken by the Eldji after a severe fight, and the English governor, bound with ropes, was carried in triumph to Cabul.

This fort is an important post on the main road between the Indus Valley and Gazni, by way of the Gomal Pass, and if it can be held will serve as a check to the further progress of the British in that region.

The French Chamber of Deputies has decided not to impeach the De Broglie Ministry. M. Waddington, the President of the Council, said, in the course of the debate: "The report of the impeachment committee would remain in history as testimony of the guilt of the incriminated Ministers. Their offence was great, but their prosecution would produce agitation difficult to alay." The Chamber, however, determined to brand the obnoxious men with national infamy, and passed the following order of the day: "The De Broglie and Rochebouet cabinets, by their culpable schemes, betrayed the Government they should have served. The Chamber accordingly delivers them over to the judgment of the nation, and orders that the foregoing resolution be placarded in every commune in France."

The English nation has had the evil of indiscriminate exportation of arms and ammunition brought home by the Zulu disaster. It has been discovered that the brave troops who were slaughtered by the African savages fell under a destructive fire of English ball, poured from English breech-loaders. When the ministers were questioned on the subject in the House of Lords, they replied that they "deplored the fact, and should in future use every effort to put down the objectionable traffic." This objectionable traffic has beeen brought under the notice of English ministers before, as we have reason to remember; but it is hoped that lessons so savagely taught in Zululand may effect the result the Alabama Award and the other protests of foreigners have failed to produce.

A whole City turned into a lake.—Intelligence has been received that Szegedin, a city ranking second in commercial importance in the Kingdom of Hungary, has been completely submerged by an inundation of the river Theiss. Fears had been entertained for nearly a week that such a catastrophe might occur, and some measures had been taken to protect the city, but the irruption came at last—so suddenly that it is feared a considerable loss of life has occurred. Szegedin was built on the right bank of the river Theiss, the highest part of the city being only twelve feet above the low-water level. The Theiss is a river 800 miles in length, rising in the Carpathian Mountains, and flowing into the Danube near the southern boundary of Hungary. Its course is marked by numerous sharp bends, and when the river is swollen by the melted snow and impregnated with alluvial soil, it becomes choked at these sudden curves, and rises high above its ordinary level. Dykes had been built near Szegedin, but the pressure of the water carried away one after another, until on March 12th the last dam broke down and the whole city was submerged.

The telegram announcing the disaster says: "Terrible suffering is commencing. Shrieks and cries from thousands are heard. Houses are crashing by the score, and in many cases carrying their inmates with them. There is no gas, the works being 15 feet in the water. I fear we shall run short of food. One boat was just going to save a large houseful of people, when a fearful crash carried with it the whole living freight.

"The flood, with terrific roar, is rushing from two sides over the city. The horrors of the situation baffle all description. The town is, in fact, destroyed. Two thirds of it are now submerged, including the citadel, and the post and telegraph offices. Whole rows of houses are falling. The Orphanage and Synagogue are destroyed. All the inmates of the former were buried in the ruins. Two manufactories are on fire. The inhabitants are flying to New Szegedin and the more elevated parts of the town. The scene is simply heartrending. Over 80,000 people are out of house and home. Hundreds are drowning, and the water is still rising rapidly."

A significant fact in connection with the election of M. Jules Grévy to the Presidency of the French Republic is, that only one member of the French Episcopate has had the courtesy to congratulate him on his elevation to that honorable position. The solitary prelate who has taken this patriotic and sensible course is the Archbishop of Avignon. But when Louis Napoleon seated himself on a throne founded upon treachery and bloodshed, the Catholic bishops and clergy were the first to offer him their congratulations. They poured fulsome flatteries into his ears, and were forward to bless even his foulest deeds. All this would doubtless have been repeated now if an enemy of the Republic had been elected to the Presidential chair instead of M. Grévy. Need we wonder that so many Frenchmen openly reject religion, and avow themselves Atheists?

The Marriage of the Duke of Connaught, third son of Queen Victoria, with Princess Louise Margaret, daughter of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, the hero of Metz, often called the "Red Prince," was celebrated at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, with great splendor, on Thursday, March 13th. The mourning worn for the Princess Alice was generally laid aside for this day. At the ceremony, besides Her Majesty the Queen and all the members of the Royal Family present in England, there were in attendance from abroad, among others, the father of the bride, the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, and the King and Queen of the Belgians. Prince Leopold, youngest brother of the bridegroom, was unable to be present through illness. The marriage service was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of London, Winchester, and Oxford.

The commercial distress in European cities may be realized by the following facts published in a Berlin newspaper: "In three months there have been 3000 seizures in the capital for arrears of taxes; that more than double that number of Berlin tradesmen are in bankruptcy or the verge of it; that the great army of unemployed workmen have kept themselves alive, if such an existence can be called life, by clearing snow off the sidewalks; that 237 men recently applied for a vacant clerkship, worth only $3.15 per week, and that a doctor who advertised for a housekeeper received 450 applications. In Mannheim the misery is frightful. Men, once stalwart, roam around the streets, and search the gutters, in hope of stumbling upon something that can be converted into warmth or food."

A Sister Substitute.—At Brussels, the capital of Belgium, a poor crippled girl committed some offence, for which she was sentenced to a week's imprisonment. Her sister slipped into her place, was carried to prison, and bore the week's punishment for her. At the end of the week it was discovered that the true offender had not been punished. The judge refused to consider the penalty paid, and even proceeded to sentence the sister to prison for attempting to shield the guilty, and would have carried it into effect had not the people of the city interposed. There is necessity for the sentence of the law being put into execution; and so the punishment was inflicted. It may, however, be borne by a substitute; but if so, the judge must consent to that arrangement. Now, in our case a substitute did come forward, our Elder Brother Jesus. His offering of Himself was approved by the Father, and therefore avails for us.

Royal Atrocities in Burmah.—Great consternation exists in Mandalay, in consequence of the King of Burmah having caused all the royal princes and their families, numbering forty persons, to be murdered. The late King of Burmah, who died on the 2d of October last, was a ruler of a mild and peaceable type, but his son, who then succeeded to the throne, appears disposed to follow the brutal instincts of his more despotic ancestors. The killing was attended by every possible atrocity. The victims were beaten and kicked. The women were shamefully abused. The Royal Princes were reserved to the last, and made to witness the torture and death of their families. The bodies of all the victims were thrown into old wells. Surely the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty (Psalm 74; 20).

Mr. William Noble's Temperance Meetings at Hoxton Music Hall, London, are doing a great deal of good. The other evening a gentleman and his wife came on the platform. He said his wife (who was with him, and could not be much more than thirty years of age) had been addicted to drink for over eight years. She would keep sober for a week or two, then break out, and leave her home and little children; she had then just come out of the workhouse, and she could not overcome the terrible craving for drink. There she stood by him, ashamed to look up. He husband took the pledge with her, he said, as last resource to help her to keep it. Who knows perhaps, had he signed before, she might hav held more firmly on, for it is perilous to pu temptation in the way of these weak ones. Th ladies intend looking after her.

A Grasping Priest.—A lady in Brussels wh was eighty years of age finding herself to be seriously ill, she caused her confessor, of the Orde des Conventuels, to be sent for. The latter, o arriving at the beside of the invalid, requeste her niece and a maid-servant to withdraw Shortly afterward he recalled them, and demanc ed that the niece should deliver to him a cash-bo containing all the fortune of the dame, 300,0 francs. The damsel refused. The priest w annoyed, but soon found out from the mai servant where the valuables were kept. He we to the place, took possession of the box and i contents, of no light weight, and with some a conveyed it to a cab and drove off. A complai was at once made by the young lady to t police, and a judicial inquiry was commence Since then Madame Perdegel is dead, and it h been ascertained that by will she disinherit her family for the benefit of Father Hyacinthe

RICHARD COBDEN.

An Ancient Family—Commercial Pursuits—The Timely Help of a Friend—Prosperity in Business—Cobden Contributes to the Press—His First Speech—Returned to Parliament—The Anti-Corn-Law League—Sir Robert Peel's Testimony—The Anglo-French Treaty Negotiated by Mr. Cobden—His Illness and Death—John Bright's Estimate of His Friend's Character.

ON the 3d of June, 1804, Richard Cobden was born, at a farmhouse near Midhurst, in the County of Sussex, England. The family was one of the oldest in the neighborhood; but the story of its ancestry is best told in words which were spoken by Cobden to a friend when walking in the beautiful country near Dunford House, the place of his birth, about a year before his death.

"Our family," he said, "has resided in this neighborhood for a good many generations. Years ago, my brother and I found a number of papers which had been thrown aside as waste paper, which, when we came to examine them, proved to be old family documents. By these we could trace the Cobdens as having lived at Midhurst for two hundred years, and there was always a Richard Cobden among them. Formerly there was a small manufactory of hosiery in the town, with which they appear to have been connected. My grandfather was an energetic and prosperous man. He was a maltster at Midhurst, and almost always the bailiff (i.e., the mayor) of the town, and took rather a notable part in county matters. My father took to farming at an unfortunate time. He was most amiable and kind-hearted, but not a man of business, and things did not prosper with him. But my mother was a woman of great energy and character."

At the Free Grammar School of Midhurst, a quaint but clean and well-built Sussex market-town, the subject of our sketch received the rudiments of his education. Subsequently, his father died, and he was sent to his uncle in London, who found him employment in his warehouse, where, however, he did not remain long, but obtained another situation in a large house in the same department of trade. Here his quickness, integrity, and energy secured for him the favorable notice of his employers, and it was not long ere he was advanced from the warehouse to be their representative on the "road."

Whilst acting as commercial traveller for this house, it came to Cobden's knowledge that a firm with whom they were doing business, were desirous of retiring, and were willing to dispose of their business on very favorable terms. This was the opportunity for young Cobden; but he did not possess the required sum of 1500*l.* to purchase it. A Mr. John Lewis, of 101 Oxford Street, London, entertained, however, so great an esteem and friendship for young Cobden, that he lent him the money, which in due time was punctually repaid.

Calico-printing was the business in which Cobden thus became established; and under his management it became highly lucrative. The firm had three large houses of business—one in London and one in Manchester for the sale of goods, and another at Clitheroe, where the calicoes were printed.

THE MANCHESTER HOUSE

was under the personal management of Mr. Cobden himself; and to his thorough knowledge of the trade, coupled with his good taste and business tact, the firm mainly owed its great success. Cobden's prints not only became fashionable, but their fame was known abroad.

While engaged in matters of business, and travelling widely to open up fresh business, he was keenly alive to the political events of the day. Under the signature of "Libra" he contributed a series of papers on public questions, to the Manchester Times. These were of such high merit that they attracted the attention of the editors of that journal, who invited the anonymous writer to meet them at their publishing office. This led to his introduction to some prominent politicians in Manchester, and he was soon afterwards induced to essay a public speech at a meeting to promote the incorporation of the town.

HIS FIRST ATTEMPT AT ORATORY

proved a failure; he became nervous and confused, and all but broke down. But it was not long before his great powers as a public speaker became fully developed. At the opening of the Manchester Athenæum he delivered the inaugural address, and also appeared at several meetings on behalf of the movement for national education. At one of these meetings he first met that eminent statesman, John Bright, and ere long a friendship was formed between them, founded on a community of sentiments and aims; a friendship which, in connection with the great Free Trade struggle, and the social and political progress of England, will be deemed worthy of historic notice.

At the general election of 1841 Mr. Cobden was returned to Parliament for Stockport, and on August 25th he delivered his maiden speech

IN PARLIAMENT.

It was mainly directed against the protective duty on corn. His style of speaking on that occasion was described as "simple and earnest, his eloquence plain, ready, and forcible, and of a kind eminently suited to his time and function, and wholly new in the House of Commons."

For several years, until the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846, he labored indefatigably by speaking and writing to procure for the British people the great boon of Free Trade in corn, and the repeal of the Protection Laws which imposed heavy duties upon corn imported from foreign lands, and which consequently raised the price of bread, and caused the stagnation of trade. In a speech at that period he said, "Beginning myself without one shilling besides what I derived from my own industry, I have pushed my way along; but I declare it my firm conviction that had I been left to commence my career at the present day, such is the state of trade, I could not have a chance of rising."

In 1846 the Anti-Corn-Law League was successful in bringing about the abolition of the Corn Laws, and Sir Robert Peel said at that time, "The name which ought to be, and will be, associated with the success of these measures, is the name of one who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has with untiring energy made appeals to our reason, and has enforced those appeals with an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned—the name which ought to be chiefly associated with these measures is the name of Richard Cobden."

Nothing but a thorough conviction that he was rendering a service to his country led Cobden to take so prominent a part in the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and how highly he estimated the benefit when the end was accomplished may be judged of by the following words in which he alluded to Sir Robert Peel, when soon after forced to resign by the adverse vote of Parliament: "If he has lost office he has gained a country. For my part, I would rather descend into private life with that last measure of his which has led to his discomfiture in my hand, than mount to the highest pinnacle of human power without it."

NATIONAL TESTIMONIAL.

Aware of the pecuniary sacrifices he had made, and fully appreciating the value of the public service he had rendered, his admirers throughout Great Britain resolved to requite and honor Cobden in return: they did so by presenting to him the munificent sum of 80,000*l.* ($389,000). Part of this amount was laid out in the purchase of the house in which he was born, together with a small estate adjoining. The house, improved and enlarged, became Dunford House, his favorite residence. Here, amidst the scenes of his childhood, he hospitably received strangers who came to him from all lands; here, in an unostentatious manner, he went about doing good, visiting the poor, the sick, and afflicted, cheering them with a kindly word and ministering to their pressing wants with liberal hand and loving heart; and in congenial pursuits he spent the closing years of his life.

During the interval between the repeal of the Corn Laws and the Crimean War, Cobden devoted himself to the advocacy of a reduction in the national expenditure, and of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes.

In the autumn of 1859 he accomplished another great undertaking, and rendered one more splendid service to his country. This was the successful negotiation of

THE ANGLO-FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATY.

The high estimation in which this special service was regarded by the British Government will best be shown in Mr. Gladstone's words in Parliament: "With regard to Mr. Cobden, speaking as I do at a time when every angry passion has passed away, I cannot help expressing our obligations to him for the labor he has, at no small personal sacrifice, bestowed upon a measure which he, not the least among the apostles of Free Trade, believes to be one of the most memorable triumphs Free Trade has ever achieved. Rare is the privilege of any man, who, having fourteen years ago rendered to his country one signal service, now again, within the same brief span of life, decorated neither by rank nor title, bearing no mark to distinguish him from the people he loves, has been permitted to perform another great and memorable service to his sovereign and country."

Mr. Cobden had long suffered from weak health. An attack of bronchitis was the immediate cause of his death, which occurred in Suffolk Street, London, on Sunday morning, April 2d, 1865. Many were the tributes tendered to his memory and merits. In the "Corps Législatif" of France the death of Richard Cobden was spoken of as "not alone a misfortune to England, but a cause of mourning for France and humanity." by his most intimate friend John Bright, spoker on the occasion of his unveiling Cobden' statue at Bradford in 1877, will be read with interest. After tracing in an eloquent speech hi career from the time when he was a calico-printer in Manchester in 1830, at the age of 26, t his death in 1865, Mr. Bright said of his las days:

The following

"I had been, only a month before the day his death, visiting him at his home at Midhurs It was a clear day in the early March. W strolled out into the fields, and as we were retur ing home he began to talk of his boy, his on son, who died some nine or ten years, I thin before; and, turning round and pointing to t beautiful little church, in a most lovely situ tion, he said, 'Yes, my poor boy lies there, a I shall very soon be with him.' I little thoug how soon.

"Only a few days afterwards he came up London—it was a time when the question spending large sums on the absurd and mo strous idea of defending Canada from the Ur ed States was before the public; and he ca up to London with the intention of speak upon this question and of pointing out to House of Commons the foolish and irratio course on which they were invited to enter. came up on one of the bitterest days of t month of March, and he was stricken by c and fatally stricken. Only, I think, some days afterwards his complaint became gre aggravated, and on that 2d of April of whic have spoken, I was at his rooms early in morning, and remained with him during s unconscious hours until the final close of a to which I feel myself, and have always felt self, so strongly attached.

"One more picture of him. I attended funeral at Midhurst. He was laid in the s vault with his boy, in which they are now companied by the remains of his dear wife the dear boy's mother. I attended, I say funeral. Before we left the house, leanin the coffin was his sorrowing daughter, whose attachment to her father seems to een a passion scarcely equalled among daughers. She said, 'My father used to like me ery much to read to him the Sermon on the lount.' Why, his own life was to a large exent—I speak it with deference and with hesitaon—a sermon based upon that best and greatst of sermons. His was a life of perpetual self-crifice. I have lately been reading a new poem hich has interested me very much—a poem alled 'The Epic of Hades.' Many of you may ever have heard of it; most of you may not ave seen it. It is, as I view it, another gem dded to the wealth of the poetry of our lanuage. In that poem the author says—

> 'For knowledge is a steep which few may climb,
> But duty is a path which all may tread.'

think it will be admitted by those who know ny thing of the life of Mr. Cobden that he trod hat he believed to be the path of duty, and alays with a firm and unfaltering footstep.

"But let me add that this statue which you ave erected to-day, or which is erected in your idst, is by no means the greatest monument at has been built up to him. There is one far rander and of wider significance. There is not homestead in the country in which there is not dded comfort from his labors, not a house the wellers in which have not steadier employment, igher wages, and a more solid independence. he Repeal of the Corn Laws and establishment f Free Trade is an enduring monument. He orked for these ends and for these great purposes, and he worked, as it might be said, even most to the very day when the lamp of life went ut. He is gone, but his character, his deeds, is life, his example, remain a possession to us is countrymen, and, as long as the great men England are spoken of in the English lanuage, let it be said of him that Richard Coben gave the labors of a life that he might confer pon his countrymen perfect freedom of industry, nd with it not that blessing only, but its attendnt blessings of plenty and of peace."

ONVERSION OF A CHINESE GAMBLING SALOON KEEPER.

A WEALTHY Chinaman, the proprietor of a rge gambling hell, was converted under the llowing circumstances: A Chinese literary raduate came to Mr. Stevenson, of the China land Mission, and wished to have some conersation with him, having read some translaons of scientific works by which he was very uch interested. Mr. Stevenson conversed ith him on the subject about which he was terested, and then introduced the Gospel, and od blessed his exhortations to his conversion.

The young graduate at once made public proession of Christ, and though it brought upon im no small amount of persecution and opprorium, he went out in the power of the Holy host and preached the Gospel in the streets of his wn city. There was no foreigner by his side. here was no one to support him. He was there l alone, and the love of Christ constrained him.

As he stood there one day preaching, he said, This Saviour, of whom I am speaking to you, mighty to save. He is able to cure the opium noker of his opium smoking. He is able to ure the gambler of his propensities to gambling. le is able to cure the debauchee of his bad abits; and you know very well that it is useless r men who are addicted to these evils to try to ure themselves. But the Saviour whom I reach—Jesus Christ—is mighty to save."

The proprietor of the gambling hell was standg near listening to the earnest young preacher, nd he said to himself, "If this Jesus can save me, le shall." He afterwards had some conversaion with the literary graduate, and he went ome and closed his gambling establishment. le sent all the bad women away from the ouse, and the place has remained closed until a hort time since, when a part of it was opened for he preaching of the Gospel; and now, instead of he rattle of the tables, obscene songs, and blashemous ejaculations, the walls echo with the lessed words of the Gospel.

A DYING COLOR-SERGEANT'S REPENTANCE, AND THREE CHRISTIAN OFFICERS' DEATHS.

By Major Malan, Author of "Old Comrades," etc.

IT was evening in the tropics. A commanding officer went out for his ordinary walk, and having nowhere particular to go, bent his steps towards the regimental hospital. He thought that a visit might perhaps cheer the men. As he entered the large ward, he saw one of the color-sergeants of the regiment in bed.

"Why, color-sergeant ——, when did you come here?"

"Yesterday morning, sir. I took cold the day before."

"I missed you at the orderly-room this morning, but I thought you were on guard."

The officer then sat down on his bed, and they talked together. The color-sergeant had been in his company. He first gave him promotion as lance-corporal, and each of his other steps had been by his recommendation. They had known one another ten years, and the officer had a great regard for him. Old quarters and old comrades were recalled, and home was spoken of. Before leaving, the officer said, "Well, I never expected to find you here this evening, but we are old friends, and I should like to give you some words which I have been turning over in my mind all day, and the more I think of them the better I like them."

"I should be glad to hear them, sir."

The officer then twice repeated, "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Romans 5 : 10).

He continued: "Do you see the beauty of that argument? When we were all enemies to God by sin, we were reconciled to Him by the death of Christ. That is a fact if we believe in Him. Much more, says the apostle, as we are thus reconciled, we shall be saved by His life—because He lives to save us. What a glorious truth this is!"

Wishing him and the other patients good-night, the officer left the ward, receiving the thanks of his old comrade for the visit.

Christmas day soon followed. It was a day of heavy tropical rain. The commanding officer had been round the Christmas dinners, and not wishing that the officers should get wet through, by accompanying him to the hospital, he dismissed them and the non-commissioned officers, and with his orderly went to visit the patients. When he entered the building and looked at his old friend, the color-sergeant, he was shocked to see the stamp of death upon his face.

After talking to the other soldiers about the old folks at home, and referring briefly to the cause of the special observance of Christmas day, he went to the bedside of the man who was so ill. There could be no mistake about it. He had come to that point in the war where there is no discharge.

The officer did not know whether the doctor had told his friend that his end was near, so he made no allusion to it, but after exchanging a few words, and remarking that the whole civilized world was feasting and rejoicing on a day kept in commemoration of the birth of Christ, although so many rejected Him, he asked him whether he had thought over the passage he had repeated to him at his last visit.

The color-sergeant replied that he had.

The officer then proposed to read to him from his Bible. The sick man acquiesced. He selected this passage: "I am the door; by Me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture" (John 10 : 9). The officer dwelt long and earnestly on Christ Himself being the only Door, the necessity of every man entering by faith in Him, and the certainty that if they do so they shall be saved. He laid great stress on the assurance contained in the word "shall." Not wishing to weary his old comrade, to whom he had often before spoken on this truth, he prayed with him, and then urging him to hold fast to the words of life which Christ had spoken, and to look up to Him alone, left the ward. A brother sergeant who had come to see the sick man took the officer's place.

"M—," said the dying man to the friend who sat with him, "you know —— and his followers?" He alluded to the familiar name by which the commanding officer was known in the barracks.

His comrade assented.

"Well, you know that I have always been the ringleader in laughing at them. I am very sorry for it now. You will remember, M—, that I said I am very sorry for it now?"

His comrade promised that he would. It was all the reparation the dying man could make to confess his past wrong; and, blessed be God, it is a hopeful sign when a sinner acknowledges his transgressions and seeks, through Christ, free and full pardon for all his many offences.

He was like an old gunner, who once said, "I used to call every man in the battery who attended the officer's Bible-class all the hypocrites in the world until I got caught, and now they call me a hypocrite, but I don't mind it."

THREE CHRISTIAN OFFICERS' DEATHS.

"I am ready!" said Colonel Fordyce when mortally wounded. He was a father to his regiment, the 74th Highlanders, and his name is yet remembered among them. Carried to the rear by his men, the surgeon told him that his wound was fatal. "I am ready!" was his calm reply. He was ready. For many years he had walked with God as a soldier, and he went to no strange quarters, when he exchanged march and battle for "the presence of the King."

"Ready!" has been the glad response of many thousands when the summons has come to them.

Colonel Sir Thomas Troubridge, Baronet, whose noble conduct when wounded at Inkerman obtained for him the admiration of the army, was one of this host. Held in high esteem by his regiment, long on the staff at the Horse Guards, and beloved by a large circle of friends, he was suddenly called to fight his last battle. So unexpected was the event that there was no time to summon friends. But he sent his mother and sister this message: "Tell them that I am not afraid to die; I am trusting to the blood of the Lord Jesus for salvation, and we shall soon meet again."

Another officer on the headquarter staff with him, when as quickly called to sheath his sword, repeated this saying of Christ to a friend who had visited him, "Because I live, ye shall live also;" adding with a look of triumph, "I hold on to that!" These three were ready. There is no discharge in that war. Are you ready?

Napoleon and the Soldier.—On one Occasion, during the European wars at the close of the last century, the French army were resting, after a day of fierce fighting at Marengo, and Napoleon Bonaparte had placed his sentinels at different points of the camp. They were charged, on pain of death, to keep awake, and guard against being surprised by the enemy. About midnight Nalpoeon rose, and, walking round, found one of the sentinels asleep, his gun lying beside him. The soldier, no doubt, had been worn out by the terrible fatigue of the preceding day—but then the law must be obeyed; discipline must be kept up; the sentinel's duty must be done, or else he must die. What did the Emperor do? Softly and silently he took up the gun, put it on his own shoulder, and acted as sentinel till the dawn of day. When the soldier awoke he was filled with alarm at having left his duty undone, concluding that he was a lost man. But Napoleon (who had done this generous act from love to him as a soldier) simply handed back to him his gun, and bade him be more awake in future. In this case, "By the obedience of that one," the law was kept to the letter. And even thus the Lord Jesus took up our undone obedience, and by His life of spotless holiness in our room, fulfilled all righteousness for those who trust in Him.

THE GREAT SEARCH.

WHEN Kossuth came to this country about twenty years ago, so great was the enthusiasm for Hungary, that I remember the trees around the New York Battery were crowded with people who had climbed them to see the distinguished stranger as he passed. I shall never forget the scene. Indeed, if one be well poised, he cannot stand in a better place to see a passing crowd than in a tree-top.

Well, Christ was coming to Jericho, and there was a small man whose head did not come up to the shoulders of other people, who despaired of seeing the distinguished stranger while standing on a dead level; so he climbs up into a sycamore tree, broad-branched, stretching its arms clear across the highway, and sits there while Jesus advances. Christ, coming up with the great multitude, casts His eyes up, and sees the man on the branch of the sycamore tree, and says, "Come down;" and after the man has alighted, He says among other things to him, "The Son of Man is come to seek and save that which is lost."

Our sympathies are readily aroused when we see any thing that is lost. Even a dog that has wandered away from its master, we feel sorry for; or a bird that has escaped from its owner, we say poor thing. Going down the street near nightfall, in the teeth of the sharp north-west wind, you feel very pitiful for the one who has to be out. As you go along you hear

THE AFFRIGHTED CRY OF A CHILD.

You stop. You say, "What is the matter?" You go up, and you find that a little one has lost its way from home. In its excitement it cannot even tell its name or its residence. The group of people gathered around are all touched, all sympathetic, are all helpful. A plain body comes up, and with her plaid she wraps the child, and says, "I'll take care of the poor bairn," while in the same street a little way off, the crier goes through the city ringing a bell, uttering in a voice that sounds dolefully through all the alleys and byways of the city, "A lost child! three years of age; blue eyes, light hair; lost child!" Did you ever hear any such pathos as that ringing through the darkness?

You are on shipboard. You see against the sky a vessel; it comes nearer. You hoist a flag. It makes no response. You say, "What is the matter with the vessel?" You put the sea glass to your eye, and you find there is no one in the rigging, no one on the deck. "Ah!" you say, "I guess that must be an abandoned ship!" It comes on, falling over in the trough of the ocean. It floats every whither, tossed by the wild sea, and the crew say to the passengers, and the captain says to the mate, "It is a lost ship!"

You are going down the street, and you see a man that you know well. You once associated with him. You are astonished as you see him. "Why," you say, "he is all covered with the marks of sin. He must be in the very last stages of wickedness." And then you think of his lost home and say, "God pity his wife and child! God pity him." A lost man.

But, my friend, we are all lost! All we like sheep have gone astray, and the bell-man of heaven came out hunting up and down to find those who have missed their way, ringing through all the streets of the city and all the valleys and mountains of the earth the old Gospel-bell, "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

I am glad it is the Son of Man who has come to seek us. It is not one armed with thunderbolts, riding down the sky in ponderous chariots, to crush us; but the Son of Man, His nature just like our nature, with one exception; His infancy rocked in the cradle of a mother's arms; His boyhood spent in Nazareth, amid a boy's temptations; afterwards with blistered hands learning a trade; afterwards preaching, not with priest's gown, but in citizen's apparel; talking as brother talks with brother.

Oh, he was the Son of Man! He walked like a man; He slept like a man; He ate like a man; He drank like a man; He wept like a man; He suffered like a man; He was a man. He knew what sin and temptation are by personal contact, for He lived in a most abandoned village, and He moved around amid fishing villages, known in all ages for their vice, and in after years He preached in Jerusalem, a city which, though it had its temple, was worse than any of our American cities.

When Christ comes to-day, He comes not to a new world to make a discovery, but He comes to an old world, where He once lived—to a race whose nerves and muscles and bones and flesh were like those which He inhabited. Like us the cold chilled Him; like us fire warmed Him; like us betrayal exasperated Him. I warrant you that in that hostile and rough society He received many a kick and bruise and cuff that has never been recorded. I am glad to know that He comes in the fresh memory of His sorrows on earth, and of those thrilling night-scenes and day scenes of His early citizenship, to seek and to save that which was lost.

I. In the first place I remark that

WE ARE LOST TO HOLINESS.

Are you not all willing to take the Bible announcement that our nature is utterly ruined? Sin has broken in at every part of the castle. One would think that we got enough of it from our parents, whether they were pious or not; but we have taken the capital of sin with which our fathers and mothers started us, and we have by accumulation or by infernal compound interest made it enough to swamp us forever.

The heart is a battleground around which armed battalions sweep right and left; the ivory palace of the soul polluted with the filthy feet of all uncleanness. The Lord Jesus Christ comes to bring us back to holiness. He comes not to destroy us, but to take the consequences of our guilt. He breaks through the lacerating thorns and hedges to offer us clearance.

Here is a man who a few weeks ago said, "All is right with me; I am not willing to confess I am a sinner." Now the Spirit comes to his soul, and he feels himself to be so great a sinner that there is no mercy for him. When did he make the most accurate estimate? Now! "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked."

But, says some one in the audience, I have sinned so much I do not believe Christ will take me. Napoleon thought of going over into Italy. His friends laughed at him and said, "You never can get over the Alps. If you know any thing about the Alps, you know you never can get over them." Napoleon waved his hand and said, "There shall be no Alps." Then the road was built through the Simplon Pass, the wonder of following years.

We stand and see the mountain of our guilt. The obstacles seem so great that it is impossible for us to find a way into the peace and life of the Gospel, but Christ comes, and He waves His wounded hand, and cries, "There shall be no obstacles. I will come over the mountains of thy sin and the hills of thine iniquity."

Oh ye who have sinned, instead of flying away from Christ, if you only knew who it is that comes to save you you would fly no farther, but turn around, and while Christ seeks you, you would seek Christ, and this house would be a scene of a penitent sinner and a pardoning Saviour throwing each other's arms around each other's neck, while heaven could afford to stop half an hour and hang over the battlements gazing.

What is that flutter among the angels? Who is that horseman rushing through the city with quick dispatch? What is that announcement on the bulletins of heaven? I know what it is Christ has found that which was lost.

"Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindles new with fire;
The sinner lost is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre."

II. I remark, again, we are

LOST TO HAPPINESS,

and Christ comes to find us.

A caliph said, "I have been fifty years a caliph, and I have had all honors and all wealth, and yet in the fifty years I can count up only fourteen days of happiness." How many there are in this audience who cannot count fourteen days in all their life in which they had no vexations or annoyances!

We all feel a capacity for happiness that has never been tested. There are interludes of bliss, but whose entire life has been a continuous satisfaction? Why it is that most of the fine poems of the world are somehow descriptive o grief? It is because men know more about sorrow than they do about joy.

John Milton succeeds when he writes "Paradise Lost," but fails when he comes to writ "Paradise Regained." Dante's "Inferno" i a chime of horrors. Bryant's "Thanatopsis" i a poem of tears. Take the pathos out of th writings of Tennyson and Longfellow, and yo have taken three fourths of their power. Joh Ruskin writes his most effective passages abou the ruins of Venice.

The dog of bad news comes faster than th carrier-pigeon flies with good tidings. There ar flashes of satisfaction for the heart; but whos life has been a prolonged delight? The soul h four banks of keys, and the world does not kno how to play on such an elaborate instrument, b religion comes, and with her right hand sh touches the higher keys of the soul, and with h left hand the lower keys of the soul, and th sweeps them with the symphonies of heaven.

Oh, how many in this house have been stu and plagued! Had it not been for risking yo eternal interests some of you would have put end to the scene of earthly suffering with yo own hand. A deep undertone of sadness ro through your soul. You would be willing n to give up your money and your social positio and all you have achieved, for one day the peace which the good old slave express when he said with broken language: "In ow ing Christ I seem to own every thing. The air mine, for I can breathe it; the sunshine is mi for I can sit in it; the earth is mine, for I can down on it; the heaven is mine, for I am go to it." To have something of that compl satisfaction which belongs to the humblest God's children, you would give almost any thi

Oh, ye who are struck through with unr Christ comes to-day to give you rest. If Ch comes to you, you will be independent of worldly considerations. It was so with Christian man who suffered for his faith, was thrust down into the coal-hole of the Bis of London. He said, "We have had fine ti here, singing gladsome songs the night long. God! forgive me for being so unworthy of glory."

More joyful in the hour of suffering martyrdom was Rose Allen. When the pr cutor put a candle under her wrist and hel there until the sinews snapped she said, "If see fit, you can burn my feet next and then head." Christ once having taken you into custody and guardianship, you can laugh at and persecution and trial.

ust as sometimes a child is so sick that it can- lie any longer in the cradle, and the mother to take it up, so sometimes the Lord's chil- n are so troubled that they cannot lie easy where but in God's lap, and He bends over m and sings this sweet lullaby, "As one om His mother comforteth, so will I comfort ."

"he soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose ill not, I will not, desert to his foes;
t soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake, never, no, never, no, never forsake."

II. Again I remark that we are

LOST TO HEAVEN,

Christ comes to take us there. I cannot gine any thing more distressful than, without ing any musical taste, to sit and listen to an torio for two hours and a half. Though it be best of oratorios, if a man have no musical e it is a distress to him, while it is a joy to ers. And I cannot imagine any thing more ressful for a man who has no love for pic- s than to be shut up in the Luxemburg Gal- in Paris. Yes, I can think of one thing se than that, and that will be for a man to er heaven without any taste for it.

sometimes hear people talk as though all a n had to do was just to leave this world, and into heaven and sit down to its enjoyments. a man cannot stand Christian society here one day, how would he stand a million years it? I see an unregenerate soul going into ry. It enters heaven, looks around, and sees there, and angels there, and hears the cry: oly! Holy!" and the unregenerate soul s, "This is no place for me," and he flies to battlements and he cries: "I can stand it e no longer," and he leaps off into outer dark- s. In other words, the worst hell for a man ld be heaven if he had no preparation for it.

ut Christ comes to take the discord out of r soul and string it with a heavenly attuning. comes to take out that from us which makes unlike heaven, and substitute that which as- ilates us.

en thousand times the gate of heaven has ng back and forth, but it never swung back forth save as Christ opened it, and you will in through Him, or not at all. Christ wants there. How do I know it? Suppose a man t a diamond, and he looked for it eight or ten rs, would you not conclude from the fact that looked for it so long that he wanted the dia- nd!

nd when I find Christ seeking for your soul, king for it, ever since it has been a soul— king for it by day and by night—seeking for hrough heat and through cold—seeking for it h tears in His eyes, and blood on His brow, scourges on His back, and a world of agony His heart. I know that it is because He nts to find you.

h, He has prepared a glorious heaven for . It is all ready. Not merely a throne, but ps by which to mount it. Not only a harp, a song to play on it. Not only a bannered cession, but a victory which it is to cele- te. God wants no vacant chairs at that ban- et. He does not want those who stand around m in glory to wonder why you have not been icited. He does not want the Book of Life thunder "Shut" till your name is in it.

hat do I breathe? It is the fragance of Him ose garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces. What do I hear? It is the footstep of Him who comes with worn sandals in the journey from Bethlehem to Nazareth, and from Nazareth to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem to Golgotha, and from Golgotha to glory, and from glory here, seeking that which is lost.

Oh, jostle Him not from thy doorstep. Do not drive this Christ away as though He were an unworthy beggar soliciting alms. Hear His voice; trust His sacrifice; respond to His love; take His heaven. Do you not know, O man! O woman! that you are the lost one spoken of in my text? The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

You may hide away from Him; but there are some things which will find you, whether Christ by His grace finds you or not. Trouble will find you; death will find you; the judgment will find you; eternity will find you.

Even you will be gone from all these scenes, and if a thousand men should come out with lanterns and torches and St. Bernard dogs used to hunting up missing travellers, and search for your soul, you could not be found by them. The grave will have your body. Your heirs will have your estate. Eternity will have your soul. In a flash of a second your last opportunity for heaven may go out. Postpone this question of the soul, and you are postponing getting into the last life-boat that shall put out from the wreck for the beach ere the hulk lurch over and go down.

God forbid that any of you should at the last have the dismay of

of whom I was reading. One night she could not sleep because of her soul's wandering from Christ. She got up and wrote in her diary, "One year from now, I will attend to the matters of my soul." She retired, but could not sleep. So she arose again and wrote a better promise in her diary, "One month from now, I will attend to the matters of my soul." She retired again, but found no sleep, and arose again and wrote, "Next week I will attend to the matters of my soul." Then she slept soundly. The next day she went into scenes of gayety. The following day she was sick, and the middle of next week she died.

Delirium lifted from her mind just long enough for her to say, "I am a week too late. I am lost!" Oh, to be a year too late, or a month too late, or a week too late, or a day too late, or a minute too late, or a second too late, is to be forever too late. May God Almighty by His grace keep us from the wild, awful, rushing catastrophe of a ruined soul!

THE SERMONS OF DR. TALMAGE PUBLISHED FROM WEEK TO WEEK IN THIS JOURNAL ARE VERBATIM AND UNABRIDGED REPORTS. BY ARRANGEMENT WITH DR. TALMAGE, THEY ARE SUBMITTED TO HIM, PRIOR TO PUBLICATION, FOR CORRECTION AND REVISION.

A Clerk's Pride Rebuked.—In Scotland there is a branch of the legal profession known as "Writers to the Signet." A young gentleman was apprenticed to one of these writers. The youth thought himself a very fine sort of person, much above ordinary apprentices. One evening the master desired him to carry a bundle of papers to a lawyer whose residence was not far off. The packet was received in silence, and a minute after the master saw a porter run into the outer office. In a few minutes the youth walked out, followed by the porter carrying the parcel.

Seizing his hat the master followed, and overtaking the porter, relieved him of the packet and walked in the rear of the apprentice. The lawyer's house being reached and the door-bell rung, the youth called out, "Here, fellow, give me the parcel!" and slipped a sixpence in his hand without looking round. "Here it is for you!" exclaimed a voice which caused the youth to turn round. His confusion, as he beheld his master, made him speechless. Never after that was he above his business.

DEATH OF MADAME BONAPARTE.

A ROMANTIC and eventful life closed at Baltimore April 4th, when a lady allied to a historic family died in that city at the advanced age of ninety-four. She was the widow of Jerome Bonaparte, the youngest brother of Napoleon Bonaparte, the famous Emperor of the French, the terror of whose name filled Europe for many years, and who was conquered at the battle of Waterloo in 1815.

It was at the house of Samuel Chase, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, that Madame Bonaparte first met the man who afterwards became her husband, when he was visiting this country in 1803. He conceived an ardent love for her, and though the match was opposed by the friends of both the lady and the gentleman, he eventually married her December 24th, 1803.

The newly-married couple, fearing the displeasure of Napoleon, remained in America until 1805, when they sailed for France. Napoleon was so much incensed against his brother on account of his marriage that he refused permission for Madame Bonaparte to enter France, and Jerome accordingly set out alone for Paris to intercede with the Emperor. But he proving inexorable, Madame Bonaparte reluctantly returned to America with her infant son. Her husband, Jerome Bonaparte, ingratiated himself with his brother, who made him King of Westphalia, a small kingdom carved out of the Emperor's German conquests, and though a handsome income was settled on Madame Bonaparte, the separation from her husband was final.

In 1860 King Jerome Bonaparte died, but the connection of Madame Bonaparte with the French Court was renewed; for her son Jerome enjoyed the friendship of his cousin, Napoleon III., who wished him to reside permanently in France, but he declined, preferring to settle in America. He married an American lady, by whom he had two sons, now living, and who were present at the deathbed of their grandmother. Madame Bonaparte's son died 1870, and on his death his mother went into comparative retirement.

Those who knew Madame Bonaparte in her later days describe her as a lively, vivacious lady, very imperious and haughty, but withal very affable to her acquaintance. She had, during a long life, given no evidence of religious feeling, though she indignantly repelled the charge of atheism more than once made against her.

It was on March 28th, while on her deathbed, that she requested her attendants to invite a minister of the Gospel to pray with her. Dr. Leyburne, of the First Presbyterian Church, was soon by her bedside, and subsequently Mr. Moody came, both of whom she cordially welcomed. She had been a constant reader of the Bible, and when Mr. Moody reminded her that "the blood of Christ washes away all sins," she readily assented, and said, "Yes, that is in the Bible." On his quoting from the hymn, "Just as I am, without one plea," she once more assented, and said, "Yes, Christ's blood cleanses all our sins."

This glorious truth, so precious to the hearts of God's children in all ages and in all times, we may hope found at the last an entrance to her soul, and imparted to her last moments "the peace of God which passes all understanding." Her life had been full of ambitious hopes and schemes for attaining worldly rank and position, but she had found them, as so many others have done, all "vanity and vexation of spirit." So at the close of her troubled career she gladly welcomed a humble evangelist, who could tell her of the Great Saviour, who said, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The same glorious truths which Mr. Moody has proclaimed to thousands of anxious sinners were suited to the weary soul of the widow of a king, and no other message was needed at that bedside. The blood of Jesus is the one precious theme for the ears of dying sinners.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE AT MILDMAY PARK, LONDON.

THE WORLD TO GROW WORSE UNTIL CHRIST'S SECOND ADVENT.

By the Rev. Gordon Calthrop, Vicar of St. Augustine's Church, London.

All Christians expect the Establishment of a Kingdom of God, but differ as to the means by which it is to be brought about—Two Views presented—Not by Existing Agencies, but the Lord's Personal Coming—Jewish Tribulation lasts to the End of the Times of the Gentiles—Failure of Faith—Connection of Christ's Coming and Jewish Restoration—The Personal Antichrist—Modern Atheism.

I SUPPOSE I may say that all students of Scripture, whatever their views may be, and who seek for the teaching of God's Holy Spirit, expect ultimately the establishment of a Kingdom of God. They look for the fulfilment of those bright and glowing predictions of the ancient prophets. They are anticipating the time when the wilderness shall blossom as the rose, and when the knowledge of our God in Christ shall cover the earth, even as the waters cover the sea. At the same time there may be, and we know that there is, amongst excellent Christian people a very great diversity of opinion as to the method by which God intends and purposes to accomplish this great result.

Some think that it is to be brought about by the expansion of existing agencies, by the dissemination of the Scriptures, by greater diligence and earnestness on the part of Christian people generally, and by a larger outpouring of the Holy Spirit of God granted to the churches in answer to their prayer. There are others who would look to different causes for the accomplishment of this great result—to what the world would call

"AN EXCEPTIONAL INTERFERENCE IN HUMAN AFFAIRS"

—even the personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, ushering in a new dispensation with all its wondrous privileges and all the mysterious power with which the people of God will then be invested.

There are, then, these two views before us. If the former be adopted, we shall naturally look for a general advancement in religion, so that when our blessed Master comes to take account of His servants He shall find in a very true sense, faith on the earth. If the latter opinion be accepted, it seems to follow that we should expect almost the reverse of this—not advancement, but to a very great extent retrogression in spiritual things—at all events the growth of antagonism to the Lord Jesus Christ, assuming at last such a portentous form that His personal interposition becomes absolutely necessary.

Now, it is my object to endeavor to put reasons before you to show that the second view is that which has the warrant of Holy Scripture. In Matt. 24 we have a long series of statements, all of which most manifestly apply to the coming of our Lord, and in verse 29 we read, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken : and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven."

And if we put Matthew 24 and Luke 21 together, we find it is tribulation up to the time when the days of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled and the Lord shall come. And if it be tribulation, or a period that is expressed only by such a striking epithet, how can it be that blessed and prosperous time, that time of increase and of advancement and bright experience, which some are led to expect? It has always seemed to me that there is intended to be in our Lord's mind and purpose a correspondence between the circumstances that preceded His first coming to Jerusalem and the circumstances which are to precede His second coming, which we anticipate, and the anticipation of which has brought us together now. And from His wonderful discourse in Matthew 24, you have no reason to expect a happy state of things at the second coming, but rather the reverse : the love of many waxing cold, parents and children rising against each other, and but simply preached for a witness amongst all nations.

Now please look at Luke 18 : 8. Our Lord says, "Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh shall He find faith on the earth?" That seems to imply that He will not ; and yet, if the world's blessed millennium is to precede the Second Coming of Christ, would it be a natural thing for the Lord to say, "When He cometh shall He find faith on the earth?" Of course He would, on that supposition, find faith prevalent. The unbelieving, at least, would be in the minority, and the knowledge of the Lord would cover the earth. Could He then have used such an expression?

I pass to another point. If you refer to Acts 3 : 19, Peter is there preaching his second sermon to the Jews. He says, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and He shall send Jesus Christ." Many here must be aware that that is a mistaken translation, which causes the force of the passage to be lost. It should read thus : "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out in order that (a very different thing) the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord," etc.

Peter, like his fellow apostles on the Mount of Ascension, connected these times of refreshing and the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ with the conversion of His people, and he prayed then and there, with all the intensity of his passionate nature, those who had rejected Him, to accept Him, to repent and be converted, that their sin of crucifying his Lord and Master might be blotted out, so that at once the great day to which he was looking forward might come. We are agreed that even the Apostles did not see every thing in its full meaning, and that that meaning was gradually unfolding itself to them ; but I believe Peter really expected that if the effect of his sermon were such as he desired, and they were brought to the knowledge of God by the power of the Holy Spirit, that the great times of refreshing would come.

You see then that Peter distinctly connected the times of refreshing and the coming of Jesus Christ with

THE CONVERSION OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE.

And that seems to have been what the Apostles expected on the Mount of Ascension : "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Now turn to Rom. 11 : 15 : "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" The apostle was expecting a glorious time when the state of the world shall not be what it is now. Now it is a valley of dead and dry bones. He is expecting a better and more glorious time, when these dead, dry bones shall have flesh and sinews put upon them, and the breath breathed into them by the Spirit of God. And they shall stand up an exceeding great army to the praise and glory of God ; but he connects that, with the restoration and conversion of the Jews.

Now connect that, with what is said in Zechariah, and I suppose we must (as has been said here by one veteran student of prophecy, whose praise is in all the churches) take the literal interpretation if possible, and so, if not driven from that, you must adopt it. Doing this, then, some of us conceive that the conversion of the Jewish people is not to be accomplished by ordinary agencies, but by the appearance in person of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the Mount of Olives, when He shall come and they shall look on Him whom they have pierced, and the nation arranged according to its tribes shall gather together, and mourn, and accept Him as their long rejected Messiah.

Putting all these things together, it is only by the return of the Lord Jesus Christ that we expect these great things for the world at large spoken of in the ancient prophecy.

Still further, turn to 2 Thess. 2 : 8, 9, 10. I venture to think that the apostle is speaking here of the appearance in the world at some future period of a man who shall be an embodiment of power—or the Wilful One. I venture to think that the state of things in which we find ourselves in the present day has been well called "perilous days." It indicates that in that Man of Sin the incarnation of sin—a man of vast intellectua power and inspired by the prince of the power o the air—we shall have the culmination of th tendencies of the times in which we live.

One does not want to be an alarmist. We ar not going to raise a howl over it. We are perfectly satisfied. We know what is to be expected, and are agreed that whatever influence th sceptical and unbelieving tendencies of the da may produce upon unstable minds and thos who do not belong to the Lord Jesus Chris they will not have the power to touch one hai of a single true child of God. We are all agree upon that. We can look at it with perfect calmness, but at the same time you will agree wit me, I know, that the last twenty-five years ha witnessed a most marvellous intellectual develo ment in antagonism to the Christ of God.

Following out the principle of developmen which is perfectly true in spiritual as well as i temporal things, it is conceivable that perhaps no great distance of time all this may gather u and culminate in one great personal antagonist t the Lord Jesus Christ, so that when He com again He will find a human antagonist who He will destroy with the brightness of His cor ing and with the spirit of His mouth.

This antagonist will be a man of such pow that he will be able to work lying wonders, a to exercise no common influence over the worl He will be a man of such gigantic intellect a such influence over his fellow-creatures, th gathering, no doubt, an enormous following, is to make worse and worse the times before t appearing of Christ. I cannot help concludi that they must be worse : "Evil men and sed ers will wax worse and worse."

PROGRESS OF ATHEISM.

One of the most marvellous features of t present day is the calmness with which you a I are obliged to contemplate Atheism. A f years ago, or when I was a young man, the at ist used to be a man under the ban of societ but atheistic writers now profess their opini in the face of day as boldly and plainly as th speak of their stature or the color of their ha and without the least degree of shame, t rather the reverse.

Their writings appear in popular periodic preaching distinct, uncompromising infidelit denying, flatly, fully, and plainly, the existe of a personal God; and these are men holdi high positions in society, and generally respe ed !

I say that one of the most strange featu of the present day is that we Christians obliged to take this as an accepted fact, t there are men in leading positions, men w are regarded with respect, who simply deny existence of a Divine Being.

And all this seems to indicate that the stre is tending in the direction which Paul poin out, and at a certain time it will all culmin in a person who will stand before men as avowed intellectual antagonist of the Chris God, but who will be destroyed by the sp of His mouth and the brightness of His c ing.

It seems to me that the view I have endea ed to recommend does not paralyze Chris effort, but has the contrary effect—for this son. We look as the greatest agency of al the coming of our Lord and Master, but we believe that it is in the power of the Chris Church to hasten the time of His coming.

OUR LORD'S PROPHECIES.

By the Rev. Andrew Fausset, the Commentator.

Address at the Conference, Mildmay Park, London, March 4.

'On Earth Peace," yet to be fulfilled—Jewish Unbelief Postponed the Kingdom—The Prophecy of Zech. 9:9—Predictions of False Prophet and of the Antichrist—He will Sit in the Rebuilt Jewish Temple—Unclean Spirits now at Work—Intense Worldliness and Scarcity of Faith—The First Resurrection—The Church and the Great Tribulation.

WHEN our blessed Saviour was born into this world of sin, the angels sang, "Glory be to God in the highest, and on earth peace." A philosopher was lecturing some two years ago at Christmas-time, and he sneered at these words as though they were belied by the facts of existing wars, and as though the vision that was seen by the shepherds was but an hallucination of the mind.

But such philosophers as this one forget the homely but true saying, that "children and fools cannot see half-finished works." In other words, they are but imperfect judges of works that are half completed. They also unconsciously are fulfilling the Word of the Master, "For that evil servant shall say, My Lord delayeth His coming, but the Master shall come at such a time as that servant looketh not for Him, and shall cut Him off."

When John the Baptist announced as the forerunner, the coming of our Lord, the language he used (like the language of the Old Testament prophets) seemed to imply that the Kingdom was about to appear: "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." But the prophecies of the Old Testament generally seemed to predict the first coming of Christ in connection with His promised glorious reign over the earth. How, then, are we to account for it that His kingdom did not immediately appear?

Our Lord supplies the answer in the words, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen doth gather her chickens under her wing, and ye would not! Behold! your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord."

These words indicate that the unbelief of the Jews caused the postponement of Christ's Kingdom upon earth, and we have a remarkable analogy to this in the case of Israel and Canaan in Deut. 1 : 21. The commandment of the Lord was "Behold the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee; go up and possess it." And why did they not? Because of their unbelief.

There was another reason also for the postponement of the kingdom of the Lord, and the non-fulfilment at that time of the words "on earth peace." It was that Satan might have his time to do his utmost against, first Christ, and then the kingdom and Church of Christ. The victory of Jesus over Satan is not to be a victory of Almighty strength, but a victory of love, of righteousness; but from the very first the Lord anticipated that Satan would fall, and accordingly when the seventy came in, saying, "Behold the spirits are subject to us at Thy Word," Jesus said, "I beheld Satan like lightning fall from heaven."

And, again, at the time when Satan was about (seemingly) to have his triumph over the Lord at Calvary, and when He said, "Now is your hour, and the power of darkness"—at that very time Jesus exclaimed, "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the Prince of this world be cast out."

When Jesus was born the song was "Peace on earth." When the palm-bearing multitude escorted Jesus into Jerusalem, their triumphal cry was, "Peace in heaven;" and in Rev. 7 : 9 we see that there shall be the anti-typical palm-bearing multitude which no man can number, that they shall then sing salvation to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and then, and not till then, both peace on earth and peace in heaven shall be combined: and Satan shall be bound for a thousand years, and ultimately consigned to the lake of fire forever and ever.

There was a fulfilment, at Christ's first coming of the first part of the prophecy, in Zech. 9 : 9, 10, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold thy King cometh unto thee: He is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass."

The evangelist quotes these words as fulfilled in our Lord's entry into Jerusalem. But the rest of this prophecy, which is given in the succeeding ninth verse, still awaits its fulfilment at the triumphant second coming of Christ, when He will cut off His enemies and reign over the earth.

"And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle bow shall be cut off and He shall speak peace unto the heathen; and His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth."

And now I come to the testimony of the Lord Jesus Christ concerning Antichrist. You will observe in our Lord's prophetic statements germs which are expanded in subsequent statements, whether by St. Paul, or St. John in Revelation. He says in that remarkable prophecy in Matt. 24, "there shall be false Christs and false prophets, and they shall show signs and wonders to deceive if it were possible the very elect."

And St. Paul, in 2 Thess. 2, distinctly speaks of the man of sin, the lawless one, that is coming "after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders." But it is only if it were possible, that they can deceive the very elect.

The elect fall back upon the sure word of God. Let men bring before us all the signs and spiritualistic wonders they may, we fall back upon the Word of God, and taking Deut. 12 as our authority, we say, "If a prophet giveth thee a sign or a wonder, saying, Let us go after other gods, thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, but thou shalt destroy that prophet."

Because we fall back upon the living word, no miracle can ever lead us from the course of truth, and unless those signs be in accordance with the Word of the living God we reject and authoritatively reject them.

ONE OF THE FALSE PROPHETS

predicted in our Lord's prophecy in Matthew 24 corresponds with the second beast or false prophet mentioned in Rev. 13 : 16, 19, who is to minister to the first beast, and work signs and lying wonders to make men worship the first beast, who will be an individual Antichrist. Christ foretold this Antichrist's manifestation in John 5 : 43: "I am come in My Father's name and ye receive Me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. There He distinctly foretells an individual deceiver.

This Antichrist is to be connected with the future rebuilt Jewish temple, according to our Lord's prophecy in Matthew 24: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand), then let them which be in Judæa flee into the mountains."

We find in 2 Thess. 2, the same truth comes out, viz., that the individual Antichrist will sit in the temple of God at Jerusalem, and will show himself as God—"the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place where it ought not." Jeremiah (30 : 7) speaks of the same time of great tribulation: "Alas! for that day is great so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it." Here we have it clearly marked that the former Roman siege of Jerusalem is not the time foretold in that passage, because Israel was not saved out of it.

But in that last coming tribulation, not only that passage from Jer. 30, but also Zechariah 13 : 14, distinctly foretells that Israel shall be saved out of it, that the Lord Himself shall interpose, that His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, and that He shall save His people in the days of their greatest trouble, and then will be ushered in that glorious period when there shall be and when the sword shall forever be broken.

And then we have another prophecy of our blessed Saviour, in Matthew 12 : 43-45, about the unclean spirit going out of a man, but returning with seven spirits more wicked than himself, and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

This is the germ of a prediction given more fully in Revelation 16 : 13, of "three unclean spirits of demons working miracles and going forth from the dragon, beast, and false prophet, to gather the kings of the earth and of the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty."

Notwithstanding the great Protestant Reformation in Luther's time and the subsequent wide preaching of the Gospel, the unclean spirit of Pagan idolatry, that once seemed to be cast out of Europe, has returned with other seven spirits more wicked than itself, the spirits of formalism, worldliness, hypocrisy, rationalism, infidelity, superstition, and spiritual deception; and the last state of Christendom threatens to be worse than the first. These are perilous times. Iniquity is abounding, and the love of many is waxing cold.

The present epoch is characterized by intense worldiness, which is the very state of things predicted by our Lord, when He said that as it was in the days of Noah before the flood and in the days of Lot before the destruction of Sodom, so shall it be in the days of the Second Coming of the Son of Man.

And our Lord foretells the scarcity of faith at His Second Advent in the words, "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth." These words occur in Luke 18, in the parable of the importunate widow earnestly waiting to be avenged upon her adversary; for in the final tribulation the Christian Church will be waiting upon her Lord day and night, that He may avenge her cause.

Our Lord also refers to the deliverance of His Church out of the midst of the latter-day time of trouble in the passage, "Watch and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things that shall come to pass and stand before the Son of Man" (Luke 21 : 36). Observe! It is implied that the elect of the Church shall, through watchfulness and prayer, escape at least the most violent fury of the final tribulation and stand before the Son of Man.

Then there is Christ's testimony as to the first resurrection. He distinctly says, "When thou makest a feast, invite the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind. They are not able to recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed in the resurrection of the just." And again, in Luke 20, "They that shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead," i.e., the first resurrection, consisting only of the righteous, the very thing that Paul desired. "If by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead." And then He speaks of them as children of God and, therefore, also children of the resurrection.

O brethren, I do believe that we are rapidly coming to that final consummation! Already we see unwonted evangelical efforts at home and abroad, and the time nearly accomplished during which the Gospel shall be preached as a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come. We are patiently waiting for that which the Lord has promised, and He is Himself expecting, until His enemies become His footstool. We, His Church, are expecting to be with Him.

A husband once said he would rather live in a garret with his wife than in a palace without her; so our hope and joy is that we look for Christ's coming, and we echo the inspired truth where Jesus says, "Surely I come quickly," and we say, looking for that blessed hope, "Even so come, Lord Jesus."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

In Congress, the Appropriation Bills are still under debate, the clauses relating to the presence of National soldiers at the polls being hotly contested by the Republican party. It was urged that the connection of this matter with a financial was wholly irrelevant, but on this point the Republicans were overruled on the ground that it involved an expenditure of National funds.

The President is said to have expressed his intention of vetoing the bill even if it comes to him tacked to a money bill, being convinced that circumstances may arise in which the presence of military at the polls is absolutely necessary to insure a fair election, and that this measure is only the commencement of an attack on other important election laws.

President Hayes has been asked what he will do if Congress adjourned again without passing the Appropriation bills and he were left without funds to carry on Government. He is reported to have replied that it would not come to that. "The Democrats," he said, "have only five majority in the House, and that majority will melt away before the point suggested is reached." The Democratic plan, as he had heard it explained, was to adjourn the Congress and leave the President to meet the emergency when the money gives out. But he will not have to meet it alone, for if such a time ever comes the Congress will be there to meet it with him. The Constitution gives the President ample power to convene Congress on any extraordinary occasion, no matter whether it is absent on account of the final adjournment of the session, or because a long recess has been taken; and when the new fiscal year begins, Congress will be here to answer the demand of the people.

Twenty-four Hundred School Children were saved out of a position of no little danger on April 3d, by discipline and courage, when Grammar School No. 17, in Forty-seventh street, New York, being on fire, the whole of the children were quietly marched out of the burning building without panic or disorder. One of the teachers first noticed a filmy line of smoke curling around the slate of a six-years-old child, and small forks of flame shooting up from beneath the children's seats. The children, frightened, rose up; the teacher quickly ordered them to sit down, and down they sat. The principal was quietly sent for, who said, "Children, I want you to follow me without any disorder," which they did, and in a few minutes afterwards a stream of fire shot out in the rooms just vacated. On the third floor was the grammar school, the occupants of which were in still greater danger. Before all could leave the smoke had filled the room, and the fire was on the stairways that were built as fire escapes. One by one the girls were passed down, those of Jewish birth showing especial coolness under such trying circumstances. There were two lame girls in the school, and as their crutches brought them to the head of the stairway some of their companions fell back and others twined their arms tenderly around them, and so conveyed them safely into the street. The courage of teachers and children was alike remarkable; one little fellow of ten, sent from one class-room to another to fetch a slate, on coming back said to his teacher, "Teacher, there's a fire in the school, but don't say anything about it." Such is the value of long training in habits of discipline and order.

A Wholesale Negro Exodus from the Southern to the Western States—chiefly Kansas—has for some time past been in progress. The negroes give as their reasons for emigrating that they are not allowed by the white population to exercise their political rights in the South, and that while hiring land, and paying rent to their white landlords with the proceeds of their crops, they do not receive a fair equivalent for their labor. Another element of difficulty in the matter consists in the agreement that the negroes shall purchase such provisions as they need from the owners of the land, and as they make a free use of their credit, and have no skill in accounts, they are apt to find at the end of the year that their crops are not sufficient to pay their debts.

The emigration which has now assumed enormous proportions, and is called in the South the "Negro stampede," or "Kansas fever," does not appear to be carried on by any one central organization, but by a number of independent associations, the first of which was formed at Nashville in 1869, by Columbus M. Johnson, a middle-aged, intelligent colored man, who has achieved some distinction in Republican politics. At first the movement thus inaugurated was not attended with much success, attempts being made to purchase small farms in Tennessee, so that the colored men should become owners of the land they tilled; but of late the attention of the negroes has been turned towards Kansas, and the different railway companies have been offering extraordinary inducements to settlers. Owing to the poverty of very many of the emigrants, much suffering has been endured by them. Great efforts, however, appear to have been made at St. Louis to give shelter and food to the needy en route to their destination, the scenes at which city, and other points on the Mississippi River, are described as not unlike those at Castle Garden, New York, some years ago, when the tide of European emigration was at its height.

A Congregational Minister in Michigan writes to us of his last visit to one of his parishioners: "She had been suffering extremely for several months, and could not lie in bed, owing to the difficulty of breathing. While I sat by her bedside, she said to her husband, 'I want you to bring me the Bible.' But she was too weak to turn over the sacred pages and find the cherished verse. I said, 'Tell me what portion you desire to find?' She answered, 'For to me to live is Christ.' I found the chapter, and laid the Bible before her; she read, as distinctly as her sufferings would permit, the whole verse in Philip. 1 : 21, and then looking at me said, 'I wish you to preach my funeral sermon from this text.' I was somewhat surprised at her fearlessness in death, when she looked steadfastly at me and said, 'I am ready to die;' 'My Saviour has gone to prepare mansions for me;' 'All is well;' 'I shall go to be with Christ, and the loved ones on the other side.' I prayed with her, especially thanking God for the triumphs of a living faith, and steadfast hope in Jesus Christ, and commended her spirit into His hands; then bade her farewell, until we meet in the future. A few hours after, her spirit passed quietly away to the presence and glory of Christ."

The Wages of Sin.—On March 26th a haggard woman, dressed in rags and covered with filth, begged for a night's lodging at one of the police stations in New York City. She was recognized as Fannie Wright, who on the 19th of October, 1867, stabbed and instantly killed Officer Robert McChesney at the corner of Canal and Mercer Streets. The trial attracted considerable interest at the time, and revealed the secrets of a lifetime. Fannie Wright was then twenty-six years old. She was the daughter of a respectable Poughkeepsie family, which she had fled from when quite young to abandon herself to a career of vice. When the news of her arrest reached her family they made a strong effort in her behalf, but she was eventually sent to State Prison. After two years' confinement her family induced the Governor to sign her pardon. Nothing has been heard of her since till the other day she emerged from obscurity, a worn-out, emaciated wreck of a woman. How often do we find the Divine declaration verified that "the way of transgressors is hard" (Prov. 13 : 15).

An Interesting Scene was Witnessed two or three Sabbaths ago in the church at Hamilton, Conn., Dr. J. B. Merwin, pastor. Twenty-two persons were baptized, thirty-three were received on probation, and all partook together of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The revival interest continues unabated. The young men and women of the congregation, almost without exception, have given their hearts to the Lord.

The International Sunday-school Lesson List for 1880 has just been published. It will be borne in mind that 1879 concludes the first seven years' course of Bible study, and that a new course, as arranged by the Lesson Committee appointed at Atlanta in April, 1878, begins with 1880. Hitherto the Old Testament lessons have had the first part of the year, and the New Testament lessons the latter part. Now this order is reversed. For 1880 the first six months are given to lessons in Matthew, the last six to Genesis. Only eleven lessons are designated for each quarter, instead of twelve as hitherto. This leaves the twelfth Sunday for review, and the thirteenth for superintendents to use as they think best.

Dr. Pentecost, the well-known Evangelist, has returned to Chicago, and is holding meetings on the North Side. His sprained ankle compels him to go upon crutches, but this does not seem to hinder his power to preach. Sunday evening he Grace Methodist Church and the "Moody Church" Tabernacle were both crowded to over- lowing, Mr. Pentecost managing to preach at both places the same evening. The pastors in hat part of the city, after abundant conference and a good understanding with each other, are joining earnestly in the work.

An Imprecation and an Apology were the esults of the offer of a tract lately. A gentleman who makes a practice of giving away tracts ays: "Yesterday I offered a man a tract with he caption, 'Do You Pray?' He very abruptly ttered a terrible malediction, expressing a fear- ul wish. 'Brother,' I replied, 'pray the Lord to ave you from that doom.' With those words I eft him. Presently he came to my side and sked me to forgive him. Brethren, I believe he man's heart was touched. Pray for him."

Daily Whiskey and Hard Times.—In a Sermon at Baltimore, recently, on the Lord's rayer, Mr. Moody, touching incidentally upon he hard times, said: "We hear a great deal of alk about hard times, but what has caused them? in. Look at the money that is spent in this reat country for whiskey alone. We don't say o God, 'Give us this day our daily whiskey,' do e? I tell you there are mints of money spent or whiskey that ought to feed children's mouths ith bread. The fact of the case is, this nation as been too prosperous. The Jews, the chosen eople of God, never could stand prosperity. As oon as they got rich they went to worshipping ols, and whenever they got fat, they began to ck against God. I fea American morals suffer proportion as the nation prospers."

A Drunkard Reformed by his Wife.—A gifted ntleman married a beautiful and accomplished dy. She was the choice of his parents, but as, however, not his choice. His heart was led with the image of a bright blue-eyed aiden who lived not far off, but the impassable rrier of poverty was between them, and he ietly submitted to the parental wishes. A ort time after the marriage he sought to drown e discontent of his heart by draughts from the ceitful cup. Time after time he would enter s beautiful cottage home, so intoxicated that could scarcely stand, and as he came in he en expected to be met with cold repulse and ter reproaches; but, on the contrary, a deli- e fair hand was always extended to steady his ggering footsteps, and, though tears often ade more radiant the sweet brown eyes that oked up tenderly into his face, no words but of ntle welcome greeted his ear.

Matters went on in this way for three or four onths; every influence was brought to bear on him that promised the least success in his ormation, but without avail. Finally, one d night he came home too much intoxicated ascend the steps that led into the porch of his elling, and in endeavoring to do so, fell. The und of his falling upon the steps reached the es of his wife, who was patiently awaiting his urn in the dining-room, where she had kept a ely vigil, that his supper might be in proper dition when he returned. With all the ed her strength could command, she rushed to the door, and as she opened it and the glare of light fell upon his upturned face, she fancied he was dead, and with a wail that pierced his soul to the quick, though stupefied as he was by spirits, she threw herself upon his breast.

The shock this scene gave him rapidly dispelled the effects of the spirits, and he tried to soothe his wife, who soon regained her composure when she found that matters were not as she apprehended. But it was the last time that he drank any kind of spirits. He "could not bear," he said, "a particle more weight of gratitude than Annie had laid upon him; it was almost crushing him already." Had she treated him differently, he might to-day be filling a drunkard's grave.

A Loose Foundation.—A Farmer in Toronto is reported to have found one morning, not many weeks ago, that a section of his farm had dropped deep into the earth during the night. An acre or more of the land had sunk nearly forty feet, and the tops of the trees were just visible on a level with the surface. This forcibly illustrates the fact that all righteousness, which has not the solid foundation of Christ's death, will sooner or later disappear and come to nothing.

A Coincidence of Opinion on Biblical Revision has occurred. It is generally known that the revision of the English Bible now going on is conducted by committees in Britain and America, who exchange their results. In one case both the New Testament companies were at the same time on the same book. When notes were compared it was found that of 913 changes made by one party, 476 had been made by the other, acting independently. A similar coincidence was observed in the case of the Old Testament companies when they were at work independently.

The Death of Dr. Charles Jewett, the distinguished temperance lecturer, is announced. His loss will be severely felt by the temperance party in this country.

A Soul's Crisis while Going Aloft.—A Sailor, the child of many parental prayers, gave the following experience at a Sailors' Home meeting: One stormy night, out on the wide Atlantic, when the vessel was pitching frightfully, he was ordered to go aloft. Ordinarily, even in tempestuous weather, the command would not have troubled him, but two days before a shipmate had fallen from the same giddy height into the sea and perished. This accident had exerted a solemnizing influence on the minds of all. As the speaker ascended, God's Spirit began to strive with him. The thought came into his mind what would become of his immortal soul if a like fate befell him. For a time he was almost overcome with alarm, as conscience told him, too surely, that all would not be well with him. His reflections, however, in that perilous post, were blessed to his conversion, for in a week's time he found the Saviour.

Warned Too Late.—A Youth was Ill with consumption. All the family were thoughtless of the things of life eternal. The parents had no faith in future retribution. They were unwilling to have their son alarmed regarding his condition, or troubled by thoughts of the world to come. A cheerful and merry manner was maintained before him, even to the very latest days of his life. Any thing and every thing but what should have been, was told him, to keep his spirits up, and his thoughts away from himself. At last there came a day when his affectionate parents and brothers and sisters could no longer hide from his keen eyes their feelings. "What ails you all?" he questioned with roused fears. Their silence and hesitation caused conviction of the truth to dart into his mind. "Am I in danger? I dying?" he asked. They dared not, could not, deny it. "Then I am lost!" he screamed. "Lost! There is a hell. I feel it. I am in it. And you, you," he cried, turning his gaze of agony upon his parents, "are the cause of the loss of my soul." Then he died. What a memory for his parents to carry, as they must, through life!

THE ROES AND THE HINDS.

A Sermon written at Mentone by C. H. Spurgeon.

"By the roes, and by the hinds of the field."—SOLOMON'S SONG 2: 7.

The Adjuration a Specimen of Oriental Poetry —I. Creatures of Beauty—II. Their Tender Innocence—Communion with Jesus is Unobtrusive —III. Symbols of Love—IV. Delicate Sensitiveness Typified in the Figure—Great Need of Watchfulness and Prayer.

THE spouse was in the full enjoyment of fellowship with her Beloved. Her joy was so great as almost to overpower her, and yet, so nearly does fear tread upon the heels of joy, she was filled with dread lest her bliss should come to an end. She feared lest others should disturb her Lord, for if he were grieved she would be grieved also, and if he departed the banquet of her delight would be over.

She was afraid even of her friends, the daughters of Jerusalem; she knew that the best can interrupt fellowship as well as the worst, and therefore she adjured even Zion's daughters not to sin against Zion's King. Had they aroused her Beloved and broken his sacred peace, she would not have found a recompense in their company, but would rather have regarded them with aversion, for having robbed her of her chief delight.

The adjuration which she used is a choice specimen of oriental poetry: she charges them, not as we should prosaically do, by every thing that is sacred and true, but "by the roes, and by the hinds of the field." So far as we understand her meaning we will endeavor to profit by it during our brief meditation. It touches one of the most mysterious points of the secret life of the believer, and we shall much need the guidance of the Holy Spirit while we endeavor to open up its meaning.

I. "The roes and the hinds of the field" are

CREATURES OF GREAT BEAUTY.

Who can gaze upon them as they wander among the bracken without an inward admiration? Now, since nothing can be more lovely than communion with Jesus, the spouse exhorts the daughters of Jerusalem by all the loveliest objects in nature to refrain from disturbing it. No one would wish to drive away the gazelle, but would feast his eyes upon it, and yet its graceful elegance can never be compared with that beauty of holiness, that comeliness of grace which are to be seen in fellowship with Jesus.

It is beautiful from both sides; it is a lovely display of condescension for our beloved Lord to reveal Himself to us, and on the other hand it is a charming manifestation of every admirable virtue for a believer to enter into fellowship with his Lord. He who would disturb such mutual intercourse must be devoid of spiritual taste, and blind to all which is most worthy of admiration.

As one delights to see the red deer in the open glades of the forest, and counts them the finest ornaments of the scene, so do men whose eyes are opened rejoice in the saints whose high communion with heaven renders them beings of superior mould to common mortals. A soul in converse with its God is the admiration of angels. Was ever a lovelier sight seen than Jesus at the table with the beloved disciple leaning on His bosom? Is not Mary sitting at the Master's feet a picture worthy of the choicest art? Do nothing, then, O ye who joy in things of beauty, to mar the fellowship in which the rarest beauty dwells. Neither by worldly care, nor sin, nor trifling make even the slightest stir which might break the Beloved's repose.

His restful presence is heaven below, and the best antepast of heaven above; in it we find every thing that is pure, and lovely, and of good report. It is good, and only good. Why, then, O daughters of Jerusalem! should ye stir up our Beloved, and cause His adorable excellency to be hidden from us? Rather join with us in preserving a joy so fair, a bliss so comely.

II. The next thought suggested "by the roes, and by the hinds of the field" is that of TENDER INNOCENCE.

These gentle creatures are so harmless, so defenceless, so timid, that he must have a soulless soul who would do them harm or cause them fright. By all, then, that is tender the spouse beseeches her friends not to disturb her Beloved. He is so good, so kind, so holy, harmless, and undefiled, that the most indifferent ought to be ashamed to molest his rest.

About Him there is nothing to provoke offence, and every thing to forbid it. He is a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; He gave His back to the smiters, and His cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; He hid not His face from shame and spitting. Being reviled He reviled not again, but in His death agonies He prayed for His enemies. Who, then, could find cause for offence in him? Do not his wounds ward off the blows which might be challenged had He been of another character? Who will wish to vex the Lamb of God? Go elsewhere, ye hunters! "The hind of the morning" has already sweated great drops of blood falling to the ground.

In fellowship with Jesus there is a tenderness which ought to disarm all opposition, and even command respectful deference. A soul communing with the Son of God challenges no enmity. The world may rise against proselyting zeal, or defiant controversy, or ostentatious ceremonialism, for these have prominence and power, and are fair game for martial spirits; but fellowship is quiet, retiring, unobtrusive, harmless. The saints who most abound in it are of a tender spirit, fearful to offend, non-resistant, and patient—surely it would be a superfluity of cruelty to wish to deprive them of their unselfish happiness, which deprives no heart of a drop of pleasure, and costs no eye a tear. Rather let even those who are most indifferent to religion pay a generous respect to those who find their delight in it.

Though the worldling may care nothing for the love which overpowers the believer's ravished spirit, let Him tread with reverent care when He passes the closet of devotion, or hears a stray note from the song of meditative gratitude.

Rough men have paused when they have suddenly come upon a fair gazelle grazing in a secluded spot: charmed at the sight of such tender loveliness they have scarcely dared to move a foot lest they should alarm the gentle roe; and some such feeling may well forbid the harsh criticism or the vulgar laugh when even the infidel beholds a sincere heart in converse with its Lord.

As for those of us who know the blessedness of fellowship with Jesus, it behoves us to be doubly jealous of our words and deeds, lest in a single instance we offend one of the Redeemer's little ones, and cause him to lose even for an hour his delight in the Lord. How often are Christians careless about this; till at the sight of some professors the more spiritual may well take alarm, and cry out in anguish, "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem! by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till He please."

SYMBOLS OF LOVE.

III. A third thought most certainly had place in the mind of the anxious spouse: she meant to adjure and persuade her friends to silence by every thing which sets forth love. The lilies and the roes have always been sacred to love. The poet of the Canticles has elsewhere used the symbol of the text to set forth married love. "Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe" (Prov. 5: 19).

If ever there was true love in all this selfish world, it is the love of Jesus first, and next the love of His people. As for His love, it passeth the love of women: many waters cannot quench it, neither can the floods drown it; and as for the love of the church, He who best knows it says, "How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! How much better is thy love than wine! and the smell of thine ointment than all spices!" If love, therefore, may plead immunity from war, and ask to have its quietude respected, the spouse used a good argument when she pleaded "by the roes and by the hinds of the field," that her royal Bridegroom's rest of love might not be invaded.

If you love, or are loved, or wish to be loved, have a reverent regard for those who commune with Jesus, for their souls take their fill of love, and to drive them from their bliss would be inexcusable barbarity. O ye who have any hearts to feel for others, do not cause the bitterest of sorrow by depriving a sanctified soul of the sweetest of delights! Draw not nigh hither with idle tale, or wanton speech, or empty mirth: the place whereon thou standest is holy ground, for surely God is in that place where a heart enamored of the altogether Lovely One delights itself in the Lord.

Oh that all believers were so anxious to retain the enjoyment of divine love that they would warn off every intruder, whoever he might be. The daughters of Jerusalem were welcome to visit the spouse at fitting times; she even on another occasion bade them carry a message for her to her Beloved One, and gave them a full description of his surpassing charms, but when her Lord was with her at the banquet, she only asked of them that they would not come between her and the sunshine of his presence.

Nor do we wonder at her jealous fear, for we have had a sip of those sweets which she had tasted, and we would sooner lose all else than lose the luxury of love divine. It is such joy as cannot be imagined by those who have never partaken of it, such joy as can never be rivalled even in the paradise above, if in that place there be any other joy than that which springs from divine love. Let none, then, deprive us of its continued enjoyment. By the sanctities of true love let every friendly mind assist us to preserve the hallowed quiet so essential to communion with our Lord.

IV. Once more, upon the very surface of the figure lies the idea of DELICATE SENSITIVENESS.

The roes and the hinds of the field are soon away if any thing occurs to disturb them. In this respect they set forth to the life the speediness with which the Beloved departs when he is annoyed by sin. He is as a roe or a young hart, for this quality among many others, that while "he comes leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills," he also soon withdraws himself and is gone. Ah! then his spouse bewails His absence, saying, "I sought Him, but I could not find Him; I called Him, but He gave me no answer."

The Lord our God is a jealous God. In proportion to the fire of love is the heat of jealousy, and therefore our Lord Jesus will not brook a wandering affection in those greatly beloved ones to whom He manifests Himself. It needs constant watchfulness to maintain constant fellowship. Hence the spouse entreats and beseeches those who came near her not to give umbrage to her Lord. They might do this unwittingly, hence she warns them; they might do it in wanton carelessness, hence she "charges" them. She would have them speak softly and move gently, lest He should be disturbed.

Should we not feel a like anxiety that nothing in our families, or in any of our relations or connections should be tolerated by us so as to envelop us in the wrong, and grieve our Lord? Should we not specially watch every thought of our mind, desire of our heart, word of our tongue, and deed of our hand, lest any of these should give him umbrage, and break our rapturous intercourse? If we would be favored above others we must be more on our guard than others are. He who becomes "a man greatly beloved" must needs keep his heart with sevenfold diligence.

Kings will bear from common subjects behavior which could not be endured in favorites; that which might cause but slight pain from an enemy will sorely wound if it come from a friend. Therefore the favored spouse may well use in her entreaty the name of the most tenderly susceptible of love's favorites, and plead "by the roes, and by the hinds of the field."

Dear friend, do you know what intercourse with Jesus means? If so, imitate the spouse whenever you are in the enjoyment of it. Be jealous of yourself and all around you, that the Well-beloved may not be vexed. Aim at the maintenance of life-long communion. Remember how for centuries Enoch walked with God: our lives are but a span compared with His; why should we not always come up from the wilderness leaning on our Beloved? The Holy Ghost has almighty power. Let us ask and receive that our joy may be full.

If you do not understand this precious secret, may the Lord reveal it to you even now! You must first receive the Lord Jesus as your Saviour, or you can never know Him as your Bridegroom. Faith must trust Him before love can embrace Him. You must be brought to be washed, or you can never be brought to be banqueted. Pant after the Redeemer as the hart panteth after the water brooks, and when you have drank of the water of life then shall you be as a hind let loose; then, too, your feet shall be like hinds' feet, and you shall be set upon your high places. When this shall have been made your own by experience you shall understand the text, and shall also breathe the prayer of another verse of the same song: "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices."

A CHILD SAVED BY A CAVALRY SOLDIER.

THE following incident is stated in the London Standard to have occurred during a general review of the Austrian cavalry a short time ago: "Not far from where thirty thousand cavalry were in a line, a little child, a girl of about four years, standing in the front row of spectators, either from fright or some other cause, rushec out into the open field just as a squadron of hussars came sweeping round from the main body They made the detour for the purpose of saluting the Empress, whose carriage was drawn u in that part of the parade-ground. Down cam the flying squadron—charging at a mad gallop—down directly on the child!

"The mother was paralyzed, as were other for there could be no rescue from the line spectators. The Empress uttered a cry of ho ror, for the child's destruction seemed inevitab —and such terrible destruction—the trampli to death by a thousand iron hoofs. Direct under the feet of the horses was the little one another instant must seal its doom—when a st wart hussar, who was in the front line, witho slackening speed or loosening his hold, thr himself over by the side of his horse's nec seized and lifted the child, and placed it in saf upon his saddle-bow; and this he did witho changing his pace or breaking the correct ali ment of the squadron.

"Ten thousand voices hailed with raptur applause the gallant deed, and other thousa applauded when they knew. Two women th were who could only sob forth their gratitud broken accents—the mother and the Empr And a proud and happy moment must it h been for the hussar when his Emperor, tak from his own breast the richly enamelled C of the Order of Maria Theresa, hung it upon breast of his brave and gallant trooper."

Christian workers, who are laboring to sn the little children from the iron hoofs of sin temptation, remember you are working u the eye of a heavenly King; that the sma deed of kindness done to one of these little Christ reckons as done to Himself; and t who are instrumental in saving them sha honored at last, not with the Cross of Maria resa or of the Legion of Honor, bestowed b hands of an earthly monarch, but by the Immortal, who shall deck the brows of His ful servants with "a crown of glory that f not away."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE,

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, the author of Felicia Cuffe.

The Assassin Discovered—Mr. Percival Knighted—His Nature "Turned Sour"—Baby's Mission—The Cause of Sir Christopher's "Misantrippy" His Lawyer Summoned—He Makes His Will—"Tie it up forever"—He takes Advantage of the Law—Who's to be the Heir?—The Lawyer's Proposal—Arnold Montaigne to be Heir—The Conditions—The "Aqual o' King Solomon."

"MR. PERCIVAL, wondherful to tell, had the calmness to take in the nature and shape of the weapon with which he was threatened, as he could afterwards attest in open court whin the thrial cum on.

"It was a gun havin' a short barrel, which barrel was bound close with cord all round a good part iv it to an unvarnished stock of clumsy shape, and evidently of home manufacther. More nor this, he tuk' notice that the gun was so pointed that, if discharged, its contents would just miss him. He waited, therefore, still as death and firm as a rock, in the wan spot—and, sir, wasn't it uncommon darin' of him?—but the moment he saw the flash of the gun and heard its report, he bounded forward through the smoke, and before the man who fired at him could recover his position, he struck him a furious thrust, and then, quick as lightnin', retreated to his citadel of darkness.

"The wounded man, crying out, 'Boys, ahone! he has done forme,' fell to the flure, and painfully crawled to one side of the apartmint.

"Mr. Percival, sick of this horrid struggle for his life, as he towld afterwards, hoped in his very soul that now, so punished, these men—that is, those who remained o' them—would fly and suffer him to be done with bloodshed. But, only made desperate by their repulse, two o' them dashed like madmen into the bedroom for a second personal conflict. One o' thim Mr. Percival wounded in an instant, and then he himself was grappled by the other, grasping with his left hand the villain's right hand, which held an old bayonet.

"Mr. Percival closed upon him, and both after a little, bein' pretty near aquels in strength, fell heavily to the flure, where, writhing and working like snakes, each strove hard for the mastery. The fellow shouted to his comrade to kill the magistrate, but, unable to tell in the darkness which was which, he who was appealed to only stooped and brandished his knife, but feared to strike. And now cum on, sir, the most terrible part of the whole battle.

"Mr. Percival had no difficulty in knowing where to employ his weapon, and right fearfully he worked it agin' his foe, who lay over him yet still held fast by the magistrate's lift arm. To his surprise, however, Mr. Percival found that, strike as he would, his weapon made no impression—every blow seemed given in vain. Still holding to his enemy, he therefore sought to find out the raysin o' this, and gradually moving his hand down the blade he felt it with his fingers, and thus discovered that the point was all turned.

"Would you credit it, sir, he had the self-possession, still gripping his enemy, to straighten with his thumb his knife upon the flure. That done, sir, I will not speak the rest. With a shudder Mr. Percival used to tell in days after of the death quiver of the wretch over him, then of the loosenin' hold, and finally of the utter collapse; and, oh! sir, it was a corpse that lay upon him. Mr. Percival grew faint from the shock to his feelins. It was well for him, therefore, that at length all the rest of the gang became terrified, were seized with panic, and hastily calling to some men who stood outside the window, besought them to help them to carry off the dead in the dhrawin'-room.

"Those spoken to, springing through the open window, obeyed the summons. There was a sound of excited and hurried talk, and thin of heavy burdens carried along the flure. The room was soon clear, however, of its ghastly occupants; retreatin' feet gradually died away in the distance, and Mr. Percival, with intense relief, saw from where he lay the calm moonlight alone in the outer apartment.

"Pale and exhausted, he rose to his feet; then, unlockin' his dure, hastened upstairs to his servant-man's room. He found the fellow huddled together in the bedclothes. When spoken to, he confessed that he had heard the whole scuffle and struggle below, but excused himself by sayin', 'He was that afeard, he felt as though he couldn't put a fut under him.'"

"Mr. Percival, so soon as his strength and nerve in great measure had recovered, rode off to the nearest constabulary station and reported his sanguinary conflict. Before daybreak the whole police force of the disthrict was scouring the entire neighborhood, right and left, like so many hounds at finding the scent; but for long no trace could be found of the fugitives. At last, however, a physician was called in to save a wounded man's life, and that only in extremity, when home skill, tried at first, had proved of no use. This call for succor in a desperate case, where life and death struggled in the balance, afforded the needed clue to the whereabouts of the would-be assassins.

"On sarchin', too, the cabin of the wounded man, a curious piece of fire-arm was discovered in a recess, where it had been carefully put away. When shown to Mr. Percival he at once recognized it as the curious and idintical little gun that had been fired at him in his room. Its tyings, length of barrel, and clumsy stock put all possible mistake on the subject out of the question; and this and other points of evidence soon led to expiation on the scaffold. Oh, sir, what a dark and evil world is this, where such bad and awful work as I've been tellin' you of is possible betune those whom the wan God has made and offered His redimshun, and isn't the infatuation of those miserable men who seek by murdher to redress their wrongs, imaginary or real, beyant all the powers o' human undherstandin'? It inds in swift ruin to thimselves, body and soul, and puts Cain's brand o' shame and infamy upon the brow of poor ould Ireland.

"The effect, however, of Mr. Percival's most wondherful act of self-defince and the dreadful fate of those who sought to compass his life was for long powerful for good in the cause of law and ordher. For some years nothing was heard of Whiteboyism or Ribbonism in the disthrict—the spirit o' murdher was cowed. Mr. Percival, too, got no ind o' praise for his matchless skill o' fence, fortitude, and bravery; he was a hero ever afther in the eyes of ould and young, in whole counthry.

"The Government wanted to pinshun him, but as he wouldn't hear o' that, havin' plinty of his own, the Lord Lieutinant knighted him, so that from bein' a plain man he becum', as some time ago I tould you, Sir Christopher Percival. But, my dear, what wuz the use of it all to him? He niver seemed to git over his work o' blood on the night he was attacked; though he knew well and firmly believed that it is both allowable and just to take life in ordher to save life, yit the death of those whom in a sore necessity he slew ever appeared to haunt him. When he thought of it, he troubled most of all that their wretched attempt on his life told him they were lost, lost—you know.

"So from bein' a cheerful man he turned quite gloomy like, withdrew from all society; from the ingratitude of mankind, as proved by his man-servant's threachery, and their revengefulness, as proved by his intending destroyers, he cum ever afther to enthertain a coutimpt and dislike, as it war, of his fellows. His whole nature, sir, was like as if it turned sour, and for the last five years of his life, keepin as much as possible at home, he passed his days for all the world like a harmit.

"This led him to do a mighty quare thing, whin makin' his will; but I must put off that part o' my story until, sir, we have the good forthune to meet agin, for the town we are now entherin' is the ind o' my goin' with the coach. At the next inn I pass over the 'ribbons' to Larry Costello."

"I hope to be returning to Dublin," I said, "the day after to-morrow." "Do you?" he replied. "All right; I'll keep the box sate for you, sir; and thin agin' whin we're side by side I'll finish my story." Upon his getting down at the inn from his throne of office I put a somewhat larger douceur than usual into his hand. "Thank you, sir," he said, lifting his hat, and for the time we parted.

The purpose of my visit to Limerick was to preach special sermons for the local missionary society. Urgent business required my presence in Dublin, so that, my grateful task done in the west, I returned home immediately. My friend "Jehu," therefore, found me on the day I mentioned to him at ——, in the box seat, so as to be near him.

"Good-day, sir; glad to see you agin," he said, raising in salute his whip hand. "It's beautiful weather for our journey," he added, with a glance at the cloudless heaven. "Gee up, my pets!" he called to his horses, which, pricking up their ears at the well-known voice, moved off at a rattling pace along the Queen's highway.

"Well, sir, as I was sayin' the other night," he soon began, "Sir Christopher Percival led a very lonely and retired life (I hope he was seein' to the makin' of his own soul) after the dreadful and successful battle for his life of which I have tould you. Indeed, the horrible affair seemed to freeze his heart and pethrefy his feelings. It was bad for him that he had no wife nor children, for it's my idaya, sir, there's nothin' in this world does uz more good than the presence in the home, of a baby; and thin whin it becums a three-year-owld or so, with its prattlin' talk and the sound of its patterin' feet on the flure or stair, och! shure it's music to a father's ear, sweet enough to charm away all gloomy thought and care.

"But, sir, the poor gintlemin I'm talkin' of had niver the luck to have wun to call him husband or father. They say he was cruelly jilted in his young days by a beautiful but thoughtless young lady; and ever afther, in consequence, kep' clear o' the sex. Anyhow, he had, at the time afore us, no wan to let out his heart upon, and, driven back upon itself by the shock it got, it becum', I suppose, hard, as it were; so that from him bein' a kind man, as he wanst was, he turned into a misanthrippy.

"Livin' by and to himself, and spendin' but little while his incum was great, he, in coorse, laid up year afther year hapes o' money; and the people about here used to talk ov it amung thimselves, and ask each other in wundher what in the world he could mane to do with it; but he so kep' all his intintions to himself, that the talk was like the impty wind, and cum to nothin.' They say that even his agent, the lawyer, Mr. Gogharty, wasn't in his saycrets, and, indeed, very seldom seen him, for he done his business with him by writin'. And, more nor that, the knight havin' dhropped his (the lawyer's) acquaintance, like that o' the rest o' the gintlemin uv the place, it cum to pass that for years Mr. Gogharty niver sot fut in the knight's dwellin'. What was his surprise thin you can imagin, to git from Sir Percival a note wan day requestin' him to cum to his house on special business.

"As in duty bound, the lawyer in coorse obeyed the summuns, and at the appointed time appeared in Sir Percival's presence. The knight received him with little more ceremony nor the givin' him o' the time o' day. Handin' him a chair to wan side o' the table, he took his own sate at the other side, and thin, with scarce a word o' inthroduction, as I'm towld, opened up the business he spoke of in his letther.

"'I suppose,' began Sir Percival, 'I may expect wan o' these days to be lavin' this world, and, lookin' to my years, it can't be very long,' sez he. 'I want, however, before the time comes to settle me affairs. In a word, Mr. Gogharty, I wish to make me will.' 'And a very good thing, indeed, to do,' replied the lawyer. 'If every one, Sir Percival, would do the likes o' that, and as you are doing it, in proper time, there would be fewer unseemly disputes among families in the world, and we lawyers,' sez he, 'would be at a discount, and I fear should find it hard to live.' Then takin' up a pen from the inkstand near him, and carefully spreading out a sheet o' paper afore him, Mr. Gogharty, in one of his blandest voices, inquired into the knight's intintions. 'What arrangement, Sir Percival, do you desire me to make?' sez he.

"'I know, Sir Percival,' sez he, 'that your's is for the most part personal estate. To whom then, my dear sir, do you purpose to leave your money and your property?' You may fancy, if you can, sir, how the lawyer was taken all aback and nonplushed, when Sir Percival answered, in a calm and firm voice, showin' plane as the daylight that he had long made up his mind on the point, 'To whom will I leave my money do you ask?' sez he. 'I will leave it to no wan, Mr. Gogharty; I mane to tie it up forever.'

"'The law forbids it, Sir Percival,' sez he, 'and rightly forbids it. Dead men having no place in society—lost to it, and to the living world, in fact, though, of course, they are somewhere—have no right to commit an act injurius to comin' ginerations. Property of any kind,' sez he, 'is a part of the resources of the world, and its virtual annihilation by such an arrangement as you propose, Sir Percival, would be both a cryin' sin and a moral and natural wrong. Were I to do as you direct,' sez he, 'the Government at your demise would assume possession of your whole estate, Sir Percival, and would treat the document you wish drawn up, as illegal and totally null and void.'

"It was now, sir, the knight's turn to be put out; and with an angry 'Humph!' as though he imagined the lawyer himself was the author of this, to him, most objectionable state o' the law, asked him with some heat, 'Was such legislation just? That for his part he couldn't think so, for in his notion in a free country a man should be left to do with his own jist as he liked. However,' sez he, 'since as I'm bound to believe, since you say it, that you lawyers and your confounded law will have it so, and you will not allow me to do what I will with my own, then tie it up for a hundred years,' sez he. 'That, at all events, will keep it from covetous clutches for two or three ginerations.

"Mr. Gogharty had again to tell him that even that he couldn't do, and that in this case likewise the sovereign power of the land would lay hold upon the knight's inheritance. 'Tie it up then for fifty years,' said the irritated knight. 'Dear me,' sez he, 'if such hindrances in the way o' wan's rights wouldn't try the meekness o' Moses.' 'That, too, cannot be done,' calmly responded the lawyer. 'Even fifty years would far exceed the limit of my powers.'—'What, then, in the name o' goodness, is the longest date you can give me?' asked the knight; and he shouted out his words, for he had got nigh hand into a towerin' passion. 'Twenty-one years is the longest period the law permits property to be tied up,' responded Mr. Gogharty; 'and quite long enough it is,' sez he, a little piqued. In my idaya it should be shortened.'"

"Sir Percival looked daggers at this last remark, but, passing it by, he said, 'Then tie up all I'm worth, Mr. Gogharty, for the twenty-one years. Every penny o' it,' sez he; 'and mind you, for not one day liss. I'm resolved to take,' sez he, 'all the advantage your plaguy law allows me.' 'Very well, be it so,' Mr. Gogharty answered. 'But whom, Sir Percival, will you leave the accumulated property to be enjoyed by then? Some one must be named,' sez he; 'property cannot be left without a claimant. As Nature abhors a "vack you am,"' sez he, 'so does the law; so that unless an heir be stated in the will, the Government,' sez he, 'as in the former cases which I have mentiond, will claim at the close of the twenty-wan years your possessions.'"

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

A Sermon by Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

"Ye are the light of the world."—MATT. 5 : 14.

Light is Derived, and therefore Humble—Coal-imprisoned Rays of Light—2. Light is Self-evidencing, and cannot be Hidden—The same Sunlight for the Queen and the Beggar—3. Light is Joyous and Happy, and needs no Apology—Wreckers and their Work—Darkness if Chosen shall Come—The Sheep and the Swine.

THERE are three thoughts prominently suggested by this text. Light is derived, and, therefore, humble; light is self-evidencing, and, therefore, cannot be hidden; light is a joyous and happy sort of thing, and, therefore, needs no apology.

1. Take the first thought. Light is derived, and, therefore, humble. God is the great original of light. He said, "Let there be light, and there was light"—the grandest description that perhaps was ever put into language, because the simplest and the most immediate; effect flashing out so momentarily upon cause. "God said, Let there be light: and there was light." Light is the firstborn of the creative work. "God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night."

From the one fountain of the sun all the streams are flowing. Light is presented to us in all sorts of varieties, and we think that we are improving upon them time after time. Well, it is the same light. There is a oneness in its essence, after all. It is the same light wherever you look at it, whether it glitters from the wing of the firefly, or whether it blazes on the ruddy hearthstone, or whether it sparkles in the monarch's diadem, or whether it flashes in the beauty of the morning.

IT IS THE OLD LIGHT:

Science tells us that those vast coal-fields which supply us with fuel in inclement weather were once forests—forests of luxuriant vegetation upon the earth's surface, and that they incorporated the sun's rays—stole, in fact, the light of the sun's rays, and were then imbedded deep down in the bowels of the earth by some merciful convulsion, in foresight of the wants of some yet uninhabited world. Science tells us, too, that when the shapeless carbon is freed from its crust of mud, and ground on the wheel of the lapidary, and sparkles out upon our vision a diamond of the purest water, it is only the release of imprisoned rays of light stolen from the same great source in centuries long ago; so that you see both in the cottage firelight and in the monarch's gem we have nothing but the resurrections of some olden summer—the great Easter of some sepulchred sunlight from which man has rolled away the stone.

Now, whether this theory be true or not—and I believe it is true—I am quite sure that it is true of spiritual matters that we have no light in ourselves, and that we cannot gather any from any of the resources by which we are surrounded. "Every good and perfect gift cometh from the Father of Lights" (James 1 : 17). Oh, how beautiful that passage which comes in to illustrate this subject—"from the Father of Lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning"! so that you know for every thing we have—for the implantation of the new nature, for the power to resist evil, for the power to grow in grace, for the power to spread an embalming influence around us—we are dependent solely upon God.

It would teach us some useful lessons now and then, if we could always remember this. Why will men foolishly "sacrifice to their net, and burn incense to their drag," Hab. 1 : 16, when they have nothing that they have not received? And this humility is a humility which all nature teaches us. There is no pride in light, you know. The sun shines not haughtily. The brilliant host on high is unconscious of its own radiance. "Day unto day uttereth speech," but it is speech of God always, never of themselves. The heavens and the firmament boast not of their own beauty or mechanism. They declare His glory and they show forth His handiwork.

LIGHT IS A VASSAL,

and knows that it is a vassal. Light has an assigned mission in the universe, and like all God's loyal vassals—and all inanimate vassals are loyal ones: it is only man that is the sinner—like all God's loyal vassals, it speeds to fulfil its mission. Sunrise upon the mountains, how beautiful it is, when the morning, rising suddenly out of its couch of cloud, fringes the crests of the hills with glory, and then, grown bolder from its bashfulness, peers down to the valleys, and at last dawns full-orbed upon the world. But how silently it comes!

In obedience to the tidal forces, the waves of ocean break upon the strand, but they break with a great noise, and the mountains shake with the swelling thereof, and of this world's grandest tones is that sea's majestic roar. But all round us every day, every hour of every day, there are thousands upon thousands of waves of light, a mighty force, a great powerful influence, a more resistless energy; and it does not wake the baby from its slumbers, and there is no tumult in its royal march, and it comes in that imperial silence which is the best energy of God. And thus unostentatiously, but constantly, should your light shine before men.

Mark, it is not ye that are to shine. Do not be making that mistake. It is your light. The exaltation of self could only tend to the obscuration of the light, and would be one of the most effectual "bushels" to put it out and extinguish it altogether. Concerning the regulation and mastery of ourselves in this matter the Scriptures often teach us. We are not at liberty to be idle; the temple of the Spirit must rise. We are not at liberty to be secret; the temple of the Spirit must rise in the sight of men. The world must witness its rising. And yet there is to be no sound of human axe or human hammer.

The temptation to mix up ourselves with our Master in interest, in reputation, in usefulness—especially in usefulness—oh, how great it is! "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom?" The pride of honor, the pride of human applause, the pride that prides itself upon trampling that pride out as Diogenes with greater pride trampled upon the pride of Plato; the pride of complacent rejoicing in the time of another's fall, and which says, when we see a man wallowing there in the gutter, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men, or even as this publican;" the pride of the utter right in which some men wrap themselves up, as if it were a shot-proof coat of mail—what are all these? Why nothing but serpents twining themselves round the very pillars of the sanctuary of God.

Dear friends, let us learn this lesson; let us be so full of our Master that we have no room or time for any thought of ourselves. Let us thrust the proud self into retirement, and hold up the precious Saviour. And as the old cynic Diogenes made it his simple request to Alexander that he would just stand out of the sunshine, so let us, but not in his spirit—for there is nothing cynical about Christianity—let us put away absolutely and forever every thing that comes between us and the Great Sun of moral and spiritual glory, that so we may catch His directer beams, and reflect them in the sight of men.

2. Then take the next thought, and therefore, cannot be hidden. I said just now that we were not to obtrude the light or ourselves as the vehicle of the light; but then, on the other hand, we are not to hide the light—to cover the light; we are not to distemper the light. We are not to interfere with the ful manifestation of the light's rays. You know that it is an essential property of light to shine It cannot help it. It is not a merit. Nobod ever thinks of praising a star because it shines it cannot help shining. If you only let the ligh alone, it is sure to shine.

LIGHT IS SELF-EVIDENCING;

We have too little of it here in London, bu that is not its fault. It is the intervention of some foreign body like the fogs; but they are all earth-born, and do not belong to the light. They are accidents, not of its essence at all. Only let the light alone, and it will shine.

And then how impartial it is. In itself it has no choice of places. It throws itself upon the crest of the mountain, and the mists gather like a fleecy carpet at its feet. But it penetrates into the gloomiest gorge, in the wildest glen, and it dimples—for a few bright moments, anyhow—the obscure and the solitary barn. It shines equally upon humble hut and upon bannered tower; and there is not a ghost of difference between the light that comes down upon the peasant's cottage and that lights up the pinnacle of the proud keep of Windsor.

You cannot tell the difference. It is the same sunlight that gladdens the beggar and that gladdens the Queen. It forces a way and struggles through dirt and squalor in some of our London alleys to give a glimpse of heaven to the poor. Ay, and it pierces even through the arrow slits of the castle dungeon that it may cheer the poor captive in his gloom. Under all circumstances and in every condition let the light alone, and it will shine. And so the piety of Christians ought to be as consistent and as self-evidencing as the light of heaven.

It condemns worldliness, for example—sinful conformity to the habits and maxims of the world. It does not try by hardihood and daring how near it can drive to the precipice without turning over. It feels its safety in keeping as far off danger as it can. It abstains from the appearance of evil. It brands the doubtful as the bad.

And then this requirement of consistency condemns, also, censoriousness—the besetting sin of multitudes who rank as reputable Christians among men—censoriousness, the pride that would look down upon, or the envy that would depreciate, or the malice that would conspire against the fair fame of another.

Oh, to this consistency, in its elevation of purity, there is no character so hateful in this world as the character of the Pharisee, who gathers up his ruffled skirts, and frowns away the poor publican from his fellowship of devotion; and there is no character so utterly and contemptibly silly as that of this wicked Haman, to whom court favor and riches availed nothing, because Mordecai, the Jew, was sitting at the king's gate.

And then this requirement of consistency condemns, also, cowardice—the hiding of religion n the heart; the dwelling in the ceiled house ntent upon personal aggrandizement and pleasure and privilege, while the house of God lies waste; the selfishness which, with miser's care, would wrap up the pearl of great price, and let nobody either share in the sight of its beauty or have any thing of the benefit of its possession.

All these, I say, are condemned by the requirement of the text, "Let your light shine;" not a phosphoric gleam, not a meteor of the marsh, not a revolving lantern even, emitting an occasional or periodical radiance, but a light calm, uniform, and steady.

If you must have an emblem, let it be the lighthouse on the cliff. The waves sweep over it, the storm smites it, and heavily against its solid form press the broad shoulders of the hurricane; but teadfast, serene, immovable, the same year after year, through all the silent light burns on.

3. And then, again,

LIGHT IS JOYOUS

nd a happy sort of thing, and, therefore, needs no apology. The wisest man in human wisdom hat the world had in it said, "Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes o gaze upon the sun;" and every thing connect-d with light brings the idea of warmth, comfort, gladness.

Joyous as the light ought to be the piety of the elieuer. Who has so many substantial reasons for happiness? Who grasps so many of the ruest satisfactions? Oh, they caricature our holy religion, they libel its boundlessness of blessing, who fretfully crave or who dolefully complain; who are sanctimonious only when they think themselves "sanctified;" who would frown in their melancholy censorship upon all the relaxations and endearments of life. One feel of the sun would soon do away with all this moral dyspepsia. "Let your light shine."

Brethren, the character of John the Baptist—not the recluse and uncourtly ascetic that we are sometimes apt to paint him, but the witness and forerunner of the Saviour—the character of John the Baptist as it is exhibited to us, if we go under the surface and ponder it, is one which is within the reach of all of us—one which, in the midst of the world, naughty as that world is, malicious as that world is, it cannot gainsay. They say that that same world has got an eagle eye, keen, sharp, fierce, especially in the detection of blemishes and inconsistencies in professors of religion.

Well, naturalists tell us—they used to tell us, at any rate: in these utilitarian days I am not sure whether they bear it out—but they used to tell us that the eagle's eye drooped before the sun—that the burning iris of the eagle's eye drooped abashed before the steadfast purity of noon. And if you want to meet the world on its own ground, you know what to do. "Let your light shine," the light of cheerfulness without frivolity, the light of benevolence without ostentation, the light of gratitude without exuberance, the light of dazzling holiness with the veil thrown over it of humility, deep, and earnest and profound.

Then your life will be a happy one—it cannot help being a happy one; and then men will be attracted by the winsomeness of your piety to love the Lord Jesus themselves, and then strong consolations shall troop up to cheer the winter of your age; and then at the last, although you would be abundantly satisfied if they were to put upon your tombstone, as they did upon that of the forerunner, "He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light," the Saviour, who always gives more than is asked, who always gives in princely fashion, whether He bestows praise or recompense, will say of you, as He did of him, "He was a burning and a shining light."

Now, is it so that there are only two classes here—children of light and children of darkness? Is it so? Dear friends, there is one passage in the Bible that has always seemed to me one of the most fearful within the Book. It is this: "If, therefore, the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness." Now try to understand it. I can understand darkness, I can understand light obscured by darkness.

THE LIGHT MADE DARKNESS

—light so losing its very essence that it is degenerated into utter darkness. What do you think of that?

Not so very long ago—I hope it has died out now—but not so very long ago, in certain parts of the rock-bound coast of this beautiful island of ours, there used to be a class of men called wreckers, whose business it was to hoist false lights upon the cliff, and when the homeward-bound vessels loomed in sight, rich in costly argosies, richer in hopes and joys of mariners coming home again and longing for the sight of the loved ones from whom they had been separated for years—these wreckers would, by the false lights upon the cliff, lure the doomed ship among the quicksands or on the rocks or among the breakers, and, when she was struggling in her distress, they would go down with wolf eye and cruel hand, sometimes to destroy life—always to clutch the spoil. Was not that light made darkness?

And what are the writers of infidel and licentious books, that pander to the corrupt passions of our nature, and that inject poison into the minds of unsuspecting youth? There is their work—the light made darkness. And what is the work of the villanous seducers of youthful and especially female innocence, who now blazon out their effronteries in the drawing-rooms from which they ought to be scouted in shame? What is their work but light made darkness? And there are some of you choosing darkness, perhaps. Well, if you do choose it, you shall have it. God would rather that you did not choose it: He would rather that you chose light and became children of the day; but if you choose it He will not force you out of it. He will do every thing else; He will put the light before you; He will flash it before your dazzled eyes; He will show you its heavenly beauty; but He will not force you to accept it, or to become children of the light; and if you choose the darkness you may have it.

Darkness shall come upon you. You have chosen it, and it shall be yours. And then, when the night comes, darkness—congenial darkness—the blackness of darkness forever! Oh, you cannot surely, in your sane minds, choose it?

Some of you say, "I do not choose darkness, but, somehow, I am in it. I do not choose it; I would rather have the light. I am struggling for the light, and yet, sometimes, I get a great fall into the darkness again." Well, that is not darkness after all. Somebody illustrates it, in reference to people who desire to live for God, and yet now and then, fall into sin, by the different behavior of the sheep and the swine. When the sheep has got into the sty and the swine has got into the sty, you can tell the swine from the sheep even there, in the foulness and in the impurity. The swine wallows contentedly, but, oh, how the sheep struggles to get out!

Darkness? Yes, but not absolute darkness. You see men as trees walking. That is imperfect vision, to be sure; but is at hand who can make you see clearly, and take your spiritual ophthalmia away, and make you see with perfect vision. And if you choose light any one of you, if you begin to choose it with whole heart and with sincere desire to-night, you shall have it; and it is wonderful how it will come to you. You need not fear about a bad harvest here. Light is sown for the righteous, and there will be a wonderful crop. God's crops never fail.

"Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart;" light upon the memory, so that it shall bring all God's mercy into view; light upon the understanding, so that passages that you had read a hundred times before flash with all the newness of a richer beauty; light upon the conscience, so that you have no doubts upon questions of Christian casuistry, but there is a voice which says to you, "This is the way, walk ye in it;" and there is no difficulty, being guided, not "as the horse or as the mule, which have no understanding, and whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle," but as the loved child who has only just to look behind, and there is the father's eye, and the eye guides. "I will guide thee with My eye."

And then darkness? Yes, just a little darkness—only an eclipse, though, and the sun is never so bright as when struggling through it; only an eclipse—just a little eclipse—a temporary obscuration in the grave, and then light again, light all over, light all round, undistempered light, perfect light, not quite familiar light; and if you look around, you wonder what has become of the old sun that has guided you so long, or of the moon that supplied the sun's lack of service in the night-time.

Then a voice speaks, "They need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord shall be their everlasting light, and the days of their mourning shall be ended." And that is heaven! May it be yours and mine!

A singular Coincidence, which rarely happens to brothers, has occurred during the present month in Europe. Francis Howitt, the elder brother of the late William Howitt, residing at Heanor, Derbyshire, England, expired in the same hour of the same day that his brother died in Rome. Did they meet in the other world?

AN UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

A VISIT TO LONDON.

"MAMMA," said Clara one morning to her parent, as they sat together at breakfast, a meal which was never graced by the presence of the widow, for she kept her own room till noonday —"Mamma, I do not think that we can endure all this much longer. It is impossible to please Emma, whatever we do : let her set up house for herself, and manage as she may !"

Mrs. Arnot looked very grave, and it was some moments before she replied. "I think, Clara, that you can scarcely have reflected on what would be the result of such an attempt. You can scarcely have failed to observe how careless poor Emma is of money, how unable she is to manage a household, or to keep account of its expenses. She would certainly involve herself inextricably in debt, while the consequences to the unhappy orphans must be such as would deeply distress us both."

"They could scarcely be worse than they are," said Clara, bitterly ; "wild, ignorant, unmanageable little creatures. I have attempted several times to teach Lyddie, but she has always darted away like a little wild colt ; while Master Johnny, the other day, threw the spelling-book out of the window. Their footprints are over all my borders, their fingers cannot be kept off my flowers ; Lyddie strewed the walks yesterday with apple-blossoms, while Emmie managed to get hold of my paint-box, and has not only mixed all the colors together, but has left traces of them on a dozen of our books."

"It is very trying ; it quite distresses me, my Clara, to see the annoyance and discomfort which you suffer. Night after night I lie awake, turning over in my mind by what means I can prevent the inconvenience from falling upon my child. But no path seems to open before me. Emma is as unfit to keep house for herself as her own Lyddie would be ; and I feel —I am sure that you feel—that, as long as we have a home, the orphan grandchildren of your beloved father should never be denied its shelter !"

Clara pressed her mother's hand fondly to her lips. "O mamma ! you are so good !" she exclaimed ; "and what a return do you meet ! I do believe that if we were to give up our house altogether, or only to remain in it as servants, slaving from morning till night, and denying ourselves common comforts that Emma might enjoy every luxury, she would take it quite as a matter of course, think that every thing was as it should be, and feel not one spark of gratitude towards us, whatever our sacrifices might cost us !"

There was much truth in Clara's remark. In a mind mean and selfish as the widow's, gratitude has rarely a place. Alas that in the world it should be a virtue so rare ! Not that I would for a moment swell with my voice that cry so common, yet often so unjust, which indiscriminately charges the poor with ingratitude towards their benefactors. Far from it ; in this virtue, as in many others, the comparatively rich may often learn a lesson from the poor. There are perhaps few in the world who have no opportunity of exercising gratitude, few who lie under no obligations either for substantial services or for kindly attentions ; watchful care in infancy, help in difficulty, generous hospitality, or some other of the thousand acts of benevolence and friendship which so sweeten the cup of human life.

Yes, the many are laid under obligations, but the few have the candor to acknowledge them ; the many are helped, benefited, and cheered— the few gratefully remember the benefactor. The lepers in the Gospel are still types of human nature. Ten were cleansed, but where are the nine? Reader ! pause a moment ; ask your own heart, do you treasure up the remembrance of benefits—do you carefully keep up the warm glow which perhaps kindled in your heart when you first received them ? Or has the cold wave of time chilled the generous warmth of your feelings—or, worse still, did that warmth never exist ? From such observations as the writer has been enabled to make, it seems to be almost a general rule that the most truly generous are also the most grateful—that those who most readily do acts of kindness, most thankfully acknowledge them from others.

Nor let us think want of gratitude a light sin, or one which we may safely overlook. The same proud, thankless spirit which leads us to forget our obligations to man is at the root of our unbelief, our indifference, our coldness towards Him who is the giver of all good. We receive our blessings as rights ; we think little of the mercy which bestowed them, or we should scarcely dare to murmur and repine when the smallest is taken away from us. When Clara accused her sister-in-law of ingratitude, she little thought how well the charge might have been retorted on herself. Had she not been loaded with mercies—granted health, strength, all the comforts of life, opportunity of benefiting others, and power of pleasing ; the love of her friends, the deep tenderness of a mother ; and, above all, innumerable spiritual blessings, the means of grace and the hope of glory !

And yet with all this the heart which the world deemed so pure—the heart whose depths she had never yet fathomed, was now filled with a bitter, almost a rebellious, spirit. Clara had worked—was well pleased to work for God, but it must be in her own way ; she could make sacrifices for religion, but the choice of the sacrifice must be her own. It was as though the soldier who for years had glittered on parade and performed the routine of daily duty with faultless regularity in time of peace had started back when the war-trumpet sounded, had turned from the sterner obligations before him, and murmured because he was called upon at last to "endure hardness" and to face trial in a holy cause.

Clara was still ready to sit by the sick, to visit the dying, and to teach in the school ; she was still willing to give freely to the poor, looking for a plenteous reward hereafter, and receiving in the present the interest of human gratitude, admiration, and love. But she was not ready to be "kind to the unthankful and the evil," to "let patience have its perfect work," to strive to reclaim wilful and unruly children, with the prospect of awakening the jealousy of their parent, but never of rousing her to a sense of obligation. Clara's religion was not "the love of Christ," which "constraineth ;" therefore in the time of trial it failed her.

Consideration for her mother usually restrained Clara from making audible complaints, though she had not sufficient command over herself to abstain from them altogether ; but she indemnified herself for her forbearance by writing to Ada full and circumstantial details of all her petty miseries, with a by no means flattering description of the family from Barbadoes. It was a letter which Clara would not willingly have seen in the hands of her revered pastor ; she would never have addressed it to her mother ; she had some doubts, after having finished it, whether it would be well to post it. But it was really a clever and amusing letter ; it eased her heart to write it ; she was glad to have some way of giving vent to the pent-up flood of bitterness which was beginning to overflow its bounds.

The letter brought a speedy reply, containing an affectionate and urgent invitation to Clara to join her cousin in London, giving a glowing description of the amusements which she would enjoy, while a P.S. entreated her not to delay her visit, lest she should lose all the May-meetings in Exeter Hall, which Ada was "sure that to one so good would be a greater pleasure than all the rest."

Clara uttered an involuntary exclamation of delight as she perused the letter of her cousin. It was as though a caged bird had suddenly seen the door of his prison open, and the way free to liberty and to sunshine. She was full of impatience to show Ada's epistle to her mother, and could scarcely endure the delay occasioned by Mrs. Arnot's having to examine into the cause of a furious dispute between Johnny and his elder sister, and then to administer gentle advice and reproof to each of the little offenders. The interruption appeared to Clara so vexatious and petty—she would willingly have ended it at once by sending both the children away to the most distant part of the house, to settle their disputes by themselves ; but her mother calculated more truly the importance of whatever regards the training of immortal beings.

At length, however, Johnny and Lyddie were dismissed, having been, after much trouble, induced to exchange the kiss of forgiveness ; and the door had scarcely closed behind them, when Clara placed the letter in the hand of her mother. Eagerly she watched the expression of Mrs. Arnot's countenance as she read it. The lady perused it to the end before she uttered a word, and then she glanced up with a smile.

"What do you say to this, Clara ?"

"O mamma—it is just as you like—just as you think best—but—"

"This invitation seems to meet a difficulty which has pressed heavily on my mind. I have grieved to feel how trying to you has been the change in our family arrangements. You have grown thinner and paler ; your spirits have left you ; for the first time in my life it has pained me to look at my child. It is better, perhaps, that you should be absent from home till we bring matters into a somewhat better train."

"It seems almost like deserting you, mamma ; and yet—I do not think that I can help you much—I have not the least influence with the children."

Why was it that even Clara knew that her absence at this time would be actually a relief to her mother ? How was it that she had proved a burden rather than a helper ? She had never put the question fairly to her own heart, and was very glad to substitute for it another.

"Does it not seem to you, mamma, as though I might be more useful in London than I am here ? I believe that poor dear Ada really likes me ; I have some influence with her, I believe : she seemed here to be turning her mind more towards religion than she hitherto had done ; but she has no one now to speak to or consult on serious subjects. If I were with her she would be induced for my sake to go to meetings which she would not otherwise attend—it seems to me that it may really be my duty to go to Ada at this time."

"It will be your pleasure, at least," said Mrs. Arnot, smiling ; "and your happiness is ever near to my heart. I can trust your principles, my Clara ; I believe that you will ever act in my absence as you would if my eye were upon you. And the Almighty may, and I trust will, make you, my love, a blessing to others, if you serve Him with a humble, devoted heart, and a single eye to His glory."

A few days after this conversation took place, Clara, full of youthful hope and joy, sprang into the carriage which was to convey her to the depot , and waved again and again a fond farewell to the beloved parent who watched her departure from the gate.

It was with mixed emotions that the gentle widow beheld disappearing down the winding lane the carriage which held her dearest earthly treasure, separated from her for the first time Mrs. Arnot took pleasure in her daughter's pleasure, and had, perhaps, pride in the though that her beauty, talents, and virtues would now be more widely known and appreciated. Bu there was pain also in parting ; pain with which the meek parent reproached herself—that Clar could be so happy in parting ! There was a secret fear, which Mrs. Arnot thought want of fait lest the different scenes into which she was entering should, were it even in the slightest degree, change one who, in her partial love, sh thought could scarcely change for the bette Mrs. Arnot also suffered from the cares and anxieties of life, which she now must bear alone ; fo she was not one to complain, even to her mo intimate friends, of the secret trials of her home. The peevishness, the selfishness, the heartlessness of Emma, the wayward passions of her ill-taught children, the loss of the quiet repose of a well-ordered dwelling, were a cross to Mrs. Arnot as well as to her daughter; if to the latter it formed the more painful burden, it was because she murmured under its weight, while the widow bent meekly under it, remembering the divine hand that had laid it upon her.

So, quietly and unostentatiously, never dreaming either of merit or reward, the widow went through her round of daily duties, ordering her household, teaching the children, caring for her guest, nursing the infant, and never forgetting the poor. Emma's total indifference on the subject of religion often grieved Mrs. Arnot; but trusting in God, and not in herself, the simple Christian would not despair even of a heart which seemed like the beaten highway, on which the good seed fell only at once to be carried away.

There was no use in lending religious works to Emma; the volumes lay unopened beside her. She never considered herself equal to the fatigue of attending service in the house of worship. Mr. Ward and his wife paid her more than one visit. The good man spoke, as was his wont, out of the abundance of his heart; while Mrs. Arnot listened meekly with her clasped hands resting on her knee. But even he was chilled by the affected nod and meaningless smile with which the daughter-in-law received his words of holy consolation; while his wife felt uncomfortable under the dark eye which seemed scrutinizing every article of her simple apparel.

Not every one bore as patiently as Mrs. Ward this scrutinizing survey of dress from the fashionable and extravagantly-attired young widow. Miss Butterfield, who had a character and a temper of her own, was irritated by the close attention paid to her large poke-bonnet and rusty shawl.

She made some observations, more true than polite, about heads like band-boxes in a milliner's shop, intended to hold nothing more weighty than quillings and puffings; which brought an angry tinge to Emma's sallow cheek, and made her bitterly comment, when the guest had departed, upon the insufferable vulgarity of Mrs. Arnot's country acquaintance.

"How can I win Emma's attention to any thing serious?" such was Mrs. Arnot's frequent thought, till one day the happy idea struck her mind of reading to her Clara's manuscript hymns. "If any human writings can interest her, these will," thought the simple-hearted mother. "She will listen to them first for the sake of the authoress, and then their own beauty must touch her heart.

Emma could not, of course, refuse her assent to the proposal to read aloud the verses of her sister. She declared that she would be charmed to hear them, secretly hoping that the infliction might not be long, and that her mother-in-law would not think it necessary to go through the volume from beginning to end. Mrs. Arnot read with great impressiveness and feeling; every touching sentiment, every graceful idea, gained added beauty from her earnest expression. She was pleased and gratified by the profound silence of her listener, and read on, and on, warming with her subject, till in one favorite hymn, which described the blessedness of living for eternity, her eyes filled, and her heart overflowed, and she turned, as she wiped away a thankful tear, to see if Emma shared her emotions. The widow lay fast asleep on the sofa!

The only things to which Emma listened with real interest were portions of Clara's letters from London. These, written to amuse her mother in her seclusion, and full of lively descriptions given with freshness and vigor by one to whom every thing which she beheld was new, were, even to a stranger, extremely entertaining. By Mrs. Arnot the arrival of the post was looked forward to as bringing the one great treat of the day, and never once was she disappointed of it.

QUEEN ESTHER.

S. S. Lesson for April 20th.—Esther 4: 10–17; 5: 1–5. Golden Text, Psalm 37: 5.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR lesson for to-day is a striking instance of how the fate of a whole people may depend upon the faithfulness of a single individual. There is no doubt that God had overruled all the circumstances of which we read in the first and second chapters of this book, in view of the time when Esther should be called to the step of faith which saved her people from destruction. The displeasure of the king with Vashti may be, from man's point of view, only the act of an unreasonable despot, but God made way through it for Esther to be made queen, and it was God who gave her favor in the sight of the king. But Esther was blest with a wise counsellor in Mordecai, who evidently taught her the responsibility of her position.

We find that Esther "had not yet showed her kindred nor her people; as Mordecai had charged her; for Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him." Here was the first step in God's preparation of His servant for the important part which she was afterwards to play. Esther, even though the queen of the most powerful country of the world in her time, knew how to obey. Obedience is more often overlooked than faith or zeal.

We read of the loyalty of Mordecai in chap. 2: 21–23, when, though a member of a captive race, he warned the king through Esther of the treachery of two of his chamberlains. But notwithstanding this, it was not Mordecai but Haman, a vain, selfish, unprincipled man, who rose into favor at the court of the king Ahasuerus. It would appear that the king had given commandment that every one should bow before Haman, not because of any official position which in itself would command respect and honor, but out of mere caprice. Mordecai alone was disobedient to the command—not from disloyalty; his past conduct was sufficient evidence of this. Haman was neither king nor magistrate, no power ordained of God, and probably this was why Mordecai the Jew withstood the general homage offered to this man.

But we find that some mischief-making people among the king's servants told Haman of it, and so satanic was the spirit of this favorite of the world, that "he scorned to lay hands on Mordecai alone; for they had shewed him the people of Mordecai: wherefore Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus" (chap. 3: 6). And the infatuation of the king for this unworthy favorite was so great that we find it needed but a request on his part to the king, and he was ready to consign a whole race of people to be massacred; and so heartless were this tyrant king and his favorite, that after having sent out into all the land the fearful command to destroy the Jews, "the King and Haman sat down to drink." Such is the natural heart of man.

But "when Mordecai perceived all that was done, Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, and went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and bitter cry; and came even before the king's gate: for none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth." There was also mourning and fasting and weeping and wailing among all the Jews. But Esther seems to have known nothing of all this at the first. Then her maids and her chamberlains told Esther, and she was exceedingly grieved at Mordecai's sorrow, while as yet she was ignorant of its cause, and she sent raiment to clothe him, but he received it not. Then she sent Hatach, a confidential servant, to whom Mordecai told the whole story, and "gave him the copy of the writing of the decree that was given at Shushan to destroy them" (the Jews), "to shew it unto Esther, and to declare it unto her, and to charge her that she should go in unto the king, to make supplication unto him, and to make request before him for her people. And Hatach came and told Esther the words of Mordecai" (chap. 4: 8, 9). It was an awful moment for Esther. The fate of her people was at stake, but it might be death to her to go in uncalled unto the king. At first her heart failed her: she could not speak face to face with her uncle, all must pass through Hatach; and she represented how it was on pain of death that any one, man or woman, should enter into the inner court unto the king unless he should hold out unto them the golden sceptre. "Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

Yes, Esther was come to the kingdom for this very time. And so, dear reader, in every position of difficulty or perplexity in which thou mayest be placed, thou art not by chance but in the ordering of God come to it, that thou mayest experience His faithfulness and power.

Mordecai had no doubt that enlargement and deliverance would arise to the Jews; he knew the power and the faithfulness of his God; but he desired for Esther that she might have the honor and privilege of being the instrument which God should use. And what a lesson this teaches us! Reader, are you alone in your family as a Christian, or are you working in your neighborhood single-handed? Oh, forget not that those who are watching you, and who receive most of their religious impressions through you, may rise or fall through your spiritual state. God calls to a high position of honor the first member of a family whom he brings out from the world, and it is a responsibility which demands the closest communing with Him.

Esther rose to the occasion; her uncle's faith was contagious, and she sent an answer to Mordecai: "Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink for three days, night or day: I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and if I perish, I perish." Thus the queen leant not upon herself, but upon God. And thus prepared she ventured into the king's presence. A people lay upon her heart, and her life was in her hand, but she was strong in God and she went forward. And so must we if the Christianity of our day is not to succumb to the elements of the world and self which assail it on every hand.

And God overruled the heart of the king, and he "held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand." And so fully had God bowed his heart that he said, "What wilt thou, queen Esther? and what is thy request? it shall be given thee to the half of the kingdom." Esther invited the king and Haman to a banquet which she had prepared. Meanwhile the current of affairs took a turn, God's hand was in it all, and the prayer was not in vain. The chronicles of the kingdom were read before the king, and Mordecai's loyalty was first made known to him. And without being aware of Haman's enmity against Mordecai, the king sent him to lead Mordecai in royal apparel and on the king's horse throughout the city. It was the beginning of deliverance.

Then when the king and Haman were come to Esther's banquet, the king urged upon Esther to make her request, and great was his surprise when she said, "Let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request," etc. And when he further asked, "Who is he, and what is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so?" she said, "The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman." An hour later and Haman was hanging on the gallows which in his sinful jealousy he had prepared for Mordecai, and it was but a step beyond to ask for and to receive respite for all the Jews. And thus she who put her trust in God was not confounded, and God's people sought not His face in vain.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The English National Balance Sheet was presented to Parliament April 3d. The cost of the wars in India and South Africa form a serious item in the year's expenditure, and it was generally anticipated that an increased taxation would have been proposed, but beyond imposing a small additional duty on cigars, no change has been made.

England now has a floating debt represented by an unpaid balance of some $23,500,000 expenses incurred in the warlike preparations preceding the Berlin Conference; there is a further debit of a larger amount on account of the Zulu war, part of which is included in the year's expenditures; and there is a loan of $10,000,000, without interest, to India, which does not figure in the budget at all. While the ordinary expenses of the year leave a surplus, the actual expenses show a deficit of over $11,000,000.

The Temperance Cause in England.—The friends of the temperance cause in Great Britain are rejoicing over what is considered an important advance made by them in the House of Commons, 166 members having, March 11th, voted in favor of a resolution introduced by Sir Wilfrid Lawson in favor of Popular Control of the Liquor Trade. The resolution affirms the principle that the inhabitants of any district should be at liberty to restrain the demoralizing traffic in their midst, if they so desire. Last year 88 members only voted for the measure which is known as the Permissive Bill, the aim of which is similar to that of our Maine Liquor Law, therefore although Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution was lost, 254 having voted against it, yet the friends of temperance congratulate themselves on the fact that in twelve months they have practically doubled the number of their supporters in the British Parliament. The greater part of the churches of the country passed resolutions in favor of the motion, and remarkable interest was taken in the debate, no less than twenty-two speeches having been made upon the subject. The surpassing need of legislation in the matter may be seen by the fact that, notwithstanding the depression of trade, and consequent distress prevalent in the country, the amount spent in intoxicating drink during the year 1878 increased by $900,000, the total sum expended in intoxicants last year in the United Kingdom having reached the enormous amount of seven hundred millions of dollars.

Another Royal Victim of Diphtheria.—The death of the young Prince Waldemar, son of the Crown Prince Frederick William of Germany, is announced as having been caused by diphtheria, and that measures have been taken to prevent the spread of the disease, which has lately been so fatal to members of the Royal family in Prussia. The deceased Prince was a grandson of the Queen of England.

A Thrilling Episode in Missionary Life is narrated in a letter received last week from the Rev. Henry Marsden, American missionary in Marash, in Asiatic Turkey. It appears that the inhabitants of Zatoon, numbering 10,000 persons, after bearing with incredible patience for a long period the oppression of Turkish officials, at length broke out in open rebellion. A riot took place, and orders were given by the Turkish Government to destroy the city.

The Turkish Governor-General was, however, urged by the English Consul to try peaceable measures to quell the disturbance, and reluctantly consented. Mr. Mardsen was sent for, and asked to mediate. He was provided with an armed guard, but he preferred to go unprotected, and he dismissed the escort, for it seemed better to meet the Zatoon people alone. "As we threaded our way," Mr. Marsden writes, "through the defiles of the mountains, we frequently saw the heads of Moslem robbers, and the gleam of their weapons peering down upon us from the crags above, but we passed them all in safety, and entered the town just after dark. We spent a week in earnest conference with large bodies of influential men, and held several meetings at night with this band of outlaws. We were received by all parties with kindness and confidence. We listened to the sad story of their wrongs, advised unqualified submission to the Government, while we gave hope that English influence would protect them from a repetition of past oppressions.

They gave us a paper containing apologies for their misdeeds, strong assurances of loyalty in the future, and a petition that a suitable governor be sent to them as soon as practicable. This paper was signed and sealed without a dissenting vote, and then, as proof of their sincerity, they collected the arms they had taken from the policemen and sent them by us to Marash.

The robbers even gave us the pledge that if they could be saved from the vengeance of the Turk they would at once deliver up their arms and become obedient citizens. With many a "God bless you," from Armenian, Catholic, Protestant, and robber chief, we returned to Marash.

Thus did the influence of one godly man save a whole city from extermination. Truly "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

The Chronic State of Warfare which seems natural to South America does not appear to be at all near its end, for a war is threatened now which ere its close may possibly involve half the nations of South America. A grievance having arisen on the part of Chili against Bolivia, on account of disputes respecting the latter's right of taxation of certain nitrate works, owned and worked by Chilians in Bolivia, which it had been agreed should be partially exempt from taxation, Chili has declared war against Bolivia, and Peru has allied herself with the latter. Chili appears to be seeking the assistance of Brazil, while the Argentine Republic has an old grievance against Chili, so that the position may become exceedingly complicated. All these republics, however, are so wretchedly poor, and with no credit, that they may soon have to cease fighting from sheer lack of powder and guns.

Zulu Drinking Habits appear to have received an impetus from intercourse with Europeans, as is usual in similar cases. The Zulus make a sort of beer, which they drink largely, but its intoxicating power is so slight that they sit drinking for a day before they become intoxicated. But the English traders have supplied them with rum and gin, which the Zulus have preferred to their own beer on account of its greater intoxicating strength. It is in this way that professedly Christian people deal with weaker races in various parts of the world, whose passions, excited by alcohol, are to all intents "set on fire of hell," the so-called "enlightenment" of the white man is too often but another name for darkness, "the light which is in him is darkness," making the "dark places of the earth" darker still by his vices and self-indulgence.

Mr. George Müller is still actively pursuing his evangelistic labors on the Continent of Europe. At the end of last year he proceeded from Switzerland, via Lyons and Marseilles, into Spain, where he visited Barcelona, Saragossa, and Madrid. He also visited the missionaries, and inspected several large schools, which he is the means of supporting in that country. He has since visited Biarritz, Pau, Bordeaux, and Cannes, holding numerous meetings at these places. He is now at Nice, whence he proceeds to Mentone, where he hopes to meet Mr. Spurgeon. It has been announced, that in the autumn of the present year, he will go again to America.

"Very Reverend" and "Sinner."—Some one having addressed C. H. Spurgeon as "the Very Rev.," the latter objected to it; for, in his opinion, "reverend" and "sinner" make a curious combination, and as he knows that he is the second, he repudiates the first. To him it is surprising that such a flattering title should have been invented, and more amazing still that good men should be found who are angry if this title be not duly given to them.

Mr. Spurgeon's Return.—If Mr. Spurgeon's health continues to improve as it has done during the last week, he purposes returning to England at an early date, and is expected to preach in the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Easter Sunday. Mrs. Spurgeon's health, we are sorry to learn, is worse than usual just now.

Mrs. M. Baxter writes from Baden-Baden:—"The meetings in the Badischen Oberland were much blessed in the villages. The people are intelligent and earnest. The few members of the Lord's "little flock" are of good report in their lives, but the love of souls is sadly wanting amongst them. Some of the meetings which are held weekly in these villages were established by the good Pastor Mein, whose power in healing the sick was spoken of in an article in Israel's Watchman last summer. Most of the old Christians in this neighborhood were converted in the days of Pastor Mein, through his instrumentality and that of another good pastor near. But these old Christians do not like any one else coming to work in their villages, although no conversion work is going on, and the large Catholic population is untouched. Pray for Carlsruhe, where I hope to begin meetings in a few days. This beautiful little town of Baden is mostly Catholic; some good has been done lately by the Baron de Gemmingen, and others who have held meetings in a school-room."

A Scotchman's Inheritance.—A Christian man was visited on his dying bed by a worldly brother, who upbraided him for giving so much attention to the things of God, and giving away so much of his substance for religious purposes, and subjecting himself to poverty, when, if he had followed his advice and example, he might now have been in the enjoyment of plenty, instead of being, as he termed it, a burden to his friends. With great calmness and earnestness the dying saint replied, waving his wasted hand toward his poor, self-deceived brother, "Quiet, quiet! Whist, whist, Tam! I have a kingdom no begun upon, and an inheritance that I have na yet seen." Which was the richer of the two brothers?

The Origin of the London Foundling Hospital.—Captain Coram, the founder of this institution, often passed to and fro between Rotherhithe and the City, and his heart was touched by the sight he constantly witnessed of infants exposed by their parents in order to obtain the pity and succor of chance passers, or else to suffer the more probable alternative of death from starvation. The sympathy that was the sole bond between the honest sailor and these unfortunate children has since awakened a responsive throb of kindred feeling in countless hearts, resulting in the support and prosperity of the institution in Bloomsbury, London, he founded for their shelter. The Captain himself died poor, but late in life uttered the following noble sentiment: "I have not wasted the little wealth of which I was formerly possessed in self-indulgence and vain expenses, and am not ashamed to confess that, in this my old age, I am poor."

All but Idiots Stop the Tap.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, writing upon the subject of temperance, relates what occurred at a meeting in a northern county. Three clergymen were present. They set up Timothy as their model man morally, lauding and magnifying sobriety, but commending the temperate consumption of alcohol. When they had concluded, an elderly farmer rose and said, "I've heard that kind of tale for the last forty years, and I can't see that people are a bit more sober now than when it commenced. It reminds me of what I once saw take place at a retreat for imbeciles. It is the custom there, after the patients have been in residence for a certain time, to put them to a kind of test, to see whether they are fit to leave the asylum or not. They are taken to a trough full of water with a small pipe continually running into it, and supplying it. They are given a ladle, and told to empty it. Those who have not regained their senses keep ladling away, while the water flows in as fast as they ladle out, but them as isn't idiots stop the tap."

PORTRAITS FROM ZULULAND.

THE REV. OTTO WITT,

Late Swedish Missionary in Zululand. Interesting Details about his Work among the Zulus.

THIS notable minister, who was the first person to arrive in England that was present at the terrible contest at Rorke's Drift in Zululand, was born in Sweden in 1848. He is the son of a minister of the Established Church of Sweden, who was engaged in evangelistic work during the war between Denmark and Germany. Mr. Witt, jr., declares that as far back in his life as he can remember it was his earnest desire to become a missionary to the heathen.

In prosecution of this determination he entered upon a course of study for the ministry, and was ordained in 1874 as a pastor of the Established Church of Sweden. Toward the end of 1875 he offered his services for missionary work in connection with any of the foreign stations of his Church.

He was ultimately sent to Natal, where the Swedish National Church had two missionary stations. Upon Mr. Witt's arrival at the Cape Colony he had to stay at one of the stations to be instructed in the Kaffir and Zulu languages. So rapid was his progress in this direction that he was enabled to preach his first sermon soon after his arrival at the station.

Here, besides other hardships, he often experienced much difficulty in obtaining the necessaries of life; several times he was in danger of absolute starvation. It was only when the Zulus happened to kill an ox that he could obtain the smallest piece of meat; at other times porridge and bread were all that the missionary larder could afford.

Zululand is described by him as generally healthy; it is covered with bushes. He thinks that perhaps the Zulus were, from their point of view, justified in their presumption that they were the strongest people on the face of the earth, seeing that the present occasion is the first time they have ever come into collision with disciplined troops, their former contests being with neighboring tribes, who both in proficiency and numbers were much their inferiors.

He quotes the opinion of the Zulu lad that he has brought to England, who rejoices in the not very euphonious name of Umkwelnataba, and who is a cousin of King Cetewayo, as the general belief of the Zulus that the last white man had been swept from the face of the earth by the battle of Isandula.

The Zulus, Mr. Witt observes, are first-class talkers. Matters which require to be arranged are talked over again and again, however small and unimportant they may be. Indeed, such is their adroitness in talking that many a lawyer might feel envious of their abilities. They have some good laws among them, but they mostly pertain to cattle, which form the principal property among the Zulus.

Polygamy being permitted, they barter cattle for women at the rate of twelve of the former for one of the latter; so that if a man has many women he is esteemed a rich man, for according to the number of daughters he has he becomes the richer in cattle upon their marriage, if such it may be called.

One most remarkable thing which Mr. Witt records is the ostentatious snuff-taking which prevails among the Zulus. To use his words, "Were you to offer a Zulu all the world possesses he could not carry any thing of a heavy nature because of his snuffbox, for whenever he has to attend to the snuff-taking operation he must sit down."

The huts, of which a number collected together are called a kraal, are shaped like beehives, and have a small entrance, bearing about the same proportion to the hut that the bees' entrance does to the beehive. Entrance to these is of course only gained in a horizontal position, by crawling upon the hands and knees. Inside of these wattle huts there is scarcely room to stand upright, except near the pole in the centre. The smoke from the fire within finds its only means of escape by the small and low entrance.

The richer Zulus being polygamists (having many wives), the number of huts in contiguity gives a general idea how many women the chief or great one calls his own, for each woman has her own abode—a very wise expedient to prevent possible quarrels.

The Zulus and the Kaffirs generally believe in the immortality of the soul, but connect with it the Booddhist doctrine of transmigration of souls. They believe that when a Zulu dies his soul goes into a snake; hence those creatures are so reverenced that they are carefully fed, and no Zulu dares to kill one; and if one which has been known to be in a village or kraal should leave it, its departure would be taken to bode evil for the village it had quitted. If a Zulu is asked what becomes of the soul of the man or woman after the death of the snake, he confesses he does not know.

They have also some idea of the Creation, the Fall, and Redemption by Christ. Their wise ones say that Ookooloomkoolu made man, who, it was originally intended, was to live forever. A lizard was sent to tell man that he was to live forever, but the reptile went along very slowly, and Ookooloomkoolu, changing his mind, decided that man should die. Another animal was accordingly sent as a messenger, which overtook the lizard, and so they were doomed to die. But Ookooloomkoolu repented, and returned and promised that he would one day send a daughter whose son should drive out the son of the man of sin.

Cetewayo, the Zulu king, objects to his people becoming Christian, as they then marry and he loses the man as a soldier, the permission to marry being withheld by the king until the man has seen an allotted period of service in the army. He will for meritorious conduct order whole regiments to marry.

The Zulu lad Umkwelnataba, who has accompanied Mr. Witt to England, was ordered to be killed, but he escaped. His being a cousin of the king makes the offence of being desirous to be taught the principles of the Gospel doubly heinous in Cetewayo's eyes.

Mr. Witt called his mission-station Oscarburgh, in honor of Oscar II., King of Sweden, who manifests great interest in mission work among the heathen. He was not able to see much fruit of his labor, as it takes a long while to reach a Zulu's heart, and they are deterred by fear of being killed.

Zulus are said to be very selfish, on which account acts of kindness appear very often to a painful extent to be misapprehended by them. During the last famine an Englishwoman took into her house a poor famished woman, reduced to a mere skeleton, and utterly helpless from hunger. She was saved from a most miserable death, fed and protected until she was able to work. Her benefactress desired her to take a pail and fetch a little water for household purposes, when she coolly asked, "What will you pay me?" This case presents by no means an exaggeration of the Zulu character.

In the buildings at Oscarburgh, Rorke's Drift, which were so nobly defended by the English, Mr. Witt kept school, teaching the Commandments and a few stories of the Bible in addition to the ordinary educational requirements. His Sunday congregations, which met on the Natal or British side of the river Tugela, numbered about one hundred persons; this was thought to be very good.

He often crossed the river into Zulu territory to talk to the people in their hut-homes. Upon one occasion he met Sirayo, Cetewayo's Prime Minister, who was anxious that Mr. Witt should talk to his people, but concluded the expression of that desire with these words, "But, mind, you must pray for rain." It was then a time of great drought. Mr. Witt, Elijah-like, trusting in God, then knelt down and uttered these words, "O God, Thou art good! Please show these people that Thou art God by giving them rain." The next morning the rain came, and continued to pour down for three days.

Mr. Witt has returned to Sweden, as he believes the door for mission work is closed for the present, and he has lost all he had at his station, which it is hoped the British Government will replace.

Mr. Witt left England on Friday, the 14th March, for Sweden, accompanied by the Zulu youth. He has nothing but grateful recollections of his treatment while in London. When he and his wife and family arrived in England they were in absolute deprivation; but they left it substantially comforted.

CETEWAYO, THE ZULU KING.

THIS august personage, as he believes himself to be, has never before commanded any great amount of notice from other nations, for even his land is an unknown domain to the great bulk of geographers.

He appears to be about fifty years of age. He is a very big man, standing over six feet in height, and like his father Panda is tremendously stout, weighing about twenty-eight stone. He is reported to be a great beer-drinker, one tribe being employed in the manufacture of the beverage for his majesty, which is made especially strong, and is brought in in calabashes about two feet high. Cetewayo besides is fond of beef, and spends his time in drinking beer, eating beef, and smoking, with a little leisure which he devotes to family affairs.

He is much opposed to the spread of the Gospel in his dominions—indeed, under his rule nearly all trace of former Gospel missionaries' work has been wiped out. Dr. Moffat had great influence over Chaka, uncle to Cetewayo, and one of his predecessors. Indeed, so great was the persuasive power of the veteran missionary, that he remembers distinctly occasions when, seated on the right hand of the king, he held that hand down until he remonstrated with the barbarous [illegible] on behalf of the prisoner, often a woman. If the king had but raised his hand the guards would there and then have fallen upon the unfortunate individual and put her to death. Scarcely any missionary dare now, except upon the barest sufferance, enter Zulu territory.

Cetewayo's defiant attitude is the outcome of the belief which fills every Zulu's breast, that as a people they are the strongest on the face of the earth. He is said to have sent the following laconic note to a British officer in South Africa, in answer to Sir Bartle Frere's ultimatum: "Excellency—First came the missionary; next the consul; now the army. Cetewayo."

From all accounts of this line the Zulu kings have been remarkable men. One of Cetewayo's ancestors having conquered all the tribes within easy march of his capital, is said to have wept, like Alexander, because he had no one else to conquer.

One of the most noted of his ancestors was Chaka, who was such a conqueror that finally he stood at the head of an army of 100,000 devoted followers.

However, in 1828, Chaka fell a victim to a conspiracy by his brother Dingan, who, in turn, was deposed in 1840 by another brother, Panda, who was assisted in his enterprise by the Boers, with whom, after his accession to power, he continued to live on good terms. This Panda had several sons, chief among whom were Cetewayo and Umbulazi; the king's preference being shown for the latter, Cetewayo's jealousy was aroused, and Umbulazi, being fearful of the consequence, set off with four other brothers and about 8000 followers to Natal; but Cetewayo followed with 20,000 men, and a terrible massacre ensued, those of Umbulazi's followers who were not killed with the sword being driven into the Tugela.

Umbulazi himself fell into the hands of his

INHUMAN BROTHER

Cetewayo, who had him flayed alive in the first place, and then sprinkled with hot ashes and black ants, his heart being finally cut out and eaten by Cetewayo's warriors. The father son; Panda, determined to chastise his rebell finding that the greater portion of the tribe owed the fortunes of Cetewayo, Panda was pelled to come to terms, and Cetewayo was pointed Prime Minister in 1856, and on the th of Panda in 1872 he was appointed King, king solemn promises and protestations to Theophilus (then Mr.) Shepstone for his good avior if the Natal authorities would only rec- ize his claim—promises, it is almost un- essary to add, which have since been broken h the utmost effrontery.

LIEUTENANT NEVILLE JOSIAH AYLMER COGHILL,

Who Died in Defence of the Colors of the 24th Regiment, born at Castle Townsend, in the County of k, Ireland, Jan. 25, 1852, and was the eldest of Sir John Jocelyn Coghill, Bart., of Drum- dra, County Dublin, and of Castle Townsend. was a nephew of the Right Rev. Lord Plun- t, Bishop of Meath.

Ie entered the army in 1873, and served as e-de-camp to General Sir Arthur Cunyng- ne, G.C.B., during the war with the Gaikas l Galekas, who were neighbors of the Zulus. r acts of bravery in this service he was men- ned in the despatches of his chief. He was erwards appointed aide-de-camp to Sir Bartle ere, Bart., a position which he resigned on the laration of war with Cetewayo for the pur- se of rejoining his regiment.

t appears he had been despatched, on the oc- ion which led to his death, as acting aide-de- mp of Colonel Pulleine, during the fighting at ndula, to Rorke's Drift, with orders to give rm to Lieut. Chard's force intrenched there, l then to ride on to Helpmakaar to bring up nforcements. Having executed the first por- n of this duty, he was proceeding to carry out remaining part of his orders, when he was ercepted by a detachment of the Zulu force in rsuit of Mr. Young, who was flying from the ne of disaster. At the same moment Adju- nt Melville came up with the colors of the regi- nt, which had been rescued from the battle- d.

They both swam the Buffalo River, but from s of blood Lieut. Melville soon fell with the lors, and, notwithstanding the hot pursuit of Zulus, Lieut. Coghill dismounted to rescue colors, but ere he could proceed one hundred rds he, too, succumbed owing to his previous vere wounds, and fell covering the standard of country with his lifeless body. Thus they cceeded in carrying the colors sufficiently far ay from the Zulu forces to lead to their ulti- ate rescue.

So, faithful unto death to the high resolve to scue their flag or perish, this brace of British roes must have at length eluded the number- ss hordes of the enemy, swam the river, and ly breathed their last when the colors had en saved and their lives spent in the noble fort.

SURGEON-MAJOR PETER SHEPHERD

as a native of Aberdeenshire, and an instance a class very common in Scotland—men of mparatively humble parentage, who are able rough the admirable parish school and Uni- rsity system to enter the ranks of the learned ofessions. He studied medicine in Aberdeen; d after he entered the army he devoted any ave of absence he could obtain to continuing s studies in the medical schools of Paris and ienna. He was greatly devoted to his profes- on; and his views in connection with it, and pecially from the standpoint of the Army Med- al Department, were sound, liberal, and practi- l.

Dr. Shepherd had served in South Africa on a rmer occasion in a line regiment, and also in ndia with the 5th Lancers, and was more than nce attached to the Artillery. Wherever he ent he attracted notice and esteem by the ster- ng integrity of his character, his professional kill, and his genial, sympathetic nature. Dur- ng the last few months of his stay in England he devoted his time and labor to the revived Hospitaller work of the Order of St. John. This work—qualifying people to render first aid to the injured in the accidents of daily life—fascinated him, and it became with him a labor of love.

By his assiduous teaching many persons engaged in business, or belonging to the volunteers or the police, are enabled to treat cases of accident in a scientific manner, thus mitigating much pain and saving many a valuable life.

It is not at all an unusual sight in London to see a civilian or a policeman who has been a pupil of Dr. Shepherd's step from a crowd which has gathered round a person that has been knocked down and run over by a vehicle in the street, and take the necessary appliances from his pocket and proceed in a business-like manner to assist the unfortunate individual. This is the result of the teaching of Surgeon-Major Shepherd. His last work in England was a handbook for the ambulance classes of the Order, of which he had been elected an Honorary Associate. It is a contribution to practical philanthropy.

Dr. Shepherd leaves a widowed mother in Scotland, a brother in Natal, and many sorrowing friends. The manner of his death was truly heroic. He was, with some gunners of the Royal Artillery, in retreat before the Zulus, when he observed one of the men fall. He at once, and notwithstanding the nearness of the enemy, dismounted to attend to the wounded man, when he was struck down himself, never more to rise.

Love to his fellow-man was with him a ruling passion.

AN AGED ZULU MARTYR.

Mr. Witt tells of one old man, who was between eighty and ninety years of age, having heard the Gospel preached while in Natal, and then coming to the missionary to ask further teaching. The missionary warned him of the penalty he would be most likely called upon to pay if he were taught while in the Zulu king's dominions, where his home was. To this he made answer that he "feared not death if he could learn more of such love as that of the Saviour."

The missionary went and pleaded with the king, who would not give him a definite promise of exemption of the old man from a public execution, which was laid down by Zulu law to be carried out by the soldiers upon all who professed a belief in the Saviour. The sentence was not carried out immediately, but after a short time the soldiers of Cetewayo appeared at the entrance of his hut and summoned the old man forth to be executed outside.

He begged for a few moments' respite while he "talked with the Great One." He then knelt down and prayed for the king and his officers, and for his people that their eyes might be opened. So while still on his knees he was killed by the assegais of the soldiers.

TWO REMARKABLE CONVERSIONS.

Out of many instances of the usefulness of the London Evangelization Society, which sends out evangelists to preach the Gospel, the following conversions took place in a village, where, by invitation of the rector, an evangelist was sent to preach in the school-room.

There lived in the village a medical man who had but little thought of God. Hasty in temper, he not infrequently gave way to profane language. He was fond of cards and company. He had a pious mother, and a wife whose earnest prayer was that he might be brought to the knowledge of the truth. He came to hear the evangelist, and from the first night, he seems to have understood the Scriptures and embraced Christ. Not only, however, was he brought nigh, but his man-servant and two maids were also convinced of sin, and learned to rejoice in hope. The two young women have left the parish, but so long as they remained they lived consistently. The man continues, and is true to his earthly master and to his God; animated by the same Spirit, he is a friend as well as a servant. Never was a change more marked than in the doctor and his man. The master, however, is the more prominent; he is now the leader in family devotions, having determined at once that he, as well as his house, would henceforth serve the Lord.

He never undertakes a fresh case without prayer, and his medicines are doubly prized because on each box, on each bottle of "stuff," a printed text is pasted, and those texts are read and greatly valued. He often reads the Bible to the poor.

Not long ago a young soldier, having served his time, came home from India to the village. He had come only to die, but he did not know it. When he learned his danger he did not put away from him the thought of death, but built his hope of the life to come on his own morality. The doctor showed him a more perfect way, and soon the dying man rejoiced. With his latest breath almost he sent a message to the doctor, saying, "Tell him I am going to join the great army above, and Jesus the Captain of our salvation." Other cases of conversion have taken place through timely counsels uttered by the doctor.

Dr. Livingstone's Father.—The Rev. Henry Wilkes, D.D., Professor of Theology in the Congregational College, Montreal, in a sermon said: "A shrewd intelligent man was walking aimlessly in the street about ten o'clock on Sunday morning, in a town some twelve miles from Glasgow. He was in much spiritual distress of soul, and knew not which way to turn. Being accosted by a friend, he was asked to attend service in the Independent chapel, where a young man from America was to officiate that day. He complied, and the day's instruction was the means of his relief; he found rest in the Saviour, and in due time joined himself to the church, bringing with him, of course, his young family. That was the family in which the renowned David Livingstone, the African missionary and explorer, was then a boy, for his father was the man who on that Sunday received the blessing. I did not learn these facts until more than twenty-five years afterwards."

A Good Paymaster.—Mr. Wesley once, when he was making a collection, urged the people to give, and in this way to lend their money to the Lord, adding, "The Lord is a good paymaster." These words made such an impression upon the mind of a little boy who was present that he put a shilling into the plate. This was the only coin that he possessed. He fully expected that his shilling would soon come back to him, and as time passed on and it did not return he felt disappointed. Twenty years rolled away, and the boy had grown up to be a rich man, and, what is infinitely better, a real Christian. One day he met Mr. Wesley, and reminded him of his words, telling him also how he had acted upon them. "And so," he added, "the Lord is a good paymaster, for I am this day worth twenty thousand pounds, and, I trust, have the grace of God in my heart."

Spiritualistic Madness.—An article in the Journal of Psychological Medicine, entitled "On Moral and Criminal Epidemics," states that the Spiritualistic faith in America is computed to embrace 1,000,000 of believers, and hundreds of thousands in other lands, with 10,000 mediums. It appears that these include men in all ranks of society, from the highest to the lowest. Many of the facts related imperatively demand that we should consider this as a delusion, not altogether an imposture, especially the consideration of the number who have gone insane on the subject. It is said that amongst the lunatics confined in public asylums in the United States, there are 7520 who have become such entirely owing to this "spirit faith." The Medical Press and Circular of London has received correspondence from America on the subject, in which it is credibly informed of the large number of insane Spiritualists at the present time confined in the institutions of the United States.

EASTER MORNING.

Our Own Resurrection.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, April 13, 1879.

"Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept."—1 Cor. 15 : 20.

The Voices of the Flowers—The Risen Christ a Prophecy of our own Resurrection—Death the Great Conqueror—The Doctrine of the Resurrection surrounded with Mysteries—A Sound that Penetrates through the World—The Resurrection in Cemeteries—In Solitary Places—In the Sea—The Resurrection Body—I. A Glorious Body—All Physical Defects removed—The Face Unveiled—II. An Immortal Body—Free from Disease and Pain—III. A Powerful Body—No more Weariness—A Shipwrecked Father and his Son.

On this glorious Easter morning, amid the music and the flowers, I give you Christian salutation. This morning, Russian meeting Russian on the streets of St. Petersburg hails him with the salutation "Christ is risen!" and is answered by his friend in salutation "He is risen indeed!" In some parts of England and Ireland, to this very day, there is the superstition that on Easter morning the sun dances in the heavens; and well may we forgive such a superstition which illustrates the fact that the natural world seems to sympathize with grace.

Hail! Easter morning. Flowers! Flowers! All of them a-voice, all of them a-tongue, all of them full of speech to-day. I bend over one of the lilies and I hear it say: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." I bend over a rose, and it seems to whisper: "I am the Rose of Sharon." And then I stand and listen. From all sides there comes the chorus of flowers, saying: "If God so clothed the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?"

Flowers! Flowers! Braid them into the bride's hair. Flowers! Flowers! Strew them over the graves of the dead, sweet prophecy of the resurrection. Flowers! Flowers! Twist them into a garland for my Lord Jesus on Easter morning, and "glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be."

My friends, this morning, I find in the risen Christ a prophecy of my text setting forth the idea that as Christ has risen so His people will rise. He the first sheaf of the resurrection harvest. He "the first-fruits of them that slept." Before I get through this morning I will walk through all the cemeteries of the dead, through all the country graveyards, where your loved ones are buried, and I will pluck off these flowers, and I will drop a sweet promise of the Gospel—a rose of hope, a lily of joy on every tomb—the child's tomb, the husband's tomb, the wife's tomb, the father's grave, the mother's grave; and while we celebrate the resurrection of Christ, we will at the same time celebrate the resurrection of all the good. "Christ the first-fruits of them that slept."

If I should come to you this morning, and ask you for the names of the great conquerors of the world, you would say Alexander, Cæsar, Philip, Napoleon I. Ah! my friends, you have forgotten to mention the name of a greater conqueror than all these of whom I spoke, a ghastly conqueror. He rode on a black horse across Waterloo and Atlanta and Chalons, the bloody hoofs crushing the hearts of nations. It is

THE CONQUEROR DEATH.

He carries a black flag, and he takes no prisoners. He digs a trench across the hemispheres and fills it with the carcasses of nations. Fifty times would the world have been depopulated had not God kept making new generations. Fifty times the world would have swung lifeless through the air—no man on the mountain, no man on the sea, an abandoned ship ploughing through immensity.

Again and again has he done this work with all generations. He is a monarch as well as a conqueror; his palace a sepulchre; his fountains the falling tears of a world. Blessed be God, in the light of this Easter morning I see the prophecy that his sceptre shall be broken, and his palace shall be demolished. The hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth. Christ risen, we shall rise. Jesus "the first-fruits of them that slept." Now, around this doctrine of the resurrection there are a great many

MYSTERIES.

You come to me this morning, and say, If the bodies of the dead are to be raised, how is this, and how is that? and you ask me a thousand questions I am incompetent to answer; but there are a great many things you believe that you are not able to explain. You would be a very foolish man to say: "I won't believe any thing I can't understand."

Why, putting down one kind of flower-seed, comes there up this flower of this color? Why, putting down another flower-seed, comes there up a flower of this color? One flower white, another flower yellow, another flower crimson. Why the difference when the seeds look to be very much alike—are very much alike? Explain these things. Explain that wart on the finger. Explain the difference—why the oak leaf is different from the leaf of the hickory. Tell me how the Lord Almighty can turn the chariot of His omnipotence on a rose leaf. You ask me questions about the resurrection I cannot answer. I will ask you a thousand questions about everyday life you cannot answer. I find my strength in this passage: "All who are in their graves shall come forth." I do not pretend to make the explanation. You go on and say: "Suppose a returned missionary dies in Brooklyn; when he was in China his foot was amputated; he lived years after in England and there he had an arm amputated; he is buried to-day in Greenwood; in the resurrection will the foot come from China, will the arm come from England, and will the different parts of the body be reconstructed in the resurrection? How is that possible?"

You say that "the human body changes every seven years, and by seventy years of age a man has had ten bodies; in the resurrection which will come up?" You say, "A man will die and his body crumble into the dust, and that dust be taken up into the life of the vegetable; an animal may eat the vegetable, men eat the animal; in the resurrection, that body, distributed in so many directions, how shall it be gathered up?" Have you any more questions of this style to ask? Come on, and ask them. I do not pretend to answer them. I fall back upon the announcement of God's Word: "All who are in their graves shall come forth."

You have noticed, I suppose, in reading the story of the resurrection, that almost every account of the Bible gives the idea that the characteristic of that day will be

A GREAT SOUND.

I do not know that it will be very loud, but I knew it will be very penetrating. In the mausoleum where silence has reigned a thousand years that voice must penetrate. In the coral cave of the deep that voice must penetrate. Millions of spirits will come through the gates of eternity, and they will come to the tombs of the earth, and they will cry: "Give us back our bodies; we gave them to you in corruption, surrender them now in incorruption. Hundreds of spirits hovering about the crags of Gettysburg, for there the bodies are buried. A hundred thousand spirits coming to Greenwood, for there the bodies are buried, waiting for the reunion of body and soul.

All along the sea route from New York to Liverpool, at every few miles where a steamer went down, departed spirits coming back, hovering over the wave. There is where the City of Boston perished. Found at last. There is where the President perished. Steamer found at last. There is where the Central America went down. Spirits hovering—hundreds o spirits hovering, waiting for the reunion of bod and soul. Out on the prairie a spirit alights. There is where a traveller died in the snow Crash! goes Westminster Abbey, and the poet and orators come forth; wonderful minglin of good and bad. Wilberforce the good—Quee Elizabeth the bad. Crash! go the Pyramid of Egypt, and the monarchs come forth. Wh can sketch the scene? I suppose that one moment before that general rising there will be a entire silence, save as you hear the grinding of wheel, or the clatter of the hoofs of a processio passing into the cemetery. Silence in all th caves of the earth. Silence on the side of th mountain. Silence down in the valleys and fa out into the sea. Silence.

But in a moment, in the twinkling of an ey as the archangel's trumpet comes pealing, rol ing, crashing across the mountain and sea, th earth will give one terrific shudder, and th graves of the dead will heave like the waves the sea, and Ostend and Sebastopol and Chalo will stalk forth in the lurid air, and the drowne will come up and lift up their wet locks abo the billow; and all the land and all the sea b come one moving mass of life—all faces, all age all conditions gazing in one direction and upo one throne—the throne of resurrection. "A who are in their graves shall come forth."

"But," you say, "if this doctrine of the r surrection is true, as prefigured by this East morning, Christ "the first-fruits of them th slept, Christ rising a promise and a prophe of the rising of all His people, can you tell something about

THE RESURRECTED BODY?"

I can. There are mysteries about that, bu shall tell you three or four things in regard the resurrected body that are beyond guessi and beyond mistake.

I. In the first place, I remark in regard to yo resurrected body it will be a glorious body. T body we have now is a mere skeleton of what would have been if sin had not marred and faced it. Take the most exquisite statue th was ever made by an artist, and chip it here a chip it there with a chisel, and batter and bru it here and there, and then stand it out in t storms of a hundred years, and the beauty wo be gone. Well, the human body has been ch ped and battered and bruised and damaged w the storms of thousands of years—the physi defects of other generations coming down fr generation to generation, we inheriting the in licities of past generations; but in the morn of the resurrection the body will be adorned beautified according to the original mo And there is no such difference between a gy nast and an emaciated wretch in a lazaretto there will be a difference between our bodie they are now and our resurrected forms.

There you will see the perfect eye, after waters of death have washed out the stain tears and study. There you will see the perf hand, after the knots of toil have been un from the kuckles. There you will see the f erect and elastic, after the burdens have gone the shoulder—the very life of God in the bod

In this world, the most impressive thing, most expressive thing, is the human face; that face is veiled with the griefs of a thous years; but in the resurrection morn that will be taken away from the face, and the n day sun is dull and dim and stupid compa with the outflaming glories of the countena of the saved. When those faces of the ri eous, those resurrected faces, turn toward gate, or look up toward the throne, it wil like the dawning of a new morning on the bo of everlasting day! O glorious, resurre body!

II. But I remark also in regard to that b which you are to get in the resurrection, it be

AN IMMORTAL BODY.

These bodies are wasting away. Somel has said as soon as we begin to live we begi die. Unless we keep putting the fuel into ırnace the furnace dies out. The blood-vessels re canals taking the breadstuffs to all parts of ne system. We must be reconstructed hour by our, day by day. Sickness and death are all ne time trying to get their prey under the tenement, or to push us off the embankment of the rave; but, blessed be God, in the resurrection, e will get a body immortal. No malaria in the ir, no cough, no neuralgic twinge, no rheumatic ang, no fluttering of the heart, no shortness f breath, no ambulance, no dispensary, no hosital, no invalid's chair, no spectacles to improve ne dim vision; but health, immortal health! ye who have aches and pains indescribable nis morning—O ye who are never well—O ye ho are lacerated with physical distresses, let ne tell you of the resurrected body, free from all isease. Immortal! Immortal!

III. I go farther, and say in regard to that body hich you are to get in the resurrection, it will e

A POWERFUL BODY.

We walk now eight or ten miles, and we are tigued; we lift a few hundred pounds, and we re exhausted; unarmed, we meet a wild beast, nd we must run, or fly, or climb, or dodge beause we are incompetent to meet it; we toil ight or ten hours vigorously, and then we are eary; but in the resurrection we are to have a ody that never gets tired. Is it not a glorious ought?

Plenty of occupation in heaven. I suppose roadway, New York, in the busiest season of ne year, at noonday, is not so busy as heaven all the time. Grand projects of mercy for ther worlds. Victories to be celebrated. The ownfall of despotisms on earth to be announcd. Great songs to be learned and sung. Great xpeditions on which God shall send forth His hildren. Plenty to do, but no fatigue.

If you are seated under the trees of life, it will ot be to rest, but to talk over with some old omrade, old times—the battles where you ought shoulder to shoulder. Jacob and the ngel wrestled together. Jacob was not thrown, ecause the angel favored him. But once get our resurrected body, and the angel could not restle you down. It is impossible to wrestle own the giants of God on high. Strong, suple, unexhausted, mighty, immortal. Oh! is it ot a glorious thought?

Sometimes in this world we feel we would like have such a body as that. There is so much ork to be done for Christ, there are so many ears to be wiped away, there are so many burens to lift, there is so much to be achieved for hrist, we sometimes wish that from the first of anuary to the last of December we could toil n without stopping to sleep, or take any rereation, or to rest, or even to take food—that e could toil right on without stopping a moment in our work of commending Christ and leaven to all the people. But we all get tired.

It is a characteristic of the human body in his condition: we must get tired. Is it not a lorious thought that after a while, after the serice of God, we are going to have a body that ill never get weary? O glorious resurrection lay! Gladly will I fling aside this poor body of in and fling it into the tomb, if at Thy bidding shall have a body that never wearies. That as a splendid resurrection hymn that was sung t my father's burial:

> "So Jesus slept, God's dying Son
> Passed through the grave and blessed the bed.
> Rest here, blest saint, till from His throne
> The morning breaks to pierce the shade."

O blessed resurrection! Speak out, sweet lowers, beautiful flowers. While you tell of a isen Christ, tell of the righteous who shall rise. lay God fill you this morning with anticipaion!

A SHIPWRECKED FATHER AND SON.

I heard of a father and son who, among others, vere shipwrecked at sea. The father and the on climbed into the rigging. The father held n, but the son after a while lost his hold in the igging and was dashed down. The father supposed he had gone hopelessly under the wave. The next day the father was brought ashore from the rigging in an exhausted state, and laid in a bed in a fisherman's hut, and after many hours had passed he came to consciousness, and saw lying beside him on the same bed his boy.

O my friends! what a glorious thing it will be if we wake up at last to find our loved ones beside us? coming up from the same plot in the graveyard, coming up in the same morning light—the father and son alive forever, all the loved ones alive forever, nevermore to weep, nevermore to part, nevermore to die.

May the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant make you perfect in every good work, to do His will; and let this brilliant scene of the morning transport our thoughts to the grander assemblage before the throne. This august assemblage is nothing compared with it. The one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the "great multitude that no man can number," some of our best friends among them, we, after a while, to join the multitude. Blessed anticipation.

> "Blest are the saints beloved of God,
> Washed are their robes in Jesus' blood,
> Brighter than angels, lo! they shine,
> Their wonders splendid and sublime.
>
> "My soul anticipates the day,
> Would stretch her wings and soar away,
> To aid the song, the palm to bear,
> And bow, the chief of sinners, there."

A LETTER FROM AN INDIAN MOTHER.

ABOUT three years ago a gentleman went from New York to Mexico, where, in a Mission Orphanage, he was attracted by the bright eyes and gentle manners of a little Aztec girl, eight years of age, and became so much interested in her that, by consent of the mother, the child was legally adopted by him and brought to his home in West Philadelphia.

"Etenita," as the girl is named, has made rapid progress in her studies, speaks English very well, and is warmly loved and cherished in her new home.

Last January she found an opportunity of writing to her mother in Mexico, and the mother returned a reply by the same traveller, which is translated as follows:

My Dear Little Daughter:

I have received your little letters, which I have bathed with my tears, for the distance which separates us is to me an eternity. If I had not the consolation to know how much you are loved and the progress you make, surely my brain would turn and I would go mad. But what consoles me is the hope to see you cared for and protected by Providence. Devote yourself to all what they teach you; respect and obey your second fathers; do not give them any cause of grief; show them in every thing an eternal gratitude; for with nothing shall we be able to repay them the love they have for you.

I have received a ball which you send to Marcelo, and lately five dollars, and in the interview I had with the gentleman who brought them I received from him the favor which demanded my presence, and he made Marcelo a present of a dollar.

He tells me that you are very stout, and I am very glad. Your brother and I are in good health, wishing only to see you. Receive kind regards from your school companion, Francisca Martines, who sends you a breast-pin, insignificant, but the keepsake must be acknowledged and thanked for. Mrs. Hooker and other persons of estimation desire to be remembered to you. Pray to God for your protectors, for your mother here does not cease to do so.

Receive my blessing, and God may grant you his.

Your mother, who loves you,

NEMESIA BARCENAS

THE SUFFERINGS OF MARTYRS.

THE stories of martyrs, and their patience and endurance through years of imprisonment and suffering, or beneath the most affecting cruelties, would fill whole volumes. The Church was born amidst the fires of martyrdom, and some of the most touching stories belong to the ages of paganism, to those times when the forty martyrs, mentioned by St. Basil, comforted one another as they were cast out naked all night in the winter, to be burned the next day, with the song:

"Sharp is the winter," said they, "but sweet is paradise; painful is the frost, but joyful is the fruit that follows it. We wait but a while and Abraham's bosom shall cherish us; after one night we shall lay hold upon eternal life; let our feet feel the fire for a season, that we may forever walk arm-in-arm with angels; let our hands fall off, that they may be forever lifted up to the praise of the Almighty."

The dying moments of martyrs have sometimes been very remarkable. John Huss made a remarkable pun as he was entering the flames, in allusion to his own name, which signified a "goose;" he said, "Are you going to burn a goose? In one century you will have a swan you can neither roast nor boil." His meaning seemed to be that Gospel truth would in the future win its widening way with rapid flight, notwithstanding all opposition: Luther is said to have had a swan for his heraldic arms.

When the executioner went behind Jerome of Prague to set fire to the pile, the martyr said, "Come here, and kindle it before my eyes: if I dreaded such a sight, I should never have come to this place, when I had so many opportunities to escape." The tortures of some martyrs have been almost incredible. John Lambert suffered by inches at a slow fire; if it kindled higher and stronger than the executioners desired, they removed it away; when his legs were burnt off, they pitched his body upon pikes, and lacerated his broiling flesh with halberts. Yet he was strangely, even miraculously, supported through all this anguish; he lifted up his hands, all flaming with fire, exclaiming, "None but Christ, none but Christ!"

The doctrines of truth have in many ages been preserved through long nights of persecution, like the tabernacle in the wilderness. The stories of the pastors of the desert, the Huguenots of France, who suffered, but sustained their faith in obscurity after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, are full of excitement.

Monsieur Homel, pastor of the Protestant church of Vivaretz, in the province of Cevennes, was broken on the wheel with circumstances of peculiar cruelty; every limb, member, and bone in his body was broken during forty hours, before he was permitted to receive the stroke of death. He said to his wife, "Farewell once more, my beloved wife: I am waiting for you; and be sure, though you see my body broken to shivers my soul is replenished by inexpressible joys."

Queen Victoria and the Soldier.—An instance of the Queen of England's consideration and kindly interest in those around her occurred at Windsor Castle on March 18th. About three o'clock, Private Stone, of the second Battalion Coldstream Guards, was doing sentry duty at the Victoria Tower on the east terrace, where the apartments of the royal family are situated, when he was suddenly taken ill. Her Majesty, noticing the condition of the soldier, immediately sent for one of the royal surgeons and the sergeant of the guard. Some cushions were then placed in a cab, and in this Private Stone was removed to the regimental hospital.

A Converted Rumseller's Work was mentioned at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting on Thursday, April 3d. Prayer was asked for God's help and blessing in temperance efforts to be put forth in Hackensack, N. J., by two friends, one of whom had been a godless rumseller, but was converted to Christ, and is now actively engaged in temperanec work. This is the best kind of repentance.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE AT MILDMAY PARK, LONDON.

The Two Resurrections.

A Paper Read by Rev. J. Gosset-Tanner.

The Appearing of the Lord and the Resurrection of the Just Simultaneous—Two Important Questions—The Identity of the Believer with the Lord—A Special and Exceptional Resurrection—Priority of a Thousand Years—The Saints in their Resurrection Bodies at the Marriage of the Lamb—The Unclothed Soul is in an Imperfect State—Three Classes—A Still Worse Antichrist—Practical Thoughts.

I AM sure, dear friends, you will continue in prayer for me; because, although most of us are accustomed to address audiences, perhaps often as large as this, yet it needs great grace and great humility to speak to so many students of prophecy, so many who have been searching the Word for many years; and therefore I am sure that you will look up, moment by moment, asking that the Lord would enable me to deliver the testimony concerning Himself—the exact testimony that He would have delivered;—and that you may not look to any human speaker or human voice, but to the great Prophet, the Teacher of His Church.

We are all agreed that the blessing for which we are waiting is the appearing of the great God—of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; and next in order, although we yearn so earnestly to see Him who has washed us from our sins in His own precious blood, and loves us with an everlasting love—next, we cannot help longing to be clothed upon with our house, which is from Heaven, the glorified body; and we know that both these events will take place at the same moment. For we read in Col. 3 : 4, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear then shall ye also appear with Him in glory." It is when the Saviour comes from Heaven, that Paul says to the Philippians, He will change the body of our humiliation and fashion it like to His glorious body.

Thus

arise: When will this first resurrection take place? and, further, is there Scriptural ground for concluding that the resurrection of the just, as the Saviour Himself terms it, is separate from the resurrection of the unjust, by at least a thousand years?

There is much Scriptural truth upon this subject, with which, I doubt not, that nearly all of you are familiar already. But there is a line of argument which seems to me important and conclusive, and it is this: the Lord Jesus Christ is confessedly one with His Church. As Paul tells us in Eph. 5, "We are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones;" and how much there is involved in this one Spirit, one body, one flesh.

And in Rom. 8 we read, with regard to God the Father, "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son," made like His Son, "that He might be the first-born among many brethren." Yes! the brethren are to be like the first-born in every respect. Again, in Heb. 2 : 17, we read: "Wherefore in all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren;" so you see there is not one point to be expected in which the great Head of the Church is not made like unto His brethren.

Now, it is undoubtedly true that all the saints died in Christ; if one died, then all died. If indeed we be Christ's, if really His, we have all paid the penalty of sin, we have all died in Him. When He was nailed to the cross we all died to the power of sin, being crucified with Him.

If, then, one with Christ in His death, it follows we are one with Him in His resurrection; and thus Paul argues in Rom. 6 : 5, "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection." In Eph. 2 : 5, "Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ (by grace we are saved); and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." And in Col. 3 : 1, "If ye then be risen with Christ." We are risen with Christ.

Now, dear friends, was not the resurrection of the Lord Jesus a special and exceptional resurrection? Christ the first-fruits, as we see in 1 Cor. 15 : 23: "Christ the first-fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at His coming."

And if His resurrection be special and exceptional, must not the resurrection of all the brethren who are like the first-born be special and exceptional too? He is the first-fruits of them that sleep. When the Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead, the rest of the dead slept on: and thus there is therefore a strong argument for concluding that so we are to be raised. Planted together with Christ, in the likeness of His resurrection, that when we shall be raised from our graves, the rest of the dead sleep on.

And we have this same thought alluded to in Heb. 13 : 20, where it is the Great Shepherd of the sheep that raised from the dead our Lord Jesus. And shall not all the sheep be carried over Jordan in the same way, and be raised from the dead in the same way?

In Col. 1 we read that it is as Head of the Church that Christ is first-born of the Church. The same expression which we have in Rev. 1 : 5, "The first-begotten of the dead." Surely, if He has the pre-eminence, all His brethren will share His priority. Yes! they must, or else there would be one point in which Christ was not made like His brethren; and there would be a point in which the brethren were not finished like the first-born. And oh! how abundantly is this proved to us by many passages of the Holy Scriptures!

THERE IS A COMPLETE ONENESS.

We may, perhaps, then glance at Psa. 49 : 14—a psalm from which the author of "Ecce Homo" declares that the writer had no idea of a resurrection, and made man like the beasts that perish. "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them, and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning." When? In the resurrection morning of the Millennium. "And their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling." I take this to mean the grave or the unseen world. Their beauty vanished like a fading flower; at the time when all Jesus Christ's own people are to be glorified like to Him.

And then, passing over many Scriptures which fully establish the latter, the next question, and one of the deepest interest to ourselves, is, Who are they that will share in this first resurrection? This brings us to Rev. 20. Now it is proved, by a great variety of Scripture, that there will be a resurrection of the just. For instance, the well-known passage in 1 Cor. 15 : 22, etc.—"In Christ shall all be made alive." "Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at His coming. Then"—or it might better be translated, next in order—"cometh the end." And now, in Rev. 20, we find that the resurrection of the just will antedate the resurrection of the unjust by at least a thousand years. It occurs at least six times over in this short chapter, "a thousand years."

Now there are many people who, in reading over this fourth verse, have come to the conclusion that only the souls of the martyrs will be raised. "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years," or, the thousand years (Revelation 20 : 4).

I must confess there was a time when I used to gather from this passage that only the souls of the martyrs should be raised; but it is necessary we should carefully study chap. 19, in its bearings on this chap. 20. And we have to recollect that it has been distinctly revealed by Paul, in 1 Cor. 15 and in 1 Thess. 4, that all the people who are the Lord's will be caught up to meet Him in the air, and that all the dead in Christ shall rise first, and then we who remain shall be caught up to meet Him in the air. And what is so fully and distinctly declared, needed not again to be declared in the Book of Revelation. But it is distinctly found in this Book. For instance, we find people in heaven saying, in the nineteenth chapter, "Alleluia, salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God."

And then we come to a still greater truth in the sixth verse, where a great multitude not only cry "Alleluia! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," but they add, "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to Him, for

is come, and His wife hath made herself ready." Now, dear friends, can you for one moment imagine, when that wondrous time, the marriage of the Lamb, is come, that the saints who compose the body of Christ will not have put on their resurrection body?

At that blessed time, we know from Eph. 5 : 27, that the Lord will present to Himself the Bride,—"a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but it should be holy and without blemish." As there is no spot of sin on the Bride, so there is no wrinkle of decay. Surely that time must have arrived when the Lord's people are sanctified wholly; when their spirit, soul, and body are united, and when the Lord's people shall have reached the climax of happiness, the summit of perfection. Can we imagine, upon any scriptural ground, they will not be wearing their resurrection bodies?

It would be an imperfect state, although the body sometimes clogs us down; we are tol that it is an imperfect state for the soul to b without the body.

Surely we may most distinctly argue from thi that when the marriage of the Lamb is come, al the saints that compose the Bride are clothe upon with their house which is from heaven and it is added, "To her was granted that sh should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and glistening."

Then, again, we read about the Lord Jesu Christ coming forth from heaven as the Faithfu and True, to judge and make war in righteous ness; and in verse 14 we read, "And the armie which were in heaven followed Him upon whit horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean, and it was "the fine linen which is the righ eousness of the saints." It means impute righteousness, and the angels do not need tha They come forth with the Lord Jesus Chris when He comes "clothed with a vesture dippe in blood" to punish them that obey not the Go pel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

And it appears to me, coming to chap 20: we have the alluded to here. John says, "I saw thrones, a they that sat upon them." Who can sit upo thrones, but the armies of the saints who had fo lowed Jesus Christ out of heaven, having be caught up at some period previously? Wh surely they must be the same as we have se seated around the thrones in Rev. 4 : 4: "A round about the throne were four and twen seats, and upon the seats I saw four and twen elders sitting, clothed in white raiment; a they had upon their heads crowns of gold. (their heads crowns of gold; typifying the ev lasting love flowing from Christ. Yes, that pro ise is true which was given to the Laodicean "To him that overcometh will I grant to with Me in My throne, even as I also overcan and am set down with My Father in H throne."

And there is in chap. 14 another (yet absolu ly identical) class, the hundred and forty a four thousand, of whom we read in the fou verse, "These were redeemed from among m being the first-fruits unto God and to the Lan And in their mouth was found no guile, for th are without fault before the throne of God."

Then we read of another class: "I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God;" and yet the three classes, as it seems to me, are united in the remaining part of the verse, "For whosoever they were" (as one truly translates it) "who had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark in their foreheads, or in their hands."

Here, perhaps, all our brethren will not agree with me, but I can say that it appears to me the most natural conclusion, that during the interval between the rapture of the saints and the coming of Christ down to the earth, evil will have assumed a new and mighty form. Recognizing as I do that Popery is the great, present Antichrist, I yet am fully persuaded that there will come

A STILL WORSE ANTICHRIST.

In this interval, it seems to be clearly pointed out in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters, that this Antichrist will have assumed tremendous power, and all the world will serve him. Many people will be put to death at this time, and all those beheaded under this beast will be raised up together with those, whosoever they are all the world over, who have not worshipped the beast nor received his mark; and they, too, will share the glory and privilege of the first resurrection.

Now we read, "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." What can be more clear? If we take those words, as surely they ought to be taken, in their literal meaning, you see there is a vast difference between the first resurrection, the glory of the saints, and the second death: the one is the resurrection to life, and the other the resurrection to death and judgment. Even when raised up again they are called the dead. "I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God." Even when raised up, they are still, in the sight of God, dead; because their portion is the second death. Theirs is that sad, terrible portion—destruction from the presence of the Lord.

There is only time now for a very few flowing from this subject—because it is our desire that all this should be eminently practical. We read here, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." Oh, surely it must be just as we find Jacob said to Joseph, "The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills." Oh, has there not been an accumulating stream since then of blessing? the blessings of the patriarchs —how they have widened and expanded, until God has given us wonderful and great blessings, all blessings in heavenly places with Christ; and these blessings, which will descend on all those privileged to share them, will remain from the utmost bounds of the very stars, to the very gates of the Father's house.

Oh, how these blessings will increase when Christ comes in all His glory! There are two special blessings—the one of happiness, and the other of safety. Oh, the happiness of those who shall feel no more taint of sin, no more pain, or grief, or sorrow!

Dear friends, have we reason to expect that any of us shall share this blessedness? Oh, we ought to be happy even now. We belong to Him who is anointed with oil, and that oil descends to the skirts of His garments; should we not walk as happy ones? we, that are united to Him, who is pre-eminently glorious.

And then how safe are those who are Christ's. Upon such the second death has no power; and if we are of those brought under this wondrous covenant of blessing, "even life for evermore," it is best summed up in these words. I believe the whole blessing is summed up in that hundred and thirty-third Psalm, the whole blessing is this—"life for evermore." Oh, how safe are the children of God; and how happy are the saved of the Lord; who have the Eternal God for their refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms, and they will have part in the first resurrection!

Oh, how holy was that spotless one, though He had a body perfectly sympathizing with us, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. He sympathizes with us because He has the same body. Yet at the same time, wondrously, perfectly holy; separate from sinners. Are we part of His body? How holy ought we to be, then, even now? When we are presented before God, we must be without blame, and should not suffer any stain or sin to remain upon us even now. And by the power of that same mighty Spirit shall we not banish every thought that soils, every word and deed that would sully, that spotless purity? Oh, consider! Here we are all met together in the name of God, professing to be His real and true children; could it be said of all of us "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection?"

Are there any mere professors here? Because, although I cannot agree with those who say that when the Saviour comes the lukewarm will be left behind (by the lukewarm, I mean those that are not such decided followers of Christ as others), yet there cannot be any doubt whatever that the mere professors will be left behind. Hundreds will expect to be taken up who have only a name to live, but in reality are dead; who mix with the Lord's people, and seem to be like His people. But there will be a tremendous separation: "One shall be taken and the other left." Oh, let us fear, therefore, lest such a promise having been given, any of us should seem to come short. If really Christians we should not be too much occupied by the business and cares, or too much exalted by the joys, of this passing world. We are looking for the coming of the Bridegroom. It is the time when we expect our fullest, highest joy. Here we are kings, waiting for our coronation. Our calling is wondrous, heavenly.

Then, dear friends, we shall not be too much depressed by the failures, and falls even, of saints here below. Blessed is He who loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own precious blood. We must have long patience, for "His coming draweth nigh." We must have the appearance of His appearance, the beauty of His beauty, and the glory of His glory. So we wait in patience and in hope.

In all holy conversation and godliness, may it be ours, dear friends, to know that the first resurrection is ours; that we, as risen with Christ, take our place with Christ.

Then in His own blessed time—and may it be speedily—we who have enjoyed a foretaste of the resurrection here, shall know the fulness of the resurrection hereafter, and in the fulness of joy, stand in the presence of God, where there is life for evermore.

AN EXPERIENCE EATEN UP BY MICE.

"I WAS once making a missionary tour through Michigan," said a preacher, "when I called at a house that I had been told was occupied by a man bed-ridden for several years. I rapped at the door of the log cabin, introduced myself and my business, 'hunting up the Lord's own,' and was warmly welcomed by the man and his wife.

"After an hour's patient listening to the old man's story of his sickness and sufferings, in reply to a remark of mine to the effect that I trusted this experience of the Lord's chastenings had been blessed to him, and that he had a sure hope that when all was over he would go where they no more say, 'I am sick,' he brightened up wonderfully, saying, 'Why, yes, I had a 'sperience nigh onto thirty year ago; 'twas a wonderful 'sperience. I don't s'pose there was ever such a strange 'sperience happened to a body before or since. I writ it out so as not to forget it; but I haven't thought a word about it for more 'n a year, not since last big meetin', when Elder Graves called. I read it to him, and he said it was very wonderful. Betsey, hunt up my 'sperience; I want to read it to this preacher.'

"Then commenced a search through the numerous chinks and boxes in the cabin; old mouse-eaten letters and papers, bundles of herbs, packages of seeds, rolls of all sorts of stuff, were undone and looked over repeatedly, but in vain, and all the time the old man was moaning, 'Such a wonderful 'sperience, sir. I knowd my calling and 'lection was sure and sartin from that time; so I've never taken much trouble 'bout it since I'd once writ it out; and now them little mice have eaten up my 'sperience, and it's the undoin' of me.'

"In vain I tried to get him to tell it to me. He could only vary his lamentations by upbraiding his wife, 'You might have knowed, Betsey, that them little mice would eat it up if you didn't take keer of it.'

"He would have nothing from me at all, and I finally went away, leaving the wife still hunting, and he mourning as did Bunyan's Christian over his lost roll, for he really seemed to think it was his sure passport to heaven, without which he could not enter the pearly gates."

This is almost literally what a great many persons do. It was perhaps the beginning of Balaam's and Judas's falling away. Every Christian is in danger of taking for granted that he is all right, and so not giving heed to his daily standing before God. Hence the command: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." There is no doctrine of which the Word of God from Genesis to Revelation is more full than of this. In Psa. 50: 23 it is written, "To him that ordereth his conversation aright will I shew the salvation of God." And the Apostle Paul says, "Be not deceived: God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." (Gal. 6: 7.)

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

The aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

The Christian Herald is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons The Christian Herald, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of The Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the Herald have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the Herald has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending The Christian Herald in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Congress has done very little yet toward accomplishing the particular business for which it was called together. The first two weeks were consumed in the business of re-officering itself—a task which led to a great amount of caucusing and scheming generally, in both houses. The whole of the third week has been given to debate; otherwise but little progress has been made in the transaction of public business. It was hoped when the extra session was first called that it would be a short one, but the prospect of a prolonged session daily increases. It is probable that the near prospect of the next Presidential election interferes with a concentration of attention on current affairs.

The Passover Feast, which Continues to this day to be observed by the Jews, began at sundown on April 7th, and lasted eight days. The command in Exod. 13: 7 is carefully obeyed by these people, who so grievously omit "the weightier matters of the law;" so for a week or more before the commencement of the Feast every house is thoroughly cleaned, and nooks and crannies are carefully searched for the least crumb of fermented bread or cake, and the children's pockets are turned inside out for the same purpose. Then, to throw off the responsibility of any mistake about the matter, a childish performance called "khomets" is gone through between husband and wife.

The day previous to Passover evening, the wife takes several slices of baker's bread, and, wrapping them separately in paper, throws one package into a corner, another behind the door, another into a cupboard, and so on. The husband then goes from place to place and collects all the packages, and the next day a bonfire is made in the yard and they are burned, to the no small delight of the children, appropriate prayers being chanted. This ceremony signifies that the dwelling has been purified by fire, and if there should still remain in the house any leaven, it is to be regarded as though it did not exist. Well did the Lord Jesus say of these very people, "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." (Matt. 15: 7–9.)

Prevention of Epidemic Diseases.—The National Board of Health, at its recent session in Washington, agreed upon a bill, designed to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases, especially the yellow-fever. It is acknowledged by Senator Harris, of Tennessee, to be in many respects an improvement upon the bill already introduced before the Senate by himself. It provides for the maintenance of three American medical experts on the island of Cuba, whose duty it will be to supervise the departure of vessels from that island to the United States, these experts to be army or navy surgeons, or surgeons of the Marine Hospital service who have experience in the workings of yellow-fever epidemics.

An objectionable feature, in the opinion of Senator Harris, is the provision requiring the coöperation of the National Board with the local quarantine authorities. After a conference of the resident members of the Board, no modification is deemed necessary: it will be reported to the Senate.

An Old Man, only Four Years of Age. A Persian monarch inquired of an aged man, "How many of the sun's revolutions hast thou counted?" "Sire," said the old man, "I am but four years of age." "What!" interrupted the King, "fearest thou not to answer me falsely, or dost thou jest on the very brink of the tomb?" "I speak not falsely," replied the aged man; "eighty long years have I wasted in folly and sinful pleasures and in amassing wealth, none of which I can take with me when I leave this world. Four only have I spent in doing good to my fellow-men, and shall I count those years which have been utterly wasted?" Like the Royal Preacher he "looked on all the works that his hands had wrought, and on the labor that he had labored to do, and behold all was vanity" (Ecclesiastes 2: 11).

Mr. Summerfield, the Eloquent Preacher, put the same thing in a Christian light during his last illness. He was visited by two clergymen, one of whom, commiserating his subjection to such suffering, in consequence of his ministerial labors, inquired, "How old are you?" To the astonishment of the divine the suffering saint replied: "I was born at Preston, in England, in 1798, and born again at Dublin, in Ireland, in 1817." The visitor expressed at once his surprise and curiosity at what to him was so strange a declaration. Mr. Summerfield, no less excited, with great propriety exclaimed, in the language of Jesus to Nicodemus, "Art thou a master in Israel, and knowest not these things?" and then related to the two the history of his own conversion. His clear testimony was not without beneficial effect upon their souls; and well would it be if every converted person would similarly "confess Christ before men."

A Terrible Prairie Fire occurred about three weeks ago in Battle Creek, Lincoln Co., which destroyed every thing in its path, and resulted in the death of three persons. Mr. Montgomery, a well-to-do farmer of the county, and his son, a boy of twelve, were at work, when they discovered the fire coming with the fleetness of a horse. The boy was caught in the flames and fell to the ground instantly. A neighbor by the name of Isaac Pfaff galloped up to Mr. Montgomery on a mule and induced him to mount behind him. Mr. Montgomery mounted, but seeing his boy fall, lost all presence of mind, and threw his arms around Mr. Pfaff, catching the bridle-reins and holding the mule still while they were enveloped in the flames. Both men dropped to the ground and the fire passed over them. The mule ran a short distance and fell dead. The two men rose to their feet, and the wind and fire took their clothing from them as they walked to the nearest field, about 100 yards distant. Mr. Pfaff's feet were so badly burned that his boots fell from him as he walked. A Mr. Manning came to them from the nearest house with a couple of quilts, which he wrapped about the two men, and carried them to the house. He then carried the dead boy to the house. Both men were perfectly rational, and conversed freely with those around them up to within a few hours of their death. Mr. Montgomery lived about two hours, and Mr. Pfaff lived until about eleven o'clock that night. Both men leave families, and Mr. Pfaff buried two children quite recently, one just a day previously to losing his own life.

Chinese Gambling in New York has received a check. On Wednesday, March 26th, the police broke into a den kept by Ah Wong, a Chinese physician, at 13 Mott Street. A large apartment in the rear of the building is devoted to gambling. This is said to be one of the largest establishments of the kind in the city. The walls of this room are ornamented with large pictures in scarlet and vermilion, and the atmosphere is heavy with many strange odors.

Chinamen have been seen coming out of this place, early in the morning, dressed in coarse bagging instead of the clothes usually worn by them. At first it was supposed that these men had been present at the performance of some religious rites, but it has been ascertained without doubt that they had gambled away the clothing they wore, and that these bags had been given them instead.

The infatuated players were unable to see that the bulk of their stakes went into the hands of the proprietors of the den, and were in the habit of attending in large numbers and squandering their hard-earned money in this miserable pursuit.

A Disastrous Fire broke out about one o'clock on Sunday morning, April 6, in the business part of the city of Philadelphia, and completely destroyed about thirty stores and manufacturing establishments, besides injuring other buildings. The loss is variously estimated at from 700,000 to 1,000,000 dollars. The flames were discovered issuing from a large five-story brick building on the corner of Race and Crown streets. That ructure was entirely destroyed, together with l contents. Adjoining this was a one-story uilding occupied by the Burring Machine Com- any, the great blank wall of which seemed at st a barrier to the further spread of the flames stward, but by and by the edge of the roof be- in to smoke and a curl of flame dashed out. the next building, which was also five stories height, was bound to go, and as no further stacle stood in the way of the flames, the fire read in all directions and jumped across the rrow streets with incredible rapidity. At day- ght, in spite of the utmost efforts of the whole ty Fire Department, the conflagration, it was ared for a time would be even worse than it as. The loss of life was limited to two per- ns, one a German beer-saloon keeper, who was badly hurt by a falling wall that he died dur- g the day; and the other his brother, who so was fatally injured. One man had both his ms broken, and several others were hurt.

What Tommy gave the Lord Jesus.—Tommy is the youngest of four little ones, whom their other was training for the service of the Lord. eggars were very numerous and persistent here they lived, and though often these are not al objects for pity, Mrs. C—— never liked to nd them away without helping them in some ay. She used to tell the little children that in e person of His poor they could minister to e Lord Himself.

One day a wretched-looking man came to the or, and the three older children brought out eir pence, or little offerings which they laid by ainst such cases. Tommy stood silent, and ep in thought. There was some struggle go- on in his little heart. He suddenly ran out the room and up to the nursery, returning th big tears in his blue eyes and a black rag- ll in his little fat hands. "O mammy, mam- . I have only my black dolly to give to Jesus day, and I do love her so—here!" and pushing into his mother's hands, he fairly sobbed. s. C—— took the dolly, and, with a warm s on the little one's forehead, and a very full art, carried it out of the room, and, after giv- the beggar the pence, laid it carefully among choicest treasures. How the mother's heart oiced over the gift offered to the Lord Jesus t day!

A London Society Journal has an Article on J. B. Gough's Home Life in America, in ich it says: "J. B. Gough's usual fee for a ture is two hundred dollars, or about forty nds. Multiply these figures per night by one ndred and fifty nights—his yearly average of tures—and it will be seen that Mr. Gough's ome is equal to such a home as Hlliside. As atter of fact it is equal to much more; and ss open-handed giver than Gough would be is age wealthy. Gough has this home, but t literally is all. He has accumulated no npetency upon which to retire from his ardu- work. His charities have been boundless, ugh always unostentatious. He means to in harness, and retirement from his active is a thing that has never for a moment en- ed into his scheme of existence. To work in winter, to rest in the summer—that is his ole programme. For thirty-six years he has n, except during the summer months, inces- tly travelling. The distance he has journeyed ld have sufficed to carry him a dozen times nd the terraqueous globe. He has delivered rly eight thousand speeches; he has been rd by more human beings than any preacher ng. Spurgeon began to preach nearly ten rs later than Gough, and has spoken not re than half as often; Henry Ward Beecher not heard of until six years after Gough had ome the recognized king of teetotalism, and demand as a lecturer from a thousand plat- ns every winter."

illside House is picturesquely situated in unds of 240 acres, about six miles from the n of Worcester, which is forty-four miles n Boston. The library contains 3000 care- selected books, including many commenta- or expositions of the Bible.

"'Gainst Jesus Comes."—Little Norah, three years old, was sitting in the room where her grandmother and aunts were in conversation. Their subject was the Second Advent, and the happy meetings at the Mildmay Conference. Presently the little one looked up, and said, "Will Auntie Bessie put me on a clean pinafore 'gainst Jesus comes?" "A little child shall lead them." (Is. 11 : 6.) May we all be found ready and watching, with garments "unspotted from the world," "'gainst Jesus comes."

Mr. D. L. Moody's Work in Baltimore is thus commented on in a late number of the Advertiser: "So great is the desire to hear this most remarkable lay preacher, that in many instances the dinner hour among fashionable people has been changed to admit of attending the meetings. In one instance a wealthy gentleman and his wife, who are so fond of their comfort and so wedded to regularity that they have allowed nothing in twenty years to interfere with their dining at four o'clock, have changed the hour to five o'clock, just in order to attend the meetings, and this is but one of many similar instances. As a lady said in the inquiry meeting: 'The subject of religion, so long tabooed from our tables, has become the one absorbing topic.' Not an afternoon passes without witnessing the most extraordinary sights.

"Last Friday it was a belle and heiress, a Hebe in form, weeping in her carriage outside the chapel waiting until Mr. Moody would come out, in the hope that he might tell her what she must do to atone for the selfishness and frivolity of her life in the past. The day before it was a handsome young lady on her knees, surrounded by friends, praying that God might open her eyes to realize her error, and guide her to the truth. Yesterday it was the strange anomaly of a very young convert trying to comfort a lady past middle age, all of whose life was spent in the service of Christ, but who was yet shedding bitter tears of grief because she had not followed closer in the Master's footsteps. Again, it often happens that a mere girl, with Bible in hand, and her face lit up with enthusiasm, may be found trying to make plain the way to a man old enough to be her father." How forcibly does a case like the last remind us of the words quoted by our Saviour from Psalm 8 : 2: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise."

A Grand Dog Show has been opened at Gilmore's Garden, New York City, where a variety of strange and valuable dogs are exhibited. It is right that whatever is of value should be cared for, but the care may be overdone. We read that the animals arrived in carriages driven by liveried coachmen, in express wagons from the railway stations, and on foot from all parts of the city. Many of the exhibitors were ladies, who came to see what accommodation had been provided for their pets. The management thought straw was sufficient luxury for any dog, but many of the owners immediately ordered that this should be taken away, and the rough boards covered with the softest lamb's wool. The box intended for four days' occupation by St. Laurent, a black and tan setter valued at $200, was made gorgeous in maroon cloth, while glass and wire cages were provided for some still more delicate specimens.

A REFRESHING PROMISE.

A Sermon written at Mentone, by C. H. Spurgeon.

"I will water it every moment."—ISA. 27 . 3.

The Lord Merciful in Wrath—His Promises Particular—The Promise to Water the Church—I. The Necessity of it—Life Dependent on Creative Power—Adverse Agencies at Work—No Resource but in God—The Consequence if God Failed us—II. The Manner of it—A Perpetual Act—A Renewed Act—A Personal Act—III. The Certainty of it—God's Truth and Power—His Unchangeableness—His Faithfulness—His Pledge.

WHEN the Lord is most intent on justice He is at the same time earnest in His love. The day of vengeance of our God is also the acceptable year of the Lord. In the Scripture before us the prophet saith, "Behold, the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity" (Isa. 26 : 21), and He foretells that the Lord will come forth as one armed with a great and strong sword to smite the fiercest of His enemies with a deadly wound (Isa. 27 : 1); yet before He had bared his arm for the battle He prepared chambers of refuge for His people, that they might dwell as within closed doors until the tempest of indignation was overpast (Isa. 26 : 20).

The shoutings of war did not prevent the Lord from remembering His beloved and His song of love concerning her, for He saith, "In that day sing ye unto her, a vineyard of red wine. I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment." Happy people, who even in the day of wrath are satisfied with favor. Blessed heirs of grace, who hear the just and terrible avenger say concerning them, "Fury is not in me" (verse 4).

The love of the Lord towards His whole church goes forth to each individual member thereof; the care which he displays towards the vineyard is exercised upon each vine which He has planted. So, then, we may without hesitation believe that the Lord will do for us personally that which He promises to do for His people as a whole; else would there have been exceptions stated, and the word would have run thus—I will water a part of my vineyard, but a portion of the plants shall be left to be dried up. The Lord's Word is so truthful that it would never raise ungrounded expectations by general statements if there were, indeed, cases not included therein.

We are always safe in concluding that if the Lord had meant to shut out one believing soul from a privilege He would have mentioned it, for He has not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth, any thing which would militate against the happiness of any one of His people. This then, beloved friends, is the pledge of love concerning the spiritual life of my soul and yours, and the soul of every humble believer in Jesus,—"I will water it every moment." This is a precious promise, and the more we meditate upon it the more rich will it appear. May we now be watered by the Holy Ghost while we meditate upon this promised watering.

In warm climates irrigation is essential to fertility; hence, travellers see on all sides pools and watercourses, wheels and cisterns, and channels for the water to flow in. The watering arises from necessity, and it is carefully attended to, because otherwise the husbandman or gardener would look in vain for fruit. I remarked to a gardener in the South of France that the weather was bad, but he replied that it was good for the garden, for the rain gave plenty of water, and that was the chief thing.

In Paradise it was no mean advantage to its verdant bowers that a fourfold river pursued its course through its midst, and that before the rain had fallen upon the earth there went up a mist from the earth and watered the face of the ground. From the necessity and value of water to the plants of the earth the Lord would teach us our own need of His grace, and the preciousness of that grace, and render His promise of supply the more delightful to our souls.

That we may prize the goodness of the Lord in the promises before us we shall consider the necessity of our being watered, the manner in which the Lord promises to supply our need, and the certainty that He will do so. Oh for a living meditation, not upon the letter of the word only, but upon its innermost teaching!

I. There is a great necessity for the watering promised in the text. This we might conclude from the promise itself, since there is not one superfluous word of promise in the whole Scriptures, but it becomes more evident when we reflect that all creature life is dependent upon the perpetual outgoing of divine power. Existence is for the creatures have no power within themselves to preserve their own being; even the solid rocks as the great mountains would melt away as so many shadows if eternal Omnipotence did not every moment keep them in being. The world is not like a wheel, which, having received a great push from a strong hand, continues to revolve long after the hand is withdrawn; but the divine energy goes forth continually to uphold all things which it has made.

Now, the same law holds good in the more choice and illustrious works of God in the kingdom of grace, and multitudes of illustrations of this are to be found in Holy Writ. Believers are stones, but their upholding comes continually from the foundation; they are branches sucking nourishment perpetually from the stem, members of the body always deriving life from the Head. Towards God we are streams and not fountains; rays of light, not suns; lamps which must be trimmed and nourished with oil; sheep which need unceasing care and feeding. The inner life cannot live upon itself. It is one mark of its presence that the believer is not only dependent as a creature, but feels it as a living, sensible, instructed, and trustful creature. The Christian has no quarrel with the hint of utter weakness which is implied in the text, for He is right well aware that He must be each moment watered or he will dry up from the root and cease to be.

Moreover, the truth is specially certain as touching the believer, for a multitude of agencies are at work to dry up the moisture of his soul. As far as this world is concerned, He is planted in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; his sorrows tend to parch him, like a hot wind from the desert, and earthly joys are still more like a sirocco which burns as an oven. Satan's temptations scorch and wither our hearts unless the water of life is abundantly laid at our root; and the men of the world act after the same manner. If we trusted in ourselves we should soon be as the heath in the desert, or as the grass upon the housetops. Indwelling sin especially is a devouring blast, and would, if it acted without check and counterbalance, turn the garden of the soul into a desolate wilderness. We are as plants set in the blaze of a tropical sun, upon which a burning oven pours forth its tremendous heat. One moment without divine watering and shading would dry us up root and branch.

Neither have we any other source of supply but the living God. "All my springs are in thee." We have the ordinances and means of grace, but we cannot of ourselves fetch a blessing from them: the Spirit of God is as the dew and the rain, but we cannot command His influences; these lie altogether at the sovereign disposal of the Lord. To convince us of our utter impotence in the matter the Lord asks us in the book of Job, "Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds that abundance of water may cover thee?"

No, the bottles of heaven drop at Jehovah's bidding, and unless his good pleasure gives the land its refreshment "the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together," the brooks are dried up, and the springs of water fail. None can afford us a drop of spiritual water unless the infinite depths of divine grace overflow to us and the Lord visits the heart and waters it from the river of God, which is full of water. Hence the need that we cry with David, "I stretch forth my hands unto thee: my soul thirsteth after Thee, as a thirsty land."

Remember, also, that our need of divine watering is clearly seen when we consider what drought and barrenness and death would come upon us if His hand were withdrawn. Then would be fulfilled in us the prophecy of Jeremiah, "Their nobles have sent their little ones to the waters: they came to the pits, and found no water; they returned with their vessels empty: they were ashamed and confounded, and covered their heads. Because the ground is chapped, for there was no rain in the earth, the ploughmen were ashamed, they covered their heads." Then would our leaf wither and our root fail; as for fruit, there would be none, and we should be only fit for the burning. Without watering every moment the most faithful among us would be cast forth, and be only fit for the fire; every prophet would become a Balaam, every apostle a Judas, every disciple a Demas. We must be watered, and watered every moment, or we die. Lord, save us, we perish. Look down from heaven, and behold and visit this vine and the vineyard which Thy right hand hath planted.

II. This point is clear, and our experience daily brings it under our notice. Let us now carefully regard in which the Lord promises to water His people —"I will water it every moment."

Our first thought is excited by the perpetual act—"every moment" the Lord will water the vineyard. There is never a moment in which it ceases to need it, and, therefore, the supply is as constant as the demand. He further says, "Lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day," so that at all hours of the night, as well as of the day, the Lord's care is over His people. Mercy knows no pause. Grace has no canonical hours, or rather all hours are alike canonical: yea, and all moments too. We may stay our asking, but God doth not stay His giving. We may not perceive the flowings of His grace, and yet they are never suspended, no, not for a moment, or else it were not true,—"I will water it every moment."

This leads us to rest assured of our final perseverance, since His perseverance in watering will produce our perseverance in budding, leafing, and fruit-bearing, else were His watering in vain, His grace ineffectual, and His purpose defeated, and it would not be true that none had hurt the vineyard. Glory be to the great Keeper of the vines, He will give a good account of His charge, saying, "Of all that Thou gavest me I have lost none." Between here and heaven there will never be a moment in which the Lord will not water His people, and therefore never a moment in which they will be dried up, and so left to perish. Let faith lay hold of this and gather strength from it.

Nor is this all—the Lord's watering is a renewed act. He does not water us once in great abundance, and then leave us to live upon what He has already poured out. He does not cause so much rain to fall in one day as may water the earth for seven years, or there could not then be a daily dependence upon him for rain and dew; neither does He give grace enough to His servants at any one time to serve them for a month, or a week, or a day, or even an hour, but He waters them "every moment" that they may know that at no one instant of time can they do without Him.

He placed the whole fountain of living water in His Son, for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, but in our case He husbands His showers that we may seek and obtain new outflowings of the eternal life, and every moment come under new debts to His infinite love. It is very sweet to have it so, for thus we have each moment a reason for coming to Him, inasmuch as every moment He has something to impart to us. If we are conscious at this moment of our poverty we need not despair, nor even hang our heads, for the next moment has its appointed watering, and ere the clock has ticked faith may receive a flood of grace, according to the promise: "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground."

Attention should be gratefully directed to the fact that the watering promised by the Lord is a personal act: "I will water it." Apollos waters, but he cannot do it of himself, nor can he do it every moment, nor at all except as an instrument in the hands of God. The Lord doth His work effectually: as in creation He spake not in vain, but He spake and it was done, so in grace He waters, and we are watered indeed. Sweet is the truth that we are not left to second causes or agents; these might fail us in the hour of need, yea, they must prove liars unto us if we depended on them, for it would be impossible for any of them, or all of them put together, to water us every moment; but the all-sufficient God out of the measureless stores of grace can and will, in His own person, supply all His saints forever, giving them to be filled with His fulness and never to know a lack. Not even to angels has He left the care of His saints, but He himself through the mediation of His dear Son, doth every moment keep and water us by His effectua grace.

How condescending is this on the Lord's part He who leads forth the stars by their armie bows the heavens to visit your soul and min taking care that there shall be a channel for th water of life to flow to the poorest and meane of His people. How near this brings the Lo to us; and what an idea it gives us of His pe petual active presence. As the gardener stan over the plant, gently pouring the water around it and upon it, so as to feed the roots a wash the leaves, even so doth the Lord as it we stand over His people, watching over them good, and dispensing His grace with all wisd and prudence as they are able to receive it. (necessity calls for His abiding presence, and l love vouchsafes it. Every moment is the L near us, for every moment He waters us. Ev moment does He love us, because His love is tively demonstrating itself in condescending tions. His love suggests the watering, and watering proves His love. He is never wear the work which He has Himself undertake love, and which He will not delegate to ot because He is so well pleased with doing it H self.

III. This much suffices to fill our sle space: let us now, in the third place, cons the certainty that the Lord will water every that His own right hand hath planted. H vast number of arguments suggest themse but we will content ourselves with the ground of confidence which is found in the Himself and His previous deeds of love. Lord our God is true and cannot lie, and t fore if He says "I will water it," we need n ther guarantee that it will be done. "Hat said, and shall He not do it?" Has He broken the word which has once gone c His mouth? Assuredly not. The Lor mighty, and cannot therefore leave His pr unfulfilled from want of power to make it

He may safely say "I will," because n is impossible with Him. Man's "I wi often an empty boast; never is it so with th of hosts. Our souls need supplies so grea drain rivers of grace, but the all-sufficient able to meet the largest demands of the i erable company of His people and He wi them to His own honor and glory f Here, then, we see His truth, His powe His all-sufficiency all pledged to provide chosen, and we may be sure that the gu will stand.

The immutability and omnipresence both speak to the like effect. The L watered His people hitherto, and as He change they may expect the like treat His hands. He will neither revoke His nor cease from fulfilling it. Moreover, be with His needy servants every mom

His promise implies ; for it will never be said of Him, " Peradventure He is pursuing, or He is on a journey, or He sleepeth and must be awakened." While He is working in heaven and on earth, and in all deep places, yet can His gracious hand be busy among the tender plants of His grace, and that at all times, yea, every moment.

If we needed further confirmation we might well remember that the Lord has already watered His vineyard in a far more costly manner than it will ever need again. The Lord Jesus has watered it with a sweat of blood, and can it be upposed that He will leave it now? Gethsemne wrought for the church much beyond any uture need which can possibly arise to her ; he who spared not His own blood will not withhold watering from those He has redeemed. Dear riend, you and I have already cost the Saviour o much that there is no fear of His parting with s, or losing His reward in us, by giving us over o barrenness. Jesus has already fulfilled on our ehalf a weightier engagement than that which s contained in the text. He said " I will reeem it," and He has kept His word ; and now f He declares " I will water it," it would be a superfluity of unbelief to distrust His word.

Hitherto the sacred promise has been fully ept, for we have been graciously preserved in piritual life. Droughty times have befallen us, nd yet our soul has not been suffered to famsh ; why, then, should we question the goodess of the Lord as to years to come? His delight is in us as much as ever, because Jesus, in whom He beholds us, is as fair and lovely as ver, and therefore we may expect the same kindness from the same loving heart. He has ot only pledged himself to water His people, ut again and again has He spoken to the same ffect. Hear how Isaiah speaketh by the Holy Ghost : " And the Lord shall guide thee continally, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make at thy bones : and thou shalt be like a watered arden, and like a spring of water, whose waters ail not."

Jeremiah also speaketh to the same effect in is 31st chapter at the 12th verse. Shall the Lord run back from His covenant? Shall we so much blaspheme His name as to suppose that He will be false to His engagements? Unbelief, ide thy guilty head. Doubting one, be comorted. He who said, " I will water it every moment" must not be dishonored by thy guilty uspicions, for He will do even as He hath said. t is true thy heart is by nature barren and dry, ut what has that to do with the promise of free race so as to render it of none effect? Is not hy parched and desolate condition the rather to e viewed as a reason why the Lord should open he windows of heaven above thee and pour out His blessing.

One thing is never to be forgotten—we are the Lord's. Therefore, if He do not water us, He will himself be the loser. An owner of vineards, if He should suffer them to be parched with the drought, would derive nothing from His estate ; the vineyard would be dried up, but He, Himself would receive no clusters. With everence be it spoken, our Lord Himself will ever see of the travail of His soul in untended ines, nor in hearts unsanctified and unrenewed, nor in men whose graces droop and die for want f divine refreshings. The Lord must carry the work through, or lose what He hath wrought, and that would not be consistent with the foresight of His wisdom, or the purpose of His eart. He chose us, He bought us, He delights n us, He put His very glory in pledge concernng us, and we may therefore be sure beyond all eradventure that He will water us to the end.

Does He water us every moment? Then let His praise continually be in our mouths. Doth He thus care for us? Let us, then, watch for he advance of His cause, the extension of His ingdom, the good of His people. He who is hus watered should water others. If the Lord uts within us a well of living water through His ivine watering, then let us give forth to others ivers of living water. Yet let not this be our first thought, but rather let us go away crying, " Lord, make my soul as a watered garden. Saturate my fleece, fill my vessel to the brim, and keep it full forever. Fulfil this word unto Thy servant, upon the which Thou hast caused me to hope, and water me every moment, even me."

" WOULD you believe it, sir, but I'm towld it's Bible thruth, the knight couldn't, for the life of him, think of a name. He paused, and looked vacantly at the lawyer afore him and silently pondhered. Havin' withdrawn himself for some years from all his fellows, even from the few distant kindred he had, no wan could he think of to minshun in the will.

" Mr. Gogharty sat still as a mouse afore him, pin in hand, to put down the name of the lucky future inheritor ; but he sat in vain ; the knight remained silent as a dummy, and puzzled as a dog fornint a hedgehog. After a good while, however, he said in a subdued tone o' voice, ' My friend, you have put me into a bothersome difficulty ; I don't know what to direct,' sez he, ' and that's the thruth of it. I can't fix on any wan to name in the will. Completely retired as I've been, and that for years,' sez he, 'I care for nobody, and it's my belief nobody cares for me ;' and Mr. Gogharty, I've hard thim say, declares that as the poor knight said this he saw tears gather in his eyes.

" Mr. Gogharty, sir, had a little child at home, a son, not three years owld ; and, as was natural, when such hapes o' money as he knew Sir Percival owned was to the fore, his thoughts turned homeward to his boy. If there was no wan to the fore in Sir Percival's mind to be named, why not, he thought, suggest his son? The words ' my friend,' too, just addressed to him by the knight—a phrase he had not used to him for a very long time—encouraged him. So, dhrawin' his chair closer to the table, and puttin into his voice its most winning tone, he said,—

" ' I regret, Sir Percival,' sez he, ' I have long regretted, your retirement of late from public life, and your seclusion from your friends Yours, my dear sir, is a strange difficulty ; but if you can remember no one to name,' sez he, ' kindly permit me to relieve you by placing in this document the name of my son. He is not yet three years old, is a strong and healthy little boy,' sez he, ' and will, in all likelihood, in the good providence of God, survive to inherit, at the due time, your estate. Your doin' this,' sez he, ' will injure no one, and will make me iver grateful to you.'

" The knight hesitated, cast about his thoughts for a little, and then, with something, I fear, like an oath, exclaimed, ' No, hang it,' sez he, ' I'll not do this. After all, ' blood is thicker than water.' Mrs. Montaigne, now a clergyman's widow, is my niece,' sez he, ' on a disceased sister's side, and, as you are aware, she has a son, for you yourself, Mr. Gogharty,' sez he, ' sent me information of his birth. He is nearly as old as your son. I'll make him my heir, sir. Put down Arnold Montaigne's name in the will.'

" As may be supposed, at this change in the knight's disposition the countenance of Mr. Gogharty fell. A rich prize for his child had been almost within his very grasp, as it were, and it was lost. Sir Percival seemed to notice his vexation, for he added pleasantly, ' In case Arnold Montaigne should die, Mr. Gogharty, before the twenty-one years are out, I wish your son to be named as reversionary heir in the will ; and moreover, and I'm heart glad I've thought o' this,' sez he, ' as these are quare times, and we are gittin' scarcely to know where we stand, or where things are dhriftin' to,* I will have it distinctly mintioned in the document you dhraws up,' sez he, ' that both Arnold Montaigne and your son shall only inherit, in any case, my property upon condition that they remain stanch Protestants and true to the Reformed faith.'

" I'm a Catholic," said " Jehu," as he told me this ; " I'm a thorough-going Catholic," he repeated, " and 'pon my conchense this was a quare thing to do and hardly a fair proceedin' o' the knight's ; but so it was to be, as Mr. Gogharty saw at a glance when he looked into the knight's face ; therefore, as in duty bound, he dhrew up the will as Sir Percival commanded. Oh, sir, isn't it an all out sthrange and wonderful world? Here was a little fellow, one hour poor, they say, as Lazarus, and the next the heir of goold and silver the aquals o' king Solomon. Neither him nor his mother, however, had the darkest hint uv it, sir, and that for years ; not until the owld knight died, burnt to a cinder, as I towld you some time since, wan night in his own dwellin ; and there are suspicions abroad that the house was sit afire by the Ribbon min in spite upon him fur some time afore killin' their comrades."

" Jehu" could give me no further recital—knew nothing of the heir so unexpectedly mentioned by Sir Percival in his will. Some time after, however, Arnold Montaigne was cast in my way, when I learned from his own lips his history.

Mrs. Montaigne was the widow of a clergyman. Few persons had a lot less to be envied than clergymen of the Irish branch of the Episcopal Church thirty-five or forty years ago. The Establishment, as such, in the Emerald Isle was, in our view, placed in a false and anomalous position from the days of Queen Elizabeth. The title of National Church was considered by many people a misnomer in a land where more than three fourths of the people were Roman Catholics. Evangelical Protestantism from the first should have been in the sister land missionary in its aims and character ; but missionary effort, it is evident, was all but impossible among those who connected the Gospel preached by the missionary with remembrances and traditions of what they rightly or wrongly considered to be a political wrong.

It is true the clergy of the Episcopal Church at the date we have mentioned had neither part nor lot in the wrong-doing of Government, or rather of *mis*government, in the times before them—on the contrary, grieved over it; but still in the estimate of the Celt its dark shadow was upon them. Hence, in the days of "Tithe" excitement, and of Daniel O'Connell's agitation for "Repeal," the clergy of the Irish Church, especially in rural districts, had directed against them the dislike and animosity of a passionate and prejudiced people.

* We append the following epitome of this tale for the information of those readers who may not have perused the former portions of it contained in the two previous numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD :

Sir C. Percival, a justice of the peace, was the object of a conspiracy of Ribbonmen, who attacked him by night, aided by the traitorous conduct of his servant. In defending himself, he killed some and drove the rest away. Disgusted with this ungrateful treatment, he lived the life of a recluse for many years, and desired to make his will so that all his property should be tied up forever. Being convinced by his lawyer that he could not do this, he, having no children, tried to recollect the name of some one related to him. The story now opens at this point, and the speaker is the " Jehu " of a stage-coach who narrated the circumstances to Mr. Martin.

* The " Tracts for the Times," which were expositions of Popery issued by so-called Protestant divines, who aimed thereby to draw the people over to Roman Catholicism, whither the majority of the writers by example led the way, were making a stir.

It was no uncommon thing in many outlying parishes for the Protestant vicar or curate to hear muttered curses as he passed along the road —curses of ignorant and fanatical men and women, peradventure raised to fury by some altar denunciation.

Absenteeism likewise deprived very often the Protestant minister of his natural supporter and defender. The lord of the soil spent his life in London or on the Continent, careless, except as to his rents, of his Irish home, and not seldom the would-be squire and inferior landlord did the same; so that the village doctor, as the case might be, and the bailiff, and one or two police, and three or four Protestant tenant farmers and their families formed the sabbath congregation at church; while, on the other hand, swarming myriads in succession, Mass celebration after Mass, from early morning until noon, thronged the Roman Catholic chapel.

I myself have seen money collected at the chapel-gates in horse buckets, and the number of contributors of pence and halfpence was so great that the heaped-up vessels had to be emptied out for a further replenishment from "the faithful," who, eager and devout, though superstitious and the victims of error, still poured in one continuous stream into the sacred building. No one can question the deep religiousness of the Celtic nature. Oh that in the last two centuries it had been brought lovingly and fairly into contact with the Saviour's purifying and transforming Gospel!

It was to such a parish as I have described that in the year 18— the Rev. Arnold Montaigne brought the young and fair Dora Percival as his bride. Their residence was to be in a small but neat and convenient parsonage. Both were truly Christian in their aims, disposition, and character. He, his heart burning with the truth, only longed for opportunity to express it; and she, devoted to her husband, resolved to be a faithful and loving wife and a helpmeet to him in his sacred calling in all ways possible to her sex.

We are told that at Athens the spirit of the Apostle Paul "was stirred within him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry," and that, unable to repress his feelings, even before Silas and Timotheus could reach him as co-workers, "he disputed with the Jews," and "in the market daily with those that met with him." And according to his measure so it was with Arnold Montaigne.

The mariolatry and image worship of his swarming Roman Catholic neighbors beyond expression distressed him, as also did their blind efforts, by sacramental charm, penance, and mortifications, to purchase heaven. Oh how he thirsted to tell them of the spiritual nature of true worship, and that the gift of eternal life had been secured by Jesus Christ for all who, without money and without price, would believingly come to Him and have it!

As he knew that to get the people into his church was altogether impracticable, he endeavored to find scope for his zeal, soon after he entered the parish, by copying the example of Paul just quoted; and on two or three market days, standing on a chair, he essayed, in the market-place, to address the crowd assembled there, some for amusement, but the greater part for worldly business.

To his surprise and great delight he had on the first occasion a respectful and deeply interested congregation patient to hear him. The spell of the "old, old story" fell upon their hearts and consciences, and when he promised to take his stand in the same place at a similar hour the following week, he heard more than one voice say, "God bless your riverence! Thim words you have towld uz is beautiful, and no mistake. Do as ye have said, and, begorrah, we'll cum and hear you."

The young clergyman returned home with a thankful and joyful heart. It was not a fact, then, as he had been told, that Ireland was inaccessible to the Gospel. He had found the key for the difficulty, and had proved that it fitted the lock. "As the people will not come to you, why, of course, common-sense would say, you must go to them." How was it that this had not been seen and done before? However, as he had now hit upon the right plan, he would in future work it.

Reaching home, he told the success of his enterprise to his young wife. She trembled at first when she heard what he had done; for, to prevent any difficulty being put in his way by her, he had not told her of his purpose; but as the attempt turned out all that could be wished, with full heart she shared in his congratulation.

As may be supposed, the ardent young clergyman waited impatiently for next Wednesday to come, the day he had engaged to speak again the "words of life" to the people. Those who were so interested and impressed on the former occasion would doubtless, he thought, tell at home of their experience, and a larger crowd, he anticipated, would be present to hear him. The same man who furnished the chair before graciously repeated the favor.

Arnold Montaigne mounted the extempore rostrum, but what was his surprise and chagrin to find that the moment his head was seen over the crowd, the throng melted away from around him like snow from the presence of fire, and bargain-making and chaffering in the loudest possible tones were carried on at a distance in the square. No one was near him to address, and he saw at a glance it was useless to raise his voice so as to reach the outskirts of the market-place, for the vociferous din of set purpose raised would effectually drown it.

How was the strange conduct of the people to be accounted for? Very easily. The priest had heard before Sunday of the fine congregation of his parishioners (for there are two claimants to parishioners in Ireland), which the zealous young Protestant minister had had on the previous Wednesday. And if Arnold Montaigne was on his part highly pleased and elated, Father Curtis on the other hand was as much humiliated and vexed. He determined at once to put an end for the future to all such spiritual poaching, and the means of doing so were to his hand.

After mass on the Sunday he roundly rebuked and scolded all who with "itching ears" had dared to listen to the damnable utterances of heresy, and spoke aloud the names of those whom he regarded as the worst delinquents. "Were I to do right," he said, "to you three—Andy Malone and Ned Callaghan and Dennis O'Shee—aye, and a lot more o' ye, I'd put the heaviest pinances the Church allows upon ye. What, not only listen to the words o' Satan, but invite his agent in my parish—in my parish, I repate—to come and speak thim again to you and others, poisonin' yer souls? Upon my conscience I'd be jist in excommunicating every wan o' ye, and lavin' ye to die in morthial sin, and I needn't say what 'id then become o' yees." At these words those addressed by name in great alarm fell on their knees in the chapel, and with tears and cries entreated him "to spare them, and not blast their souls."

Upon seeing their fear and repentance, Father Curtis, knowing his point was gained, assumed a milder tone, and made as though he was going to most graciously relent.

"Well, well," he said, "it may be ye war taken by surprise, as the great St. Peter, the rock on which the Church is built, and the first Pope, wanst on a time was when—God's blessing be about us—he denied his Saviour. As the Lord forgave him whin he wept, followin' His example, perhaps, I might be pardoned for forgivin' yees."

THE ASSAULTS OF THE DEVIL.

A Sermon by the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D., of the City Temple, London.

"Touch all that he hath, and he will curse Thee to Thy face."—JOB 1:11. "Touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face."—JOB 2:5.

The Devil's Existence Proved by Devilishness—The Devil Twice Wrong—God's Proof-man—Satan Challenging the Almighty—A Public Trial—Value of the Result—Every Christian a Battlefield—The World Looking on—Our Children Looking on—Satan's Four Great Dogs—Certain Triumph of the Grace of God.

THE man spoken about is Job, a perfect man and an upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil. He lived in the land of Uz. The speaker is Satan, who came with the sons of God on the first occasion, and said, "Touch all that Job hath, and he will curse Thee to Thy face." He was allowed to touch Job's property, and he failed in his purpose. On another occasion the same devil came back with the sons of God, and enlarged his proposition. He said, "Touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face."

I take it for granted that you and I are fully agreed that there is no devil. Everybody is so good, everybody is so honest, all our habits and practices and customs are so transparently and beautifully moral, that it is utterly impossible for us to believe that there is a devil. Do I speak to some very literal people who do not take my meaning? There is always a large proportion of timber in every human crowd, and therefore, it is just possible that there may be some persons who need a foot-note.

Why do we speak of the existence of the devil? Why, there is so very much devilishness about. The best way to prove that there is no devil is to get rid of the devilishness. When you have cleansed that out of the way, you will make it exceedingly difficult for me to believe either in a personal or an impersonal devil. But when persons are so dishonest, so tricky, so quick in sharp practice, so malign, so cruel, so ready to take advantage, so prepared to oppress the weak and to mislead the ignorant—when I put all these circumstances together, it becomes quite easy for me to believe that there is a devil.

In this incident it will be our privilege to se the devil twice wrong. Here is a man calle Job, who is chosen as the battlefield. In all line and spheres of life some particular persons ar called upon to illustrate universal truths an confer universal blessings. It is necessarily an unchangeably true that "one man must die f the people." The great contest in this inciden is God against the devil, and up to this time w have never seen that battle so sharply define We have always felt that there was a conte going on, but we never saw them face to fac hand against hand, mouth against mouth, b fore. It will be interesting to watch the encou ter. I do not know that the devil has ev made this high challenge before.

He has always been walking and working the dark; he has been moving about stealthi and taking advantage where he could—but I a not aware that he has ever with undisguis audacity, actually challenged the Almighty fight it out in one particular case. At last t challenge has been given; it has been accept Job is the battlefield, and on the result will pend the veracity either of God or of the de But what of Job in that case; had Job no co pensations? was it all battle, and suffering, a pain, and humiliation on the part of Job? W there nothing on the other side? Does God si ply afflict some men and leave them with th afflictions—does He simply gather His clo over some heads and cause them to discha their pitiless storms without setting the rain on the cloud-laden sky?

It is easy for us who have endured, but the ondary pains and ills of life to suggest comp sations to those who are our leaders in suffer and our veterans in bearing the chastiseme the penalties, and visitations of God. Still, surely something to be to be called out as the particular man on whose character, intelligence, grace, patience, fortitude, great results are staked. Surely God will not call a man to endure all the devil can inflict upon him without secretly giving that man sustenance, and at the end throwing upon his devastated life a fuller and gentler light than ever has illumined its yesterdays.

That is the view which every one of us should take of his afflictions ; that is to say, every man should feel that perhaps he is made the medium through which God is answering the devil's challenge. The devil may have been saying to the Almighty concerning you, concerning me, "Take his health away, take his trade away, touch his bone and his flesh, subtract considerably from the sum total of his indulgences and his enjoyments, and then he will curse Thee to Thy face." This is the view every man and woman among us should take of personal sorrow and individual trial. The devil may have said, "Take his only son away, and Thou wilt take his religion away," and God has allowed that dear boy to be removed—how dost thou bear ?

There are great stakes pending. God said, "He will bear it well, with the grace of a sanctified hero." The devil said, "He will burn his Bible and cast down his family altar." Who is right ? If thou art bearing that heavy loss well, bowing thy poor old knees at the same altar, and saying, with a choking in thy throat, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away—blessed be the name of the Lord," thou hast enabled God to strike the devil on the face. The Lord help thee : it is bitter suffering ; there is a hard stress upon thy poor life ; thou needest all the grace treasured in the immeasurable heart of Christ ; but His grace is sufficient for thee—draw heavily upon it, and the more thou dost yearn for that healing grace, the more shall it be given thee to overflow ; it cannot be given to satisfy.

Could Job now look over the ages that have been healed and comforted by his example, stimulated to bear the ills of life by the grateful memory of his invincible patience, surely even now in heaven he would be taking in the reward of his long-continued and noble endurance of the Divine visitation. It may be so with thee, poor man, poor woman : thou dost not get all the sweet now : this shall be a memory to thee in heaven, long ages hence : the wrestling thou hast, now may minister to thee high delight, keen enjoyment, rapture pure and abiding. Who can tell when God's rewards end—who will venture to say, "This is the measure of His benediction"? He is able to give and to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think. When, therefore, persons inquire of thee, What compensation hast thou ? say, to-day, to-morrow, in death, in the resurrection, all through the ages of eternity. Ask me ten thousand ages hence, and I will reply to thy question concerning compensation." Life is not limited by the cradle and the tomb, and it is not between these two mean and near points that great questions are to be discussed or determined.

"IT IS GIVEN BY INSTALMENTS

Job has been read by countless readers. His, of course, was a public trial, a tragedy that was wrought out for the benefit of multitudes in all generations. Nevertheless it is literally and pathetically true that every man, the very obscurest, has his readers, fewer in number, it may be equally earnest in attention. Think you that your children are not taking notice of you, seeing how you bear your temptations and difficulties and anxieties ? Think you not that eldest boy of yours is not kept away from the table of the Lord because you are as atheistic in sorrow as ever Voltaire was ? Do you know that your girl hates church because her pious father is only pious in the three summer months of the year ? He curls under the cold and biting wind as any mean atheist ever did : therefore the girl saith, "He is a sham and a hypocrite—my father in the flesh—no relative of mine in the spirit."

You have your readers : the little Bible of your life is read in your kitchen, and in your parlor, and in your shop, and in your warehouse ; and if you do not bear your trials, anxieties, and difficulties with a Christian chivalry and heroism, what is there but mockery on earth and laughter in hell ? God give us grace to bear the chastisement nobly, serenely ; bless us with the peace which passeth understanding, with the quietness kindred to the calm of God ; and help us when death is in the house, and poverty on the hearthstone ; and when there is a storm blinding the one poor small window we have, to say "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him. If I perish I will pray, and perish only here." That is Christianity—not some clever chatter and able controversy about metaphysical points, but noble temper, high behavior, faultless constancy, invincible fortitude in the hour of trial and in the agony of pain.

Let us give the devil his due. I am bound to say that the devil had but too much reason to believe that his propositions concerning Job were right. He did not speak without book. He had at his girdle many proofs that strong men had fallen under his stroke. The devil, therefore, may have reasoned that if so many had yielded to his ministry, Job, the mightiest and brightest of all, might yield as well. Why might he not ? Name his victories—Adam, Cain, Saul—was he not, therefore, entitled to reason inductively from a very considerable basis and area of fact, that Job would fall too ?

But the devil came upon a distinctively different man : he assailed Job, who was a perfect man and upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil—that is the man to fight, then. If the devil conquers there, he will tear the heavens to pieces, he will break up the Throne of God, he will disband the angels, he will scatter the baleful fires of perdition upon the walls and floors of Heaven's City. It is therefore a great fight—it is a critical battle ; every thing depends upon the issue, for God has given permission to assail this perfect man, and therefore he has put perfectness of character to the test. No man in whom is the seed of the Divine life can fall finally, for he hath the seed, the life, the Spirit of God abiding in him. Slips enough—alas ! too many. Crimes too : see David, see Peter, for appalling proof. Falls daily—though he fall he shall not be utterly cast down. This is what I mean by the final perseverance of the saints : this is what I mean by the triumph of the grace of God in a poor human life. No man knows better than the true child of the Almighty how possible it is to sin in thought, in word, in deed, and to sin daily, yet under all the sin to have an inextinguishable love.

Whoever has the true root in him shall be found at last to the praise and glory of God. Is this a dangerous doctrine to preach ? Only because all doctrine is dangerous in some cases and in some circumstances ; but this is our joy, our strength, our hope : if I have to be saved because I am always doing the right thing in the right way, accomplishing all my purposes, fulfilling all my duties—I never will be saved. I am to-day no further than the publican was when he said, "God be merciful to me a sinner." But I know, bad as I am, foul with a thousand crimes, that deep in my heart I could die for Christ, and that inexplicable presence in my soul of Divine elements and divine faculties comes up through all the superincumbent guilt, and shines at top of it an inextinguishable light.

Even in Job himself we have complaint enough, murmuring enough, but in Job we have the true life, and therefore at the last he is more than conqueror. In this case we see really all that the devil can do. What is it in his power, as given by God, to inflict ? Bereavement, poverty, pain, humiliation. God has given him these four great dogs to set upon thy life ; they will bite thee and gnaw thee, but they cannot kill thee, true child of God. The devil has only one soliloquy : his is really the poorest intellect in the universe. He says, "I have got Job on my hands, what shall I do ? Are there any new tricks ? No. Well, then, I must try the old ones. Let me see : I will kill his sons and his daughters, and will take away his flocks and his herds, and I will give him boils ; I will cover him with loathsome disease, and I will make his life disagreeable, and in every way I will plague him and torment him, and I will do it now." That is he cannot add a line to it if he could fill his hell by the doing of it. Beyond his chain he cannot go. Thou knowest, poor soul, what he can do—bereavement, poverty, pain, humiliation ; sit down, count the cost, add it up line by line, item by item, and when thou hast done so, know the sum total, and ask whether the grace of God is sufficient to meet an exigency such as that result brings before thy view.

How afflictions may be to show God's grace ! I will try during this 1879 to take that view of my difficulties, cares, and sorrows. Great battles may be fought in our little lives : I will therefore every day think that God is fighting out some case along the line of my experience, and that my behavior may have something to do with God's own satisfaction. I have been managing myself many years and have failed : to-night I resign the administration of my own life, and I ask the Almighty to work His will in me and through me without any suggestion, much less any interposition, from my side. The sorrow, it is bitter : it must have been soaked—soaked in the bitterest aloes that the devil could pluck from the foulest trees, but God's grace is sufficient for me.

Where is your difficulty ? On the brink of it is the devil. Is yours a home difficulty ? God and the angels are waiting there, saying, "We have a great fight going on in this house : here is a poor life worried—worried—and we are waiting to see whether the devil's poison or God's grace shall get the better." O poor man, poor woman ! I pray for thee : pray for me. Is yours a business difficulty ? Honest, honorable man you know yourself to be, but things have got twisted, and you cannot—cannot—cannot disentangle them. God is saying, "I tied the knot—I allowed the devil to tie it—and we are both waiting here to see the result of thy fingering."

Try, wait, try again, pray, hope—ah, there ! a touch did it at last : and the unravelled string lies out before thee, a straight line. What is your difficulty ? Health ? What is yours ? A secret sorrow that cannot be put into speech, that no speech is fit to utter ? It is a great battle that is being fought out in thy life : fight it sedulously, daily, constantly, lovingly. Ye have heard of the patience of Job : let the memory of that patience encourage you to toil on, suffer on ; say in your degree, small indeed, "I must work to day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected." (Luke 13 : 32.)

A Scholar and a Sick Woman.—A gentleman near London went to visit a woman who was sick. As he was going into the room he saw kneeling by the side of the poor woman's bed, a little girl, who rose from her knees as soon as she saw the gentleman, and went out of the room. "Who is that child ?" the gentleman asked. "Oh, sir !" said the sick woman, "that is a little angel, who often comes to read her Bible to me, to my great comfort ; and she has just now given me sixpence." The visitor was so pleased with the little girl's conduct that he wished to know how she had learned to love the Word of God, and to be so kind to poor people. Finding that she was one of the scholars of a neighboring Sabbath-school, he went to the school and inquired of her why she acted thus. She answered, "Because, sir, I find it is said in the Bible that 'pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction.'"

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

Sir Edwin Erskine.

Mrs. Arnot feasted on the letters which her daughter regularly wrote from the metropolis with unmingled delight; for she saw in them proofs of the conscientious regard which Clara paid to her wishes, and of the tender affection with which, in the midst of her amusements, her heart clung to the parent whom she had left.

All the little circle of friends in the quiet village of Wingsdale shared in Mrs. Arnot's enjoyment. They listened to accounts of the first wondrous Crystal Palace, glittering like some fairy structure on the trodden sward of Hyde Park; the "sermons in stones" preached from the spoils of old Nineveh; descriptions of the treasures of art, all the things beautiful, curious, and rare, upon which the eye of Clara had rested, delighted. They heard also personal descriptions of men with whose names they were already familiar—how Shaftesbury had spoken, and Guthrie had preached; whilst not least interesting to the hearts of her rural subjects was a graphic account of Queen Victoria from the enthusiastic pen of Clara.

But never had the young correspondent expressed herself in such glowing terms of admiration and pleasure as in her description of Sir Edwin Erskine, whom she spoke of as one of the leading writers of the day. She had been actually introduced to "the lion," had listened to the wondrous flow of eloquence which made his conversation an intellectual treat beyond any which she had ever known before. With his expansive brow, eagle eye, most poetical cast of countenance, his were exactly the face and form which a painter would wish to immortalize on canvas, as representing the beau ideal of a genius; and Clara could not but imagine that Sir Edwin must have drawn himself in the hero of his famous chef-d'œuvre, "The Master-Mind."

"'The Master-Mind!'" lisped Emma from the sofa; "Oh! I have read that—all the world has read it—it is a most charming work! I have it somewhere in my boxes, I think."

Mrs. Arnot was content to be classed with those not of the world, for she had never read nor even heard of the book. She was pleased, however, that her child should have met one of the literary celebrities of London, and had thus added another to the pleasant recollections which she would carry with her from the metropolis.

The next morning's post brought a description of a fete at the Botanical Gardens; and this sentence occurred in Clara's letter: "We met our brilliant author just as we were entering the gardens, and he remained the whole time with our party. He has certainly wonderful powers of conversation; just such as might be expected from a writer whose pen seems dipped in the colors of the rainbow, and brightens whatever it touches. When he speaks, we can do nothing but listen."

"I think, Emma," said Mrs. Arnot, "that you mentioned that you had a copy of the 'Master-Mind' beside you. I should be obliged if you would allow me to read it."

"Oh, certainly, when I can lay hands upon it; but all my luggage is still one mass of confusion, and whatever I want is certain to be at the very bottom of the very last box into which I should think of looking for it. But you really wish to see 'The Master-Mind?' Well," added the lady, with an affected laugh, "I should as soon have dreamed of Mr. Ward's dancing a polka as of your sitting quietly down to a novel!"

Emma's promise to look for the work was speedily forgotten by herself, nor did more than one reminder induce her to take this slight trouble for one to whom she owed the comfort of a home.

Clara's subsequent letters contained scarcely any mention of Sir Edwin. She occasionally quoted his opinion, or mentioned a brilliant remark made by him on some subject of general interest; but it was merely from such passing allusions that her mother gathered that Clara was not unfrequently in the society of the literary "lion."

Mrs. Arnot had much to occupy her thoughts—much to engage her anxious attention. She was now patiently listening to the frivolous complaints of the hypochondriac widow; then quitting her to stand by the death-bed of a young school-girl—hear her last faint breathings of devotion—receive her last message of affection to Clara. The next hour would find Mrs. Arnot seated among the children, enduring their rough play and noisy glee, and ministering to their amusement as patiently as she had done to the wants of the suffering and the dying. But the wear upon her spirits and the strain upon her energies were too much for the strength of Mrs. Arnot. There was no one to watch her faded cheek, her weary step, her languid eye; no one, at least in her own home, to think for her, care for her—attend to the comforts of one who ever attended to the comforts of others. She might have been ill, she might have been dying, and Emma, absorbed in her own selfish cares, would never have observed that anything ailed her.

Mrs. Arnot missed Clara each day more and more—longed more and more to hear her light step on the stair, her sweet song from the garden—to look again into those soft and loving eyes which were wont to rest on her so tenderly, so fondly. But Mrs. Arnot would not abridge a visit which afforded so much enjoyment to her daughter; she would not, even by the slightest allusion to her own failing health and spirits, throw a shadow over that enjoyment. She was content if Clara was happy; and if she herself needed comfort and strength, was not the source of all comfort and strength ever open to the Christian!

One afternoon Mrs. Arnot returned exceedingly wearied from a visit to a sick woman who resided at some distance. The walk was too long for her, and had her daughter been at home, she would not have been suffered to take it; for Clara, in the vigor of her youthful strength, appropriated to herself all the more distant visits. Certainly a feeling of regret crossed the mind of Mrs. Arnot, as she wearily ascended her own stair, and heard loud, angry sounds from above, that peace and seclusion were now hers no longer—that she could not have rest when she was tired nor solitude when she was sad. But she struggled against the feeling as against a sin.

As Mrs. Arnot approached the door of Emma's sleeping apartment, it was evident that the sound came from there, and that the angry voice was the widow's.

"Tiresome monkey! you have destroyed it entirely! my beautiful India muslin! Was ever mother tormented as I am? Ah, is that you?" continued Emma, as Mrs. Arnot crossed the entrance to her room. "Just come in here, do, and see what this insufferable child has been doing!"

Mrs. Arnot entered, and beheld Lyddie, the little culprit, in the centre of the apartment, fancifully arrayed in all the finery which she had pillaged from a large trunk of her mother's. A yellow satin dress, with the body turned in, was fastened by a red scarf round the waist of the child; and being, of course, much too long, swept the floor on every side with its gaudy folds. Long feathers, scarlet and white, were stuck in the girl's lank dark hair; while an India muslin shawl, which had been twisted into the form of a turban, appeared, with a grievous rent in the middle, in the hands of the irritated parent.

"Did you ever see anything like it? The vanity, the folly, the absurdity of the child! Here I find her parading before the glass, dressed up like a May-queen, and in all the best clothes which I used to wear in my happier days! Take them off!" she cried in a shriller tone to the child, who stood biting the ends of her fingers, in mingled sulkiness and fear. "Take them off, I say! and if ever you touch them again, you shall have a whipping—such a whipping as you will remember to the last day of your life! I am sure that no one," she continued, turning towards Mrs. Arnot who was silently disrobing the culprit—"no one but a parent can tell the incessant anxiety, plague, and worry caused by children! It is enough to drive us out of our senses!"

Mrs. Arnot saw in the expression of the countenances of both mother and child something far more saddening to her gentle spirit than the destruction of anything that gold could replace—anger in the one, sullen defiance in the other; not maternal solicitude grieving over the folly of a daughter, but selfish vanity irritated at the loss of a bauble; not filial love distressed at the displeasure of a parent, but pride rising against the threat of punishment. Emma would permit the gravest faults of her children to pass unnoticed, until their consequences affected her own comfort, and then the most trivial excited in her anger as unreasonable as her former indifference had been culpable.

"I do not see that your English nurse manages the children any better than old Chloe. I always said, and I always will say, that it was a great pity to make any change," cried Emma fretfully, willing as usual to blame anybody and anything but herself.

"We can scarcely expect wonders to be worked in three days," replied Mrs. Arnot, as Lyddie, released from her cumbrous finery, made a hasty exit from the room, glad to escape from the presence of her mother. "To change old ways, and to introduce habits of order and obedience, must ever be a work of patience and time. And does it not appear to you, Emma," continued Mrs. Arnot, cautiously approaching dangerous ground, "that children insensibly imbibe more from watching the example of those who are with them than from any direct instruction?"

"I do not comprehend what that has to do with the question," said Emma, stooping over the trunk to replace its contents.

"If our dear children see by our conduct how little we care for the petty vanities of this life, if they see that our minds are fixed upon nobler objects than the adorning of our poor perishing forms, they will learn to estimate at their true value such trifles as these"—Mrs. Arnot was handing the feathers to her daughter-in-law—"and are not likely to fall into the childish folly into which our poor Lyddie has to-day been betrayed."

"Ah! here is 'The Master-Mind,'" cried Emma, suddenly diving into the lowest recess o her trunk, and bringing from thence two ol soiled volumes. It is not impossible that a de sire to change the subject of conversation ha quickened her perceptions, and led her to mak the discovery which turned it into a more agree able channel. "This is the novel which you ar so impatient to read. Here are the first an third volumes; I think that the second must t lost; but doubtless it is all the same to you; yo could never spare enough of your valuable tim for the perusal of more than two."

Mrs. Arnot took the work, and laid it aside she had not at that hour leisure for readin But when the children had gone to rest, ar their mother retired to her own room, when th day's duties had all been fulfilled, and the st summer night had closed in, Mrs. Arnot, in h own quiet apartment, opened the first volume the work of Sir Edwin.

She soon became strongly interested both the characters and the plot. "The Mast Mind" had been written by a master's han the author's powers had not been over-rat Sir Edwin described his hero as one distingui ed by birth, but yet more by exalted talen He was generous, humane, chivalrous and c stant, possessing every virtue but piety, ev grace but the grace of God, every gift but " one thing needful." Not that he was represe ed as one destitute of every sentiment of re ion. He was made to revere with lofty devot an almighty Creator, but not a righte Judge; one so merciful that he could not p ish, so lenient that he would not destroy. hero was not a believer in revelation—his l l could not bow to the mysterious truths h his reason could not grasp ; but his scepti n was represented as candor, his pride as g tness of soul—he was placed in bright con with hard, narrow-minded bigots, who de nce sin because God has condemned it, and hell because Divine truth has declared that errors await the impenitent.

rs. Arnot read on and on, and wondered as sh read. She had seen very few novels in her li and all appeared to her strange and new. S etimes she was filled with admiration by a gerous sentiment or a noble deed ; then she startled by some idea, veiled in sublime lan ge and beautiful imagery, but which, as it eared to her, was contrary to the simple truth he Scriptures.

he close of the first volume left the hero deep assionately loving a fair and highly-princi l girl, the daughter of parents who, under gab of great sanctity, were drawn as worldly, rtless, and unforgiving. He was resolved to her under circumstances of difficulty which, ove less ardent and a spirit less firm, must e presented obstacles insuperable. Mrs. Ar closed the book and glanced at her candle. ad burnt quite down to the socket. She rose lighted another. Was it a strange fascination t made her sit down again, with her pale ek and her heavy aching eyes, to resume her vonted occupation? Was the interest of a re novel so strong that it could render her eless of needful rest ? It was that in the hero s. Arnot was reading the character of the au r—that she, almost unconsciously, connected gentle heroine with her own fondly-loved ld.

'I see the moral of the tale," aid the widow to rsel'. "Virgilius, ennobled by his affection for vorthy object, enlightened by experience, and proved by trials, will find out the errors into iich his fine mind has been led ; he will be me godly as well as moral, and all will end ppily at last."

All did end happily in the novel, but not in e way which Mrs. Arnot expected. Hypocrisy is unmasked, bigotry disgraced, but infidelity iumphed in success ! The brilliant winding-up the work was almost a paraphrase of the cele ated line,

"He can't be wrong whose life is in the right"—

if any life could be right in which the chief end our existence, the glory of God, was disregard d! It is as though we should speak of the per ction of the ocean without water, or of the uni erse without the sun !

The dim light of morning was purpling the ky before the widow had finished the book. he sat for some moments with her brow resting pon her hand, and the open volume on her nee.

"Perhaps I have read until my mind is too nuch wearied to form a correct judgment," she nurmured to herself. "Perhaps I have mista en the meaning of the author, and have done im injustice. I am a weak, ignorant woman, not capable of appreciating all the beauties of his work ; I will lean on a stronger mind than ny own, ask the aid of a better judgment. I will take the books to Mr. Ward to-morrow, and see if he views the work in the same light as I do. And now I must go to my rest ; I have done wrong to waste so many hours over a novel !"

"How foolish I am to take these anxious thoughts !"—such were the lady's reflections as she wearily toiled up the lane, which had never seemed so long before. "I have no reason to fear that Sir Edwin is anything more to my child than an admired author, an agreeable acquaintance. He is above her in birth and position ; flattered as he is by the world, why should I fancy that my simple moss-rose should attract the regard of one who is the idol of all the circles of fashion ! It is a mother's weakness, a mother's vanity, which make me believe that all who see her must view her with eyes like my own !

THE COMING SAVIOUR.

S. S. Lesson for April 27th.—Is. 42 : 1–12.

Golden Text, Matt. 3 : 17.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE must bear in mind that in the prophecy of the first coming of Christ, which is our subject for to-day, as well as in many other similar prophecies the second coming of Christ and His reign on earth are also alluded to. It is as though God had left room for His Word to be fulfilled if the Jews had received the Saviour, but since they received Him not, "blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in" (Rom. 11 : 25). Such prophecies are Is. 9 : 6, 7 ; 61 ; 63 : 1–6 ; Dan. 9 : 24–27 ; Micah 5 : 1–8.

"Behold My servant." One look at Him by Whom God made the worlds, and "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His Person, and upholding all things by the Word of His power (Heb. 1 : 3), nevertheless made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men ;" one look at Him is enough to stifle every thought of pride in the hearts of God's children. Jesus consented to put off His glory and to serve the will of another that He might bring back our nature, fallen through disobedience ; and might perfectly in our nature accomplish the will of God. "In the volume of the book it is written of Me, I delight to do Thy will, O my God : yea, Thy law is within my heart" (Ps. 40 : 7, 8).

"Whom I uphold." The Lord Jesus did nothing, spoke nothing of Himself, that He might in every thing go over the ground on which we should tread, and make our way plain for us. "And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee" (Luke 4 : 14) ; "I can of Mine own self do nothing" (John 5 : 30) ; "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself : but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works" (John 14 : 10).

"Mine Elect, in Whom My soul delighteth." The Son of God is God's Elect ; and if His children are predestinated "to be conformed to the image of His Son" (Rom. 8 : 29), or "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 2), it is because "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. 1 : 4) ; not in ourselves, as though we were specially favored of God, but He being the chosen One, and we being in Him, we are chosen in Him.

"I have put my Spirit upon Him." We read of our beloved Lord in His early childhood, "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom : and the grace of God was upon Him" (Luke 2 : 40). Thus as a child for the simple occupations of the learning of lessons and his trade as a carpenter, etc., He was strengthened in the Holy Ghost. "My servant whom I uphold," "I have put my Spirit upon Him." Then at the time of His baptism the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon Him and before His great temptation ; we read, "Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness." His temptation over, He "returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee," and when He began His ministry there, He opened with the words, "The Spirit the Lord is upon Me, therefore (lit. trans.) He hath anointed Me to preach the Gospel," etc. So fully did our Lord in His human life receive all power from without.

And every position which our precious Lord has taken He gives to us as His followers, and every power which He has received, He bestows upon His church. Did He become the servant of God and of man ("I am among you as He that serveth," Luke 22 : 27), so are we, being free, Christ's servants (1 Cor. 7 : 22), and are called by love to serve one another (Gal. 5 : 12). If any thought, word, or deed of ours is not in service to God and man, it is not in fellowship with Him who was God's servant, and it is not done in the power of the Holy Ghost, who is become in this dispensation the servant in the place of Christ. Again, Jesus was God's elect that we might be God's elect in Him. He was anointed with the Holy Ghost that we also might be anointed. He shares with us both humiliation and glory, office and responsibility, weakness and power, emptiness and fulness.

"He shall not cry, nor lift up," etc. The régime of the life of Jesus was love. By love He disarmed and conquered opposition, and He shrunk from honor among men, and charged those He healed not to make Him known, that this very prophecy which we are considering might befulfilled (Matt. 12 : 16–21). He was all along carrying out the will of another and drawing upon the resources of another, and thus so perfectly did He become our forerunner and our most blessed and great example. His life was lived out moment by moment, in a full and detailed understanding between Him and His Father, and it is thus that He has made it possible for us also to live. Verse 4 is a prophecy of the time when Christ shall reign on earth, when He shall have "set judgment in the earth : and the isles shall wait for His law."

Verse 6 again shows us the dependence in which our beloved Lord was kept during His mission as man upon earth. "I the Lord have called Thee in righteousness, and will hold Thine hand, and will keep Thee." What wonder that we need also the hand of God to hold and keep us? Every step which Jesus trod on earth in our nature was in an enemy's land. The prince of this world was as yet unconquered ; human nature had been trodden under His feet. And thus our beloved Lord, while in our flesh, lived a life out of Himself in every moment and in every detail of His life.

"And give Thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles ; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house." Jesus Himself is God's covenant with us, not what He has done for us, but His crucified risen ascended Person is God's covenant and meeting-place with us. In Him have we all power, for "all power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28 : 18) ; and we are in Him.

And we are as responsible as Paul was. Christ Jesus is our covenant as much as his ; and as Paul was made in the strength of his Lord "a light of the Gentiles," so are we told by our Lord, "Ye are the light of the world" (Matt. 5 : 14) ; and we are taught by the same Paul to be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world ; holding forth the word of life" (Philip. 2 : 15, 16). Here in these last words we see how we may be lights in the world by justifying God's Word both in our lives and in our conversation. Then, too, how many prisoners are in the "prison-house" taken captive by Satan at his will, under the bondage of sins from which they have no power to rescue themselves, and we are sent to set them free in the name of Jesus. And this we cannot do while there is the slightest bondage upon ourselves.

The last four verses of our subject form a song of praise which will be sung in its fulness when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ (Rev. 11 : 15). "Sing unto the Lord a new song, and His praise from the end of the earth." But we who know His Name have ever a new song to sing of His mercy and of His goodness, and we will praise Him, and while He tarries and the world lieth still in wickedness, let us, who are not of the world, even as He was not of the world, be still praising Him. The worldlings are never grateful without a cause, and they know well if we praise God there must be some reason for it. Thus let us bless the Lord at all times, and let His praise continually be in our mouth.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Crisis seems to be Threatening in Egypt in consequence of the arbitrary and capricious conduct of the Khedive or chief ruler. This potentate some time ago submitted to an arrangement with the European powers, by which his finances should be administered by Mr. Rivers Wilson and M. Blignieres, two eminent financiers of England and France. But now, after seeing their system of management, the Khedive has suddenly given both their discharge, and wishes his cabinet to be composed, as it was before, exclusively of his own subjects. The two Ministers, however, decline to give up their port-folios without the sanction of their own Governments; and it will be necessary for the European powers to take some action, not only because of the slight thrown upon Mr. Rivers Wilson and M. Blignieres, but also because the bulk of Egyptian bondholders are in Europe, and have to a considerable extent invested their money believing that there was a guarantee for the proper administration of the funds, which there never was under the management of Egyptian Ministers.

Another Terrible Slaughter of British Troops in the Zulu country occurred on March 12. A convoy of supplies, escorted by 104 soldiers, was attacked by 4000 Zulus in a hollow surrounded by long grass and weeds. The British were asleep under arms when the enemy came upon them, but the numbers of the latter were so overwhelming that the massacre could not have been averted. The Zulus crept up very stealthily, and were not seen by the British sentry till they were within fifteen paces of the camp. Captain Moriarty and forty men were killed, and twenty more, as well as all the wagon-drivers, are reported missing. Lieutenant Harvard, with forty men, were separated by a river from the place of the disaster, and they poured a very destructive fire among the Zulu hordes, but the Zulus were not daunted.

A Colporteur in Turkey relates that he visited a hospital and saw a poor Turk lying ill. He approached the man, who looked at his visitor with a frightful scowl, and uttered some words of imprecation. He asked the nurse about him, who said that he was a most awful man. "I give him his medicine," said she, "and attend to his wounds, but he always curses me, and I quite fear to go near him." At last it occurred to the colporteur to show him a New Testament. He held it up to him, open; and when the Turk saw the type in his own language the scowl at once gave place to a smile of pleasure, though he did not know what the book was, and by signs asked for it, and was given it. The colporteur then left the place for some days; but on his return again visited the hospital and inquired for the sick soldier. "Sir," replied the nurse, "I never saw such a change in any man. His eye brightened, his manner softened, he took his medicine without uttering a curse, and seemed as if he could not show enough gratitude to me. As for the New Testament, he never let it out of his hand, and was constantly reading it till he died a few days ago."

A Committee of the British House of Lords was appointed lately to report on the Drink Traffic in Great Britain. It has just published its report, which establishes the very serious fact that the expenditure on intoxicating liquors has increased from 2*l*. 18*s*. 6*d*. per head of the population in 1860 to 4*l*. 9*s*. in 1876; but the Committee rejects decisively the principle of the Permissive Bill, and declines to recommend it even for local or experimental adoption. It regards more favorably, however, the Gothenburg system as modified by Mr. Chamberlain, according to which scheme the liquor trade of a town may be managed by the municipal authorities, and the profits, instead of making the fortunes of publicans, may be devoted to the reduction of the rates.

The Committee has nothing but praise for the operation of the Early Closing Act of 1872, and condemns the changes made in it by the present Government in 1874, and further recommends a considerable shortening of the hours during which public-houses are now open. It also proposes that the opening on Sunday afternoon, both in London and the country, should no longer be for the consumption of spirits on the premises, but only for their sale and use elsewhere.

While admitting "a decided increase in the amount of female intoxication," the Committee sees no reason for interfering with the grocers' licenses, to which so many persons attribute the increase; but it recommends that the entering of liquor in grocers' bills under any other name—such as tea or coffee—should be punishable by the immediate withdrawal of the license."

A Fruitful Sixpence.—At a recent Connectional gathering, at which there was a subscription to be made, Mr. John Haley, the cotton-spinner of Bramley, England, said: "I gave to Methodism the first sixpence I ever possessed; I had earned it by spinning from one spindle; and now I spin from hundreds of spindles at once." He subscribed a hundred guineas. He has realized the truth of the wise man's observation, "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth" (Proverbs 11 : 24).

A Town Saved by a Missionary.—A noble deed of Christian heroism is recorded of an American missionary at Zeitoun, in Central Asia. Some of the Armenian inhabitants of the town revolted against the Governor, upon a question of taxation; they overpowered the small garrison, whereupon the Governor fled, gathered an army, and was about to return with the intention of destroying the whole town in case of resistance being offered to him. At this juncture the missionary received a telegram from the Governor of the province and the English consul asking him to mediate between the rebels and the infuriated Governor.

In this he succeeded, and returned to Marat, where he resided. Here he found the avenging army of the Governor of the town about to march. He wished to inform the Governor of the province, quickly, of the success of his mission in order that the slaughter of the now quiet people might be avoided. The telegraph clerk was unwilling to help him at first, and afterwards the instruments got out of order. Seeing there was no time to lose the missionary mounted a fleet horse and rode across the intervening 136 miles of country to Aleppo, and gained his purpose. The telegraph-operator was dismissed, a Christian Governor appointed, and the whole system of taxation was changed in consequence of this truly Christian act of a noble man.

Religious Progress in Japan.—Intelligence has just been received from missionaries in Japan that the Japanese Government has conceded the right of Christian burial, which is the first positive recognition of Christianity on its part, and that on a point hitherto jealously guarded. All the previous liberties permitted to Christians were on sufferance, as if the Government knew and cared nothing about them. The malign influence of infidel foreigners is more dreaded by the missionaries than the opposition of the Japanese.

The Bible and the Late Russo-Turkish War. —Before a shot had been fired in Turkey, 20,000 New Testaments were sold in Bessarabia, many of which fell into the hands of the Russian soldiers. To show how they were valued the following affecting incident is related: "After a battle, which took place near the Sea of Marmora, one of the colporteurs, paying a visit to the battle-field to see if he could render assistance to any of the wounded, saw one poor soldier lying on his face on the ground. He went to him, turned him over, but found him dead. In his hand was grasped a New Testament, which had evidently been the last source of comfort before yielding up his spirit."

A Scotch Lady's Reward.—A Scotch lady taught a school of Jewish girls for twenty-five years in and about Constantinople before she won a single convert. At the end of that time, a young woman was converted whose father ha given her mother a "writing of divorcemen and put her away;" since that time this daugl ter has, with lowly love for Jesus, and with burning desire to make known to her sex th perfection of beauty, joined herself to the pe sistent Scotch lady, and they steadily went fro strength to strength until now they have thirt two of the daughters of Israel under their car teaching them the doctrine of Christ, having their march overcome the deadly opposition the Jewish Rabbis, who from time to time fu minated such anathemas as they thought woul deter their youth from attending this schoo but the parents and youth found these issues be quite harmless, and the girls continue to lea and hear of Christ.

A General Candle-snuffer.—In one of D Chalmers's ragged schools in Glasgow there w a boy who could not be controlled and was a co stant interruption to the school. After bearir long with him, it was resolved to expel hi The superintendent of the school, seeing el ments of power in the boy, pleaded for one mo trial. It was before the days of gas, and t school-room was lighted with common candle They of course needed frequent snuffing, ar so the superintendent appointed this uncontro lable boy general candle-snuffer. From the com mencement of his work a change came over hi He entered into his work with spirit, and becan one of the best boys in the school. His acti energy only needed employment.

The Slave Trade in Egypt.—The Cairo co respondent of the Cologne Gazette, giving gre praise to Gordon Pasha, the Governor-Gener of the Egyptian Soudan, says: "In the cour of the last four months Gordon Pasha has seiz not fewer than thirty-eight slave car [illegible] Th punishment of death has been inflicted on thr slave-dealers who were found guilty of mutilati their captives. Nevertheless, Gordon admi that he is yet far from being master of the ev and that many years will pass before abhorren of this shameful trade will have really penetra ed the masses, to which it is now nearly u known; Gordon's most efficient means for pr venting the importation of slaves into the Egy tian Soudan, lies in the register which each the provinces under him must keep of all slav in possession of the inhabitants. Every no registered slave is declared at once, irrevocab free."

A Strange Case of Wrong Conviction h come to light in England. William Habron, young Irishman, was tried and condemned death two and a half years ago for the murder a policeman, but the death sentence was com muted to a sentence of penal servitude for lif Last month, however, a notorious burgl named Peace was hanged for shooting a ma and before his execution he confessed that l had committed the murder for which Habro was undergoing punishment. Habron was once set free, and pecuniary compensation ha been made to him by the Government. It is e pected that he will get a life pension. He wa much affected on learning that he was fre especially on hearing that his father—who die from grief at his conviction—was no more. H appears to have much simple faith and stea fastness, and this probably helped to sustain h heart under his terrible trials. "I never b lieved," he says, "that I could be brought i guilty, and when I was condemned I felt sure could not be hanged, for, as I told the pries 'God knows, you know, and I know that I a innocent of this crime, and an innocent man wi never be allowed to suffer for the guilty.'"

This last-mentioned observation of Habron reminds us, however, that in one conspicuous i stance the innocent did suffer for the guilt when Christ suffered on the cross, and "die the just for the unjust, that He might bring to God." "He who knew no sin was made si for us, that we might be made the righteou ness of God in Him" (1 Peter 3 : 18; 2 Co 5 : 21).

Mr. Henry Vincent, whose portrait we present to our readers this week, was possibly well known to most as a popular lecturer. But it would be an injustice to such a man were he to pass from the world's ken with but the simple and evanescent record—that he could talk well. No! Henry Vincent was popular on account of his deeds rather than for his words. He lived

> "Not merely with the mimic life that lies > Within the compass of art's simulation."

His history was remarkable, and it is necessary to recount it somewhat in detail in order to show "what manner of man he was," and also to inform our younger readers as to the struggles for national liberty in which the deceased patriot played so distinguished a part.

Cosmopolitan as were his labors, he was, to use his own words, "essentially a Londoner." He was born in High Holborn, London, in May, 1815, where his father carried on the business of a gold and silver smith, and he died in Gaisford Street, Kentish Town, on December 30th, 1878. Very early, young Henry, in common with the rest of the family, learned that success, like joy, holds no lease in any domestic circle. A series of disasters which thwarted every honest effort of Mr. Vincent, Sr., brought him into difficulties. Closing the shop in Holborn, he betook himself with his family to Hull—a step which in no way tended to a recovery of fortune. Amid these depressing circumstances, Henry lost his father, and against such accumulated odds he stepped forth into "a real world."

His first position was in the service of a printer and bookseller in Hull. Whether the books, to which now by his position he was introduced, enkindled in him the patriotic fire, and laid the foundation for the grand accumulation of political facts, which he in after life demonstrated, or whether they were but the food which his mind was enabled to assimilate, we will not pause to determine.

But we find him in 1835 in the printing-office of Messrs. Spottiswoode, with his views pretty well matured; indeed, so evident does this appear now, that from that starting-point of his public life we note that, though he naturally modified the expression of these early views, he never swerved from the principles which he then adopted for his guidance.

His first appearance in the arena of political life was in 1838, in connection with a movement that created at the time a widespread enthusiasm throughout Great Britain, and which had as its rallying point what is now known as the "People's Charter." This compact was subdivided into six articles, now embalmed for remembrance in history as the "points." Of these, three, the abolition of property qualification for members of Parliament, vote by ballot, and manhood suffrage, which the low rental qualification in towns may be called, have been adopted; but the other three, the payment of members, annual Parliaments, and equal electoral duties, fail even to attract attention in England, at this day.

Mr. Vincent was accused in 1839 of using seditious language at Newport, in Monmouthshire, and was sentenced in the August of that year to twelve months' imprisonment in Monmouth Gaol, and upon his release, after the expiration of the term of his durance, was on another charge taken back whence he came. He was defended by Mr. J. A. Roebuck, member of Parliament for Sheffield. The accusation was based upon certain expressions in an address which he delivered to a large crowd assembled upon Newport Quay, the closing words of which were, "To your tents, O Israel."

He had been associated in his agitations against the refusal of an extension of the franchise to the working man with men whose names have been almost forgotten by the present generation of Englishmen, and whose mortal forms have passed away, in advance of the subject of our sketch. Frost, the most conspicuous of them, was a man of some position, filling the offices of mayor and magistrate at Monmouth. Williams, Watson, Lovett, and Moore may be dimly remembered in Birmingham and in the Principality of Wales, and Ernest Jones held a fair position in Manchester, and distinguished himself more recently as the legal advocate of the Fenians at their last trial in London. Frost and Jones, with others, suffered at the hands of the law for the riots at Monmouth, the design of which the Government concluded was the rescue of Vincent.

Under this apprehension Mr. Vincent was removed from Monmouth Gaol to Millbank, which was then just opened under the new prison régime. He was again removed to Oakham, and each journey became the occasion of a public ovation, he being cheered by the thousands. The working classes who thus applauded him did so because they saw in him a representative of themselves, a man who was suffering indignity and imprisonment on their account; that he had championed their cause, had protested against their oppression, and was suffering for having thus labored for them. The Reform act, which had widely extended the franchise, had abolished certain votes based on ancient customs, the relics of feudal times known as "faggot votes," and this was felt to be a grievance and a wrong done by a measure which professed to be a measure for the benefit of the people. The real fact was that the Reform act of 1848 was designed to admit tradesmen and the lower middle class to the franchise, but it did nothing for any class lower in the social scale.

Upon his release in 1841, Mr. Vincent was welcomed on his return to London with the greatest enthusiasm, and at a public banquet his manly courage was the theme of high eulogium. He never at any moment abated his crusade in the cause of truth and right, though this banquet may be cited as a period to his stormy style of agitation. And, indeed, as a writer in a daily journal remarks, "the political and social system must, at the time of Mr. Vincent's incarceration, have been very defective somewhere to have turned such men as we know Henry Vincent to have been into disturbers of the existing condition of things. It is matter for some wonder that a man so honest, so respectable, so open, and so religious could ever have been regarded as a disturber of social order and an enemy to the throne and altar."

The death of so good a man as Henry Vincent will bring home to the English people the truth as to the former defects of their constitution and their subsequent repairs, and how those who labored hard to bring about an amelioration of social and political life have been misunderstood.

Mr. Vincent repeatedly attempted to enter Parliament, but with no avail; his efforts in that direction commenced with contesting Banbury in 1841. Ipswich, Tavistock, Kilmarnock, Plymouth—towns in which every householder paying an annual rental of $50 had a vote—in their turn refused to accept him as their representative. The general election of 1852 saw his last attempt of this kind at York. He afterwards turned his talents, which were considerable, to good account as a popular lecturer, and travelled in pursuance of that profession, not only throughout the length and breadth of the British Isles, but crossed the Atlantic for several successive years to execute engagements which he had no difficulty in "filling" in the United States.

In this country he was well received, and although his utterances were occasionally unpopular, they were so manifestly dictated by good earnest feeling and were withal uttered in so kindly a spirit, that a genuine liking for the orator was evinced. His courage too recommended him to a people who have a great admiration of that quality. Even after he forsook the more demonstrative form of agitation, he never shrank from joining issue with any one who within his sphere attempted to impede the march of liberty and the right of free discussion. His tongue—"that oiled clipper," as a well-nigh worsted opponent was pleased to call it—was, in his case, a most powerful weapon.

How completely has William Howitt's prophetic utterance, of more than a generation since, concerning him been fulfilled: "We believe him to be a man endowed with qualities and faculties which may yet render him of immense service in the cause of truth and human progress; and we trust he will go forward in the path which he has marked out for himself until he sees the objects which are so dear to his heart completely accomplished."

The fervor of speaking which distinguished him when a young man he matured by cultivation into graceful and effective eloquence. He had considerable powers of mimicry and dramatic tendency, which enhanced his utterances and made him the popular speaker he was.

He wore his hair long, like Mr. W. J. Fox; in build he resembled him, and modelled his speaking after him. The ruddy brown visage and short dark beard of thirty years ago had given place to a paler cast of countenance and to long silvery locks, that made the popular orator look quite a patriarch in the assembly. The strong deep voice, too, had grown husky; but there was all the old fire and earnestness. It seemed as if the vigorous old man had yet not a few years before him.

It is scarcely necessary to say another word concerning Mr. Vincent's intellectual and mora qualities. He was a lovable, warm-hearted man, with beautiful affections. It was patent to al who came into contact with him that he wa cheery and humorous, and while he could sa hard things, he could in a moment turn th rough edge of discontent by the finest sallies o playful ridicule.

His addresses on civil and religious liberty especially his remarkable orations on Cromwell made him one of the most admired and eagerl followed of popular orators, both in Englan and in America. He was continuing this wor up to the time when he was attacked with h last illness, and probably would have continue it, or endeavored to do so, until the period his death, at whatever age that event might ha found him.

For many years Mr. Vincent had officiated a lay preacher on Sundays, both in London ar in the provinces, even in the midst of his hea lecturing seasons. While the lecture platfor was doubtless his special province, he not unfr quently appeared, to the signal edification of t audiences, at the great Reform League and oth bodies.

Although he has lectured till very recently Lancashire, and actually had engagements boo ed in London for the next month, we believe last appearance at a London public meeting w at the annual May Meeting of the Peace S ciety, of which he was ever a warm supporter.

With reference to Mr. Vincent's religi opinions, there could be but little doubt in t mind of any who were intimate with him t he had imbibed deeply the sentiments which p vade the teachings of the Society of Frien But he was at no time a member of that bo To class him, therefore, correctly, he must called rather a member of the congregation t of the society of that body.

He held some peculiar views concerning chu membership, which he never distinctly formu ed, but which, whatever they were, doubt guided him in all he did in church matters, caused him to remain rather in the suburbs the Friends' "city of refuge" than to enter fortress itself.

By the side of his grave evidence was gi that he had died in the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, the power of which was so largely manifested in his life. Though he had had his share of trials, he had found rest and peace through believing in Jesus. Self had been subordinated to Christ, and with his last words he had rejoiced in recalling the words that " the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."

His remains were taken on the 2d inst. from his residence and deposited in the picturesque cemetery at Stamford Hill, once the park attached to the residence of Sir Thomas Abney, the friend of Dr. Isaac Watts, who here spent the later years of his life. The funeral procession consisted of a hearse, or rather a funeral car, followed by three carriages, in which were Mrs. Vincent, widow of the deceased, her daughter, and her two youthful sons, Herbert and Paul Vincent, as chief mourners, with other relatives and friends. In the car referred to, which was open on all sides, the polished oak coffin, with gilt handles, stood visible, and uncovered except by the numerous garlands of white flowers which had been laid upon it.

The ceremony was throughout conducted with a close resemblance to the funeral customs of the Society of Friends, with whom, though not a member of their body, Mr. Vincent had long been closely connected. In accordance with these customs the coffin, instead of being carried into church—according to English custom —was conveyed direct to the grave in the upper part of the grounds. There had been, however, the customary offering of prayers at the house of the deceased, and beside the grave an address was delivered by Mr. Bevan Braithwaite, a member of the society, better known as a distinguished conveyancer. Another address—both being of a religious kind—was delivered by Mr. Swinburne, which was followed by prayer, many of the mourners kneeling during this part of the ceremony upon the planks around the grave. A few words were then spoken by Dr. Kennedy, the Congregational minister, referring in feeling terms to the chief incidents in the life of Mr. Vincent.

An unusual number of ladies were present, among whom many were distinguishable as belonging to the Society of Friends by the quaint old-fashioned costumes still to be seen in the neighborhood of Stamford Hill, though now almost a thing of the past.

Mingled with the little groups which lingered after the mourners had departed were some old Chartist friends of the deceased, now gray and bent with years, who were to be known by their talk of the dark days of '38, and the providential escapes which Mr. Vincent had experienced in towns where, as was observed, in later and happier times he had ever received as a public speaker a respectful and affectionate welcome.

THE ATONEMENT.

By D. L. Moody.

> Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear."—1 PETER 3: 15.

First Glimpse of the Atonement—Adam and Eve's Coats of Skins—Abel's Sacrifice—Cain's Religion—Followers of Cain—A Solo in Heaven—Noah's Sacrifice — Abraham's Sacrifice — The Paschal Lamb—The All-Atoning Blood of Christ —It Makes One as Safe as Another—The Emperor's Decision in the Case of the Conscript—God's Decision in the Case of Mankind.

I WAS a partaker of the Gospel many years before I was able to give a reason for the hope that was within me, but now I think I am prepared not only to give a reason, but to give it in meekness and temerity. Especially ought we to be able to speak about the Atonement.

The first glimpse that we get of the Atonement is there in the third chapter of Genesis, where it says that the seed of the woman shall crush the serpent's head. Well, you know there couldn't be any bruising without blood. But the first actual shedding of blood was there in the twenty-first verse, where we read that Adam and Eve were provided with coats of skins. Of course, animals had to be killed, and that was the beginning of the shedding of the blood of the innocent for the guilty. Even as Adam and Eve went out of Paradise they must have said to themselves that God loved them very dearly, although He was punishing them for their sin.

Then we find that Abel's sacrifice was more esteemed by God than the sacrifice of his brother Cain. Away back there in the morning of creation God had marked out a way of atonement for sin, and because Abel followed that way God loved him. Cain probably said to himself, that he did not like the shedding of blood. The offering of golden grain and luscious fruits seemed to him a more reasonable sacrifice. These two boys were the same, with this difference. Every man that has a religion of his own to-day is and, like him, discards the atonement by blood. But Abel reached Heaven by Cain's murderous act; and as he was the first mortal that ever entered heaven, there must have been a solo sung there once. He was the first to sing the

which has since swelled into such a tremendous chorus.

Just as we find the first dispensation commenced with blood, so we find the second dispensation commenced in like manner. The first thing Noah did after he came out of the ark was to offer up sacrifices of clean animals and put blood between him and God. Abraham, the friend of God, walked in the self-same way, and on Mount Moriah was willing to offer up his only son, Isaac, in whom was all his expectation. God interposed for him, but not for His own Son, who died for you and me on Calvary in sight of that self-same Mount Moriah.

Perhaps as Abraham stood there the veil was lifted, and looking down the vista of time he saw Christ carrying His cross up the side of Calvary. Then comes the time of Moses and the sacrifices of the PASCHAL LAMB.

Although there were a quarter of a million lambs offered up by the Jews, yet we always find them referred to as " the lamb." Some say we ought to preach up Christ's life and not His death. Well, these Jews did not tie the live lambs in their front yards. If they had, none of them would have escaped when death came to every first-born that night. They killed the lamb, and put the blood as a token upon each door-post. Mind you, they did not put it on the step, where it would be trodden under foot, but on the posts.

A good many of us, I fear, are trampling the blood of Christ under foot. Moses was not safer that night than a child six years old. A good many of you are saying you wish you were as good as Dr. Backus, or some other holy man of God; but if you are behind the Blood you are as safe as Dr. Backus or anybody else. Of course, there is such a thing as growth in grace, and we will talk about that by and by; but what we want to think about now is the first principle of Christianity.

The Israelites were not only to have the token of the blood, but they were to eat the lamb as well. Why? Because they had a perilous journey before them, and it was necessary that they should be strong. So you must feed on Christ as well as accept His atoning blood if you want to succeed in walking faithfully the Christian's pilgrimage on earth. You have a good many large families down here, but Christ is enough for every family. By and by, however, the Israelites, when they insisted upon having a king, literally, if I may be allowed the expression, and then they began to feel God's judgment. There are two classes of persons I find—those who believe in all judgment and no mercy, and those who believe in all mercy and no judgment. These must go hand-and-hand—mercy and justice must kiss each other.

VOTED GOD OUT,

Then came Christ, the very Lamb of God Himself, to take away the sins of the world. If Christ had committed one sin Himself He would have had to die for that Himself, but as He was sinless He became a substitute for each of us. The story is told of a man who was conscripted under Napoleon, who furnished a substitute, who was killed. It happened that the man was conscripted again, but he took the ground that he was technically dead, as the substitute had died in his place. When an appeal was taken to Napoleon the Emperor decided that in the law the man was exempt.

This may be true or it may not, but of one thing I am certain, and that is, Jesus Christ died in your stead and mine for our sins, and we are now exempt from the law if we have faith to accept the substitution that has been made. If God has accepted it we ought to be able to. Now, if He has died for us, oughtn't we to live for Him? Who now will lift their voice against Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of their souls? Oh, how ungrateful we are! It isn't manly, it isn't noble, for us to doubt or to be raising our voices in resistance to the Son of God.

A FULFILLED DREAM OF SHIPWRECK AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

RALPH W. WOOD, an English resident in India, returned to his native country about the year 1781. He brought with him his eldest daughter, leaving his wife and three youngest children in India, who were to follow him some time in the next year. When the time had nearly arrived, his wife expected to take passage in the Grosvenor, which was announced to sail in June, 1782.

While making preparations for her departure, she was troubled by a dream of the shipwreck of the vessel. The impression would probably have faded away, had not the dream occurred a second and a third time before the vessel sailed. She then visited the captain, and informed him of her dream, and of her efforts not to allow herself to be influenced by it, until its repetition so impressed her mind, she had resolved that he must sail without her. The friends who were to have accompanied her on the voyage endeavored by reasoning and ridicule to change her mind. The women especially were urgent, but her resolution was not to be changed, and she was left behind.

The Grosvenor sailed on the 13th of June, and on the 4th of August she struck upon the rocks on the coast of Africa, some distance from the Cape of Good Hope. In the attempt to land the crew and passengers, nineteen men lost their lives; the remainder reached the inhospitable shore. The next morning the natives came upon them and carried off all they could lay their hands on without actually plundering their persons. They then determined to journey by land to the Cape, and started upon this expedition under the command of Captain Coxon.

They were followed by the natives, who continually plundered and insulted them. On one occasion they were attacked by a party of more than three hundred Kafirs armed for war, and some were wounded, although none killed. After enduring dreadful privations, at the expiration of one hundred and seventeen days only a small portion of their number succeeded in reaching a settlement near the Cape, where they were kindly cared for by the Dutch Government, although it was then engaged in war with England.

When the news of the loss of the Grosvenor reached England, R. W. Wood gave up his family for lost. At the end of six months, being on a visit to his wife's mother, a carriage drove up to the door. It contained his wife and three children. His joy at thus again beholding them was almost overpowering. The faithful wife had only waited for the next ship that sailed from India, a Danish East-Indiaman, and then safely returned to her husband, to unite with him and her children in thanking God, who in mercy had so wonderfully warned her by a dream and preserved them from impending dangers.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached Sunday Morning, April 20, 1879.

"Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus."—HEBREWS 12 : 1, 2.

The Christian's Life Perpetual War—No Furlough—The Laboratory of a Distinguished Chemist—Looking unto Jesus—I. As our Personal Saviour—Man Ruined by Sin—The Brazilian Murderer—The Two Great R's.—II. As our Example—An Army Stopped by Snow—III. As our Sympathizer—The Sympathy of the Gospel—A Wounded Chaplain on the Battle-field—IV. Look to Jesus for Final Rescue—An Annihilationist at St. Louis—Often Communication Proves the Existence of Heaven—What a Contrast—A Man Overboard.

ALL Bible imagery agrees in representing the Christian life as demanding vigilance and a sharp lookout. No one gets into heaven slipshod. If we arrive there, it will be because we have struggled.

What will be fate of those professors of religion, who, notwithstanding their names have been on the church books thirty, or forty, or fifty years, have no anxiety about their own salvation, and are making no effort for the salvation of others? They will miss heaven. God demands of us endurance, and He puts us into the front of the battle, not to have us cut to pieces, but to test our courage and enthusiasm.

You remember when our late war was going on we sometimes saw in our Northern cities soldiers in uniform ; they were off duty. From the proper authorities they had received a furlough and they had a right to be here. But I have to tell you that in this Christian conflict, from the day when a man enlists under the banner of Christ to the hour when he shouts the victory over death and the grave, he is never off duty, and he never gets a furlough. It is war with the world, war with the flesh, war with the devil, and war all the time.

You may remember that the apostle very often drew illustrations from the Roman and Grecian games, and you may remember how that when a man was running for the prize he would sometimes run with such utter tension of muscle and nerve that he dropped by the roadside ; and there were instances, history tells us, where a man would run for the prize with so much strain of nerve and muscle, that clutching the prize he dropped dead immediately afterward.

Now, says the apostle, making allusion to such a scene, "run"—not crawl, or walk, but "run the race set before you, looking unto Jesus." And as at the end of those games a man would stand with a garland ready to put it upon the brow of the successful competitor, so Christ stands at the end of this Christian race to put upon us the garland of eternal life. God grant that we may so run that we may obtain.

A man asked a distinguished chemist for his laboratory, expecting to be pointed to some large establishment, or to some costly philosophic apparatus, when the chemist ordered his servant to bring in some glasses and a retort, and then the chemist said to his friend : "These are my laboratory—these glasses and this retort ; with these I make all my experiments." The man was surprised.

Well, my friends, while there are those who may take whole libraries to express their theology, and while they have ten thousand ideas about ten thousand doctrines concerning God and eternity and the dead, I tell you plainly this morning that my theology has dwindled to about three words, "looking unto Jesus ;" and the fact is, my friends, when we can understand the height and the depth and the length and the breadth of such an exercise we will understand almost every thing. God help us this morning, preacher and hearer, to spend this hour "looking unto Jesus."

I. And in the first place I remark : We must this morning

LOOK TO JESUS AS OUR PERSONAL SAVIOUR.

I do not now stop to argue what you will admit with myself, that we are only a blasted ruin of what we would have been had not sin touched us.

There is not so much difference between a steamer coming out Liverpool harbor pennants flying, passengers on deck waving, guns booming at the departure, and that steamer driven on Long Island coast, the passengers crushed under the broken timbers, as there is a difference between our nature as it came forth equipped for a magnificent voyage, and our nature piloted by sin, crushed and destroyed the coast of the future stream with the fragments of an awful and an eternal shipwreck.

Why, every physician will tell you, every man who knows any thing about the human system, any man who has ever studied physiology or anatomy will tell you, whether the man be an infidel or a Christian, he will tell you that the human body is disordered ; and we all know that however this morning we may be in robust health, by one touch of disease to-morrow we may be gone. We all know how easily these nerves and these muscles may be played upon by pain and distress and death.

And as to the intellect, is there a man in the house that does not confess the fact that the human intellect is somehow disordered, and who does not understand that there are hundreds of asylums proof of the fact that the strongest and the grandest intellects, intellects most capable of brilliant reasoning, have perished—perished forever?

And as to the soul, our spiritual nature—who denies that it is disorganized, demoralized? The whole head is sick and the whole heart faint. "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God. From he crown of the head to the sole of the foot we are" "full of wounds, bruises, and putrefying sores, which have not been bound up or mollified with ointment.

Where is the man in this assemblage who has never committed sin? Not one. Our nature is astray.

There is in Brazil a flower, a plant called

"THE MURDERER."

That plant poisons every thing it touches. It is a climbing plant. It begins, it winds around the root of a tree and poisons that and destroys it ; then winds up and destroys the trunk ; then winds out and destroys the branches. And so when this plant drops the seed other plants come up just as murderous, and well may that plant of Brazil be called "the murderer."

Well now, my friends, sin is doing that very thing. It drops the seeds of death all around about the nature. It winds around the body, it winds around the mind, it winds around the soul, poisoning, poisoning, poisoning—killing, killing, killing! Oh, it is a deathful work that sin does in the world!

Well, it would be a most ungracious thing for me to stand here this morning and talk about the deathful nature of sin if I had no "Catholicon," if I had no rescue to offer. It would be as though I went into a commercial establishment where the man had just failed in business and began to enlarge on his commercial disasters, while I refused to pay any of his debts or help him out of any of his financial perplexities. It would be as mean as though I should this morning go into a sick-room and enlarge upon the distress of some invalid, while I proposed no physician and offered no medicine. None of us would be so unfair or so cruel as that.

When I tell you of the ruinous nature of sin, I have to tell you also of the rescue. I have to tell you that if stand for ruin, I put right beside that "R" another "R" which stands for redemption. Here is One who comes to pay all our debts. Here is One who comes as a divine physician to cure all our wounds—wounds of the body, wounds of the mind, wounds of the soul.

Louder than the cry of woe is the trumpet blast of God's deliverance as He says : "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thy help."

At the barred gate of the dungeon the conqueror knocks and the hinges creak and grind at the swinging open. Manna falls to us in the desert, and from the cliff tops the floods clap their hands, crying : "Drink, O friend—drink, O beloved!" The cut and torn feet on the bridle path come out on a smooth place, and the alders begin to crackle as the panting hart breaks through to the water brooks, and the night of the soul is turning gray with the morning, yea, it begins to purple and to flame from horizon to horizon.

> "His worth, if all the nations knew,
> Sure the whole earth would love Him too."

Ruined by sin. Rescued by the Gospel.

II. But I remark in the second place, we are to LOOK TO JESUS AS OUR EXAMPLE.

A copyist is always a failure, a dead failure. I care not in what department. If a man wants to become a painter, and he wants to sketch a morning, and he goes to look at Church's or Bierstadt's or Kensett's work, and studies the morning on canvas, or studies it in portfolios, he makes a failure when he comes to sketch the morning. He must go out at daybreak, and dash the dew from the grass, and see the morning as God builds it in the cloud, or pours it upon the mountain, or kindles it upon the sea.

A mere copyist is always a failure. It is so in literature. If a man tries to imitate the smoothness of Addison, or the weirdness of Spenser, or the rugged style of Thomas Carlyle, or the Epigrammatic power of Ralph Waldo Emerson, he is a failure. A man must take his own intellectual faculty, and develop and enlarge it, and culture it. He who tries to imitate another must come to defeat.

The fact is, there was only one Being in all the ages that is fit to copy. He appeared nineteen centuries ago. People watched Him. They watched when He went into a house, watched how long He stayed, watched Him when He came out, watched every word He spake, watched all His actions. Among fishermen He showed what a fisherman should be. Among farmers He showed what a farmer should be. Among tax-gatherers He showed what a tax-gatherer should be. Among rulers He showed what a ruler should be. Perfect example.

Do you want an example of devotion? Behold Him whole nights in prayer. Do you want an example of industry? Behold Him busy for the welfare of the world. Do you want an example of patience? Struck, but not striking back. Do you want an example of self-sacrifice? Behold His life of shame, His death of ignominy, His sepulchre of humiliation. All for His friends. Oh! no, I call that back. Not for His friends—for His enemies, His sworn enemies. Coming with wounds in the hands, wounds in the feet, wounds in the head, wounds in the side, wounds in the heart, crying out : "Father, forgive them they know not what they do."

O my friends! if we could only get some o this spirit in our own souls—if we could only become copyists of this glorious example, why it would take all the rugosities out of our disposition. It would take all the harsh words fron our address. It would make us placid and genial and gentle and forgiving. How little of thi we have in our hearts and lives, my brethren Oh! if we could get this spirit of Christ into ou soul, people would see it. They would say, " know what is the matter with that man ; I knov where he has been : he has been with Jesus."

ALEXANDER AND HIS ARMY

once were stopped by the ice and the snow Marching on for a long while, they came to wher they could march no further, and Alexande dismounted from his war-horse, and taking pickaxe began to dig into the ice and the snow and the men in his army, the soldiers in his army saw their general and their king digging int the ice and the snow, and they took their picl axes and began to hew away, and soon the roa was clear enough to let them pass, and the marched on.

Christ, our Commander and our King, di mounts from the glories of heaven, and He begins to hew away amid the sins and the sorrows and the perils and the hardships of this world. In that path, He going ahead, we follow. God help us to follow. Where Christ went we ought to be willing to go. The servant ought not to want to have it easier than his master. God grant that we may be willing to follow in His footsteps. Glorious example, perfect example for all ages.

III. Again I remark: we are to LOOK TO JESUS AS OUR SYMPATHIZER.

We cannot get along without sympathy. I could not live a day without sympathy. We all want sympathy.

Why is it when you go to some place of amusement, to a concert, or into an art-gallery, you want friends with you. You want sympathy in your joy. Why is it when bereavement comes to your household, you want your friends to come in? Why is it when there is a sick one in your home you want your friends to come in? It may be they do not say a single word, but they sit there; there is comfort in their very presence. In other words, you want sympathy.

And yet, strange to say, there are a great many people who seem to get along without any earthly sympathy and without any divine sympathy. They do not implore God's sympathy in the insurance company, in the banking-house, in the factory. Their fortune takes wings and flies away, and they have nothing to comfort them. There seems to be no voice saying to them: "I have taken your money, but I am going to make up for all this by heavenly treasures. I own the cattle on a thousand hills, and you will never want; all is well." They do not apply for that sympathy.

Death comes into the nursery. One voice less in the music of the household. Two hands less busy with the toys. Two feet less bounding through the hall. And yet they do not seem to hear any Divine voice saying: "I am the shepherd; that lamb is not lost; I have only taken it off the cold mountains; all is well." They do not seem to want that sympathy. They do not apply for it. I tell you, my friends, it is the mystery of life to me that people can get along without God's sympathy, and I tell you why it is they stay away from God: it is because they do not know Him. If you knew what a great loving heart He has, if you knew how that heart aches for human suffering, if you knew what sympathy there is in the Lord Jesus Christ, you would not tarry away from Him one minute, you who have misfortunes and trials. It is because you do not know Him.

Now there are two or three passages of Scripture that throb with eternal sympathy. They are full of balsam and balm. Pressed to the heart they will heal almost any wound. "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He will sustain thee." "Come unto Me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Oh! I am so glad that the Divine Shepherd has higher pastures, in which He leads the wounded of the flock when the lower pastures wither and give way. Oh what a blessed thing it is to know that while all other trees may fail to give fruit, God has one tree in His orchard that never fails. Oh the sympathy of the Gospel!

IN OUR LATE WAR

a chaplain fell wounded to death. While in the night the chaplain lay on the battle-field, he heard in the distance a groan, and then the cry, "O my God!" The chaplain thought to himself, "I am wounded and must die, and I can't walk; but I must go to that suffering man, and so," he said, "I'll roll over to him." And the wounded chaplain, unable to walk, rolled over in his own blood, and rolled over the bodies of the slain until he came to that dying man, and comforted him, putting, as it were, his own wound against that man's wound, and his own sorrow against that other man's sorrow.

My friends, the Lord hears the groan of our bereavement, the groan of our poverty, the groan of our earthly distress, and He comes rolling over in His own blood, rolling over this battle-field, rolling over to where we are, and He puts His everlasting arm over us, and we see His hand is wounded, and he presses us to His own wounded side, and He says, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." Oh! the sympathies of the Gospel—the eternal sympathies of the Gospel. If I preach the Gospel forty years longer, if I can stand in the pulpit and preach forty years longer, I would like to give the forty years to telling the people of the sympathy of the Gospel, the eternal sympathies of the Gospel.

IV. But I remark again, we must

LOOK TO JESUS FOR FINAL RESCUE.

There is a heaven. You know it. I will not stop to reason about it. Some man might be sceptical and deny it. As in the hotel at St. Louis a few weeks ago, a gentleman sent his card to me, and said he would like to see me. I went into the parlor of the hotel at St. Louis, and it seemed to be his chief errand to tell me that I was wrong in regard to the existence of the heaven of which I had spoken the previous day in one of the churches, and he went on to try to prove to me that there was no heaven, no hereafter, and that when we quit this world we quit existence. "Oh!" I said, "I cannot stop to argue with you; that is horrible, that is horrible."

I will not stop this morning to argue with you that there is a heaven. You know there is. Some one says, "Have you seen the place?" No; neither have we seen Russia, neither have we seen Japan, neither have we seen China. We know there are such places, because there has been so much communication between those lands and our land. That is the way I know there is a heaven.

It is by the often, the swift communication between the two worlds this and that. "They hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them any more, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

There is a heaven. And what a contrast between earth and heaven! This barrenness, and that verdure; between the streams of earth so shallow that a thirsty ox might drink them dry or a mule's hoof might trample them into the mire, and that river from under the throne of God, on the banks of which the armies of heaven recline; between the instruments of earthly music so easily cracked into discord, and the harmonies that drip from seraphic harps, and the trumpets so musical they wake the dead; between these streets, along which we go panting in summer heat or shivering in winter cold, and along which the poor man carries his burden, and the beggar asks for alms, streets on which you ever hear the shuffling feet of pain and distress and suffering and want, and those heavenly streets.

OH, WHAT A CONTRAST

between this and that, and we are invited to go out of this scene of suffering and distress and pain and bereavement into that scene of reunion and blessedness and joy forever.

Well, now, it will not be much of a change for you who have had it easy all your days, who have lived in castles, who have had regal apparel—it will not be so much of a change for you, nor for you who have always been well, hardly knowing what a feeling of sickness is—always well, it will not be so much of a change for you; but for you who have suffered illness, you who have been bereft, you who have run against great odds in life, you who have found life a struggle—what a change it will be for you! And it will be a blissful change.

Said a little blind girl to her mother, "Mamma, will I be blind in heaven?" Oh, no," said the mother, "my darling, you will not be blind in heaven; you will see in heaven; you will see as well as I do, in heaven." Said a little cripple child, "Mamma, will I be lame in heaven?" "No," said the mother, "my darling; you will not be lame in heaven, never lame in heaven." Oh! what emancipation and eternal release for those who have suffered in this world when they enter that scene which God has prepared for those who love Him!

"There shall I bathe my weary soul
In seas of heavenly rest,
And not a wave of trouble roll
Across my peaceful breast."

Oh! will you be ready through Christ the Lord to enter that heaven? You must look to Jesus for that final rescue. He only can fit you for it. You and I will soon step out either into gigantic splendor or gigantic despair.

Three worlds are this morning contending for the mastery of our immortal spirit. Who shall have it? Heaven says: "Give it me." Powers of darkness say: "Give it me." Earth says: "Give it me." Who shall have it? The immortal spirit! Oh! how much Christ has done to win you, my brother—to win you, my sister, to Himself. Through what tears, across what sharp edges of torture, down what steep declivities, through what murky night, Christ came to save you and to save me! Would that our hearts might be melted at the story, and that we might look to Him this day and live, taking Him as our personal Redeemer, as our glorious example, as our magnificent Sympathizer and our eternal Rescue.

There was

from a ship on the sea, and there was no one willing to risk himself by leaping into the wave after him; but after a while a man came up from the cabin flushed with excitement, and said: "Five thousand pounds reward for any one who will save that man; he is my brother." By the large inducement some one leapt into the wave and made the rescue. Oh my friends, I wish you could see this Christ to-day, standing and looking upon your sinking soul as He cries out: "Here are my tears, here is my blood, here is my life for a ransom," instead of waiting for some other one to effect the rescue, leaping into the wave of sin and trouble and darkness to bring you ashore, to bring you to the deck, thrusting His arm this morning under the wave. O! clutch it, clutch it and live!

"From the cross uplifted high,
Where the Saviour deigns to die,
What melodious sounds I hear
Bursting on the ravished ear,
Love's redeeming work is done;
Come, and welcome, sinner, come."

THE QUAKER'S TEMPER MASTERED.

A London merchant had a dispute with a Quaker respecting the settlement of an account. The merchant was determined to bring the account into court, a proceeding which the Quaker earnestly deprecated, using every argument in his power to convince the merchant of his error; but the latter was inflexible. Desirous to make a last effort, the Quaker called at his house one morning and inquired of the servant if his master was at home. The merchant, hearing the inquiry, and knowing the voice, called out from the stairs, "Tell that rascal I am not at home." The Quaker, looking up at him, calmly said, "Well, friend, God put thee in a better mind." The merchant, struck afterwards with the meekness of the reply, and having more deliberately investigated the matter, became convinced that the Quaker was right and he was wrong. He requested to see him, and after acknowledging his error, he said, "I have one question to ask you. How were you able, with such patience, on various occasions, to bear my abuse?" "Friend," replied the Quaker, "I will tell thee. I was naturally as hot and violent as thou art. I knew that to indulge this temper was sinful, and I found that it was imprudent. I observed that men in a passion always spake aloud, and I thought if I could control my voice, I should repress my passion. I have therefore made it a rule never to let my voice rise above a certain key, and by a careful observance of this rule, I have, by the blessing of God, entirely mastered my natural temper."

IT was proved, as we have seen, that the priest had a docile and obedient flock. The power which sacerdotalism has over the ignorant and superstitious is irresistible—for who would dare risk eternal damnation? Mr. Montaigne, however, a third time tried open-air preaching, but he tried it a third time in vain, and an equal failure it would be did he try it forever—the ears of his Roman Catholic parishioners were effectually closed against him.

Tract distribution was then resorted to, but, alas! the great majority of his poorer neighbors could not read, and those who could would not peruse the tracts he gave them. Some refused to accept any printed paper from him at all; some, not to hurt his feelings, took the proffered gift, but threw the leaflets they pretended to accept in the mud at their feet and trampled on them the moment his back was turned, and many, more rude, taking the tract he offered, tore it into fragments before him and cast the small pieces in his face.

With many a bitter pang he asked himself what further could be done, and the answer was, "Nothing. Only work hard among the few Protestants under your charge, and by a holy life shine as a light amid the surrounding moral and spiritual darkness. Adorn the Gospel you profess, and thus commend it."

It was not easy, however, to keep clear from getting into difficulty with this ignorant and fanatical people, as the following incident will show—which, though seeming strange, is a fact.

STRANGE INCIDENT ABOUT HIS COW.

Mr. Montaigne had a dairy cow to sell, which had been fed on "the glebe land," and he had the animal driven to a fair held a few miles distant in the neighborhood to obtain a purchaser, he himself attending as salesman. Upon arriving at the fair green it was not long until there was an opportunity for business. A man who lived on one of the outskirts of his large parish, in a poor mountain district, struck with the beauty of the animal, drew near to examine her, and after viewing all her points, evidently much admired her.

He asked the price the clergyman wanted for his "baste," and on hearing it looked much disappointed, for it surpassed his financial limit. Mr. Montaigne knew the man. His name was Owen Quinn, and, though ignorant, like his class in the district, he had been always civil, and once rebuked a man who had insulted the clergyman.

Mr. Montaigne, therefore, felt an interest in him, so that, hearing from him the bounds of his purse, and desirous of getting into his favor, he made a considerable abatement in his price for the cow, and Owen Quinn became its owner.

It was dark that evening when, driving the cow before him, Owen arrived at his dwelling. Securing the animal in the "byre," he passed into his little cottage to get his supper.

"Well, Owen," said Bridget, his wife, a baby on her knee, "so, ma cushla, you've got the cow. I hard her feet in the yard, and wanted to welcome her home, but sorra a bit the young wan, the darlint, would let me. The momint I made to rise from the creepy (a low stool), Padhreen shouted that loud as if he'd deafen me."

"I hard him, the little villian," replied Owen; "and I thought with myself what a fine pair o' lungs—blessins on him—the Lord has given him. But never mind, Bridget, asthore; the young thief 'll be asleep afore I'm done with the praties and milk, and you'll be all right then to feast your eyes on the beauty of a baste that I've bought ye."

After supper, young Padhreen fast asleep, as was prophesied, and snoring in his rude cradle, Owen and Bridget repaired to the cowshed to inspect the new arrival. Bridget, casting a knowledgable look upon shape, color, udder, horns, and hoofs, confirmed Owen's verdict that she was a "rale beauty," and when told the price given declared that, in her opinion, she was worth double the money.

"That's me own noshun too," responded Owen; "and I think we can't do better than jist at wanst put the blessin' upon her, and that more betoken as I bought her from Mr. Montaigne, the Protestant Minister. Do you run into the house, mavourneen, and fetch the bottle, and I'll perform the needful."

His allusion was to a bottle of holy water, which, upon a payment, had been obtained, on the previous Sabbath, at the chapel from the priest. The use of such an element, a relic of paganism, to charm away upon application all evil from man or beast, as the case might be, was, and we fear is, almost general upon the part of the ignorant in Ireland.

Bridget lost no time in obeying the suggestion of her husband. She left Owen in the byre with the candle in his hand, still complacently surveying his purchase, entered the house, and, groping her way to a shelf, laid hold, as she thought, upon the bottle of holy water. She then hastened back to her husband, and, handing him the vessel of sacred fluid, took her stand by his side to witness his performance of the potent ceremony.

Owen uncorked the bottle—it held about a pint—and using very sacred words, which we will not quote, poured some of the water, mysterious in its power, between the horns of the cow. To his great surprise in a second or two the animal wildly tossed up her head, tugged hard at the rope which held her to the stall, and worked most violently.

"Stand quiet, will you, you heretic brute," said Owen, as he applied a larger measure of the liquid, not only upon the head, but along the back of the restive quadruped. To his amazement and horror the holy water hissed and boiled as though it had come in contact with fire, and had not fallen upon the cool skin of a living animal.

The creature tugged harder still at her fastenings, and kicked and plunged as though gone mad. Owen drew back, pale as death. It seemed to him that a fiery demon, or something of that sort, must possess the creature which, in a luckless hour, he had introduced to his homestead; and, paralyzed with fear, he stood stock-still, gaping at the wild and demoniacal struggles of the cow, helplessly holding at the same time the bottle in his hand.

Bridget saw his awful fright and powerless condition. Women have not the active courage of men, but perhaps they have more fortitude. At all events, in the present case the wife had more self-possession than the husband. Bridget, mastering her own terror, took the bottle of holy water from the impotent Owen, and with a wild swing of her arm dashed all the remaining contents upon the raging animal. As though with a supernatural force, when this was done the captive creature snapped as a packthread the rope that bound her, flung herself furiously against her owners, male and female, bore them with violence to the ground, rushed like a tempest through the cowshed door, bounded from the little inclosure outside, and, bellowing loudly, stampered in the darkness like one possessed over field, hedge, and ditch, in the surrounding country.

Next morning she was found miles away from the place of her flight, wounded, torn, and dead. The two human beings, half stunned by their violent fall on the hard byre floor, lay for a while thunder-stricken and speechless. Bridget was the first able to speak. "Owen!" she gasped out, "Owen! oh, the villain of a cow! Isn't the Protestant deep in her?"

Our readers, no doubt, will have anticipated the explanation of the poor animal's mad career. On the shelf to which Bridget went in the dark there were two bottles, one of holy water and the other of vitriol. In her haste she had laid hold upon the latter. This was discovered by her on the following morning, but she concealed the fact from her husband, for, being his second wife and much younger than Owen, she was somewhat in awe of him and dreaded his anger if she revealed her stupid mistake, one that involved the loss to him and her of, to persons in their circumstances, a vast and ruinous amount of capital.

Owen Quinn had contracted a deadly hatred of Mr. Montaigne, on account of a secret belief that the cow which he had purchased from that gentleman had while in Mr. Montaigne's possession been the subject of satanic influence. He was of opinion that the Protestant clergyman, who was the late owner of the beast, knew of the untoward influence. This accounted, too, he reasoned within himself, for his ready lowering of the cow's price. What was done with the appearance of kindness and good-will was in reality, he now imagined, only an act of shameless deceit and treachery.

But the real fact of the case was, as we have already seen, that Bridget, his wife, was sent for a bottle of holy water. But, unfortunately for all concerned, a bottle of vitriol, which was standing upon the same shelf, was brought by mistake, and Collie naturally objected to the administration of such an irritant blessing upon its head. This little episode was not explained to Owen, for the simple reason that Bridget did not discover it until the mischief was done.

Owen thought that Father Curtis was too hard upon the Protestant minister when he called him an agent of Satan; but it now was plain as day to him his priest had but spoken the simple truth. "Shure the very bastes upon his ground," he said to himself, "had becum, it was plain, the dwelling-places of demons. He had lost, alas! his cow and his money, but was it not the very height o' good luck that he had secured the holy water. It cost something handsome, it is true; but it was proved 'dir chape,' for it had miraculously discovered t him the infernal power he was bringing into hi home and had driven far from him and his th Evil One. He'd take precious good care, however, that he'd never no more have daylins wit heretic ministers, or any o' their sort; and i ever a good chance cum he'd be revenged upo that wan o' thim—that he wud—that tuk a cru advantage of his simplicity and innocence."

Some time after this fever broke out in th parish—the dreadful typhus, that disease o overcrowding, poverty, and dirt. And as th people, in spite of the dispensary doctor's advice, would have "wakes"—that is, grim fest gatherings in their houses around the dead—through infection the mortal sickness rapid spread. Scores were carried off, often who families in a single week, and the grave hillock multiplied fast in the chapel burial-ground.

Father Curtis and his curate had more to c in their sacred calling than they could manag Administering "the last rites of the Churc far and wide to the dying in the large paris and conducting burial services at home, and sa ing "no end o' masses" for the dead, was e hausting work.

Indeed, after some time, the poor curate hi self sickened and died, as, compelled by t sacerdotal theory of his Church—namely, th priestly service is absolutely needful to salvati —he had to enter, according to his vow, t rooms of the dying, however poisoned the a and, in administering extreme unction, to co into contact with their persons. He con quently "tuk the sickness" himself, and, vital stamina lowered by much toil, he speed succumbed. His death caused a panic in t district, and help from neighbors to fresh fe cases in the cottages near them was denied.

Mr. Montaigne had no access whatever to the k and dying people, A visit from him would ve been resented as a peril to their souls and impertinent intrusion. He, however, acted e good Samaritan by gifts of medicine, money, d wine, speaking whenever he could a word of ospel instruction and consolation to those who me for his bounty, and his good wife Dora ow the mother of a beautiful boy, called nold after his father) well seconded him in his erciful work. Day after day, and even by ght, they ministered as good angels to the eds of the people.

One day Mr. Montaigne, in returning from a stant part of his parish—he had been to visit e of his own flock—had to pass the cottage of ven Quinn, to whom several months before he d sold his cow. The purchaser since that day had never met. Quinn, from antipathy and perstitious dread, as we know, had avoided m. As he drew near the cabin he heard a teous wail. His compassion was stirred, and moved to the place from whence the voice of ourning came, hoping to minister some help. hen he entered the little dwelling he was uched to the heart and shocked at the vision hich met his eyes.

Bridget Quinn—poorly clad, her face not ithout beauty, though haggard and pale—sat ith a dead child, little Padhreen, upon her knee. e stooped over the infant corpse, which, not ntorted nor emaciated, but round in form d of a pure white, like marble, lay upon r arm. The mother's raven hair, all dishevel-d, fell upon the face of the dead one, and her ars dropped upon its cheeks like rain.

Absorbed in her grief, she did not notice Mr. ontaigne's coming in, but with head bowed low, d with passionate and bitter lamentation, she oke to the loved one that, alas! would hear her oice no more. "Oh, my beautiful one!" she ied, "my own Padhreen! the light o' me eyes nd the pulse o' me heart! My darlin' and vely boy, me pride and me threasure, won't ou hear me?—smile at me?—look on me?—eak to me wanst more? Oh, why did the Lord ke ye from me? Shurely it warn't much to ask im to lave you by me side. Barrin' you, He adn't given us much more nor poverty and hruble in this world.

Drawing a step or two nearer to her, with a lear, full voice, yet thrilling with emotion, Mr. ontaigne said, "'Suffer,' says the Holy Saviour Jesus, 'the little children to come unto Me, nd forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'"

The words were new to the wailing woman; he had never heard them before; and not having seen Mr. Montaigne on his entrance, and ot knowing him by sight, his words, full of the ight and music of Divine love, while they startled, yet charmed her. As though they had ome direct from heaven, they went like a ray of warm sunshine to her heart.

The Protestant minister once again had the ear of a Roman Catholic, and the truth he had o utter proved its power, for pouring upon the soul of the bereaved one the balm of Heaven's own comfort, he succeeded in softening her sorrow and diminishing her tears.

After a time he asked for her husband. "He's in there," said she, pointing to a door in a partition which divided the cottage, "and I'm afeard I'm goin' to lose him, too; for he's down, bad as bad can be, in the fever." Mr. Montaigne advanced towards the opening; Bridget made a grasp at his arm to hold him back, but, too far from her, she failed to arrest him, and he passed into the room. There another melancholy spectacle presented itself. On a straw bed, and almost without covering, for the loss of his cow and other misfortunes had forced Quinn to part with most of his effects. the sick man lay, and was to all appearance rapidly sinking to the grave. From want of proper warmth, care, and nourishment, the pestilent disorder which had seized him, his visitor could see, was fast doing its work of death.

THE NIHILISTS IN RUSSIA.

Their Origin, Aims, and Methods of Operation.

The recent attempted assassination of the Czar of Russia has attracted renewed attention to the society known as Nihilists, by whom it is supposed the attack on his life was directed.

The vast empire of Russia, said to comprise one seventh portion of the territorial surface of the globe, and containing a population of over ninety millions, is under the absolute rule of the Czar, and the people have no voice, either by representation or otherwise, in the conduct of government. Under a system of despotism abuses must inevitably flourish, for however wise and benevolent the personal ruler may be, he is liable to be misled by the opinions of interested persons who surround him, and he must intrust a considerable part of his power and authority into the hands of men unfitted to exercise it with benefit to either the ruler or the people. So it has been in Russia, and the Czar, who is said to be a man of a kindly, humane disposition, is held responsible for acts of cruelty and oppression perpetrated by subordinate officials.

A feeling of bitter hostility to the government has for some time been prevalent throughout the country, and the vigorous measures adopted to repress it has only fanned the flame, until at the present time the Nihilist and kindred secret societies have spread through the nation like a cancer, and number among their adherents men and women of every rank in society.

The cruelties practised in the fierce suppression of an insurrection in 1825 left in the minds of survivors and their friends an insatiable craving for vengeance, which issued early in the following year in the formation of a secret society, established with the design of overthrowing despotism and giving Russia a free constitution. The leader of the society was Hertzen, a man of conspicuous ability, whose writings exercised a powerful influence over the minds of Russian youth. He published a journal in London, which was secretly smuggled into Russia and eagerly read. It contained details of court intrigue and reports of affairs in the Czar's palaces, supplied to Hertzen by secret allies in high position at St. Petersburg, and revealed much of the workings of the machinery by which the people were oppressed.

The society was the object of a furious persecution by the authorities. Many of its members were executed, and others exiled or imprisoned, but notwithstanding the efforts made to extirpate it, it increased in number and in power. Journals, political treatises, and novels issued from its printing presses, and were widely circulated among all classes of society.

In 1870 this society took the name of Nihilists, from the Latin word Nihil, signifying nothing, indicating that those who took the name believed in none of the ideas and doctrines either in religion or politics considered orthodox in Russia. From this time they began to take decided and important action. The young men spread themselves through the different provinces, propagating the new ideas among the peasantry, presenting them with books and instigating them to revolution. Young ladies, even of the highest ranks of society, dressed themselves as peasants and sought menial employments, that they might instruct others in their peculiar views. Tombovskoie, a wealthy princess, moving in court circles, was discovered among peasant washerwomen, with a like object. In the schools the young girls nearly all became converts, and no restrictions, no persecutions, have been able to arrest the rapid growth of Nihilism.

It is necessarily a secret Order, for a traitor among its members might consign the whole fraternity to death. The following are some of the secrets of the Nihilist Order. The society is administered under the following rules: Six members can form a separate body, or circle, with full power to act and receive new members, but only with the greatest precautions. A candidate for admission must be recommended as a trustworthy man, upon whom reliance can be placed under any circumstances. After satisfactory investigation the circle, in full meeting, votes on the new member. Two votes against him are sufficient cause of rejection. One may be if the opposing member can support his opposition by undoubted evidences of disqualification. A newly-chosen member is invited to a meeting of the circle, where he must take a solemn obligation or oath, in which he pledges himself to sacrifice his life and all that is sacred to him in the struggle against the tyrants and oppressors of the Russian people; that he will obey and execute every unanimous decision of the circle without hesitation, regardless of any personal danger he may encounter in so doing. He avows himself a sworn enemy of the Russian Government, and promises to immediately begin to act against it by every means he can command.

When a circle reaches the number of sixty it is subdivided into ten circles of six each, so that if discovered by the police only six persons will suffer arrest. Into these circles, which meet ostensibly only for social purposes, as in the enjoyment of friendly hospitality, it is sought to draw in members from every class of society—military officers of every rank, common soldiers, the middle classes and peasantry. It is the passion of the day, and the dreadful mystery which envelops the Order adds to the fascination. Every member according to his means makes weekly or monthly payments to the treasurer. Money is used for the purchase of arms, the propagation of free ideas among the peasantry—each circle sending an armed agent on this errand. Many women belong to these circles. In every town and large village of Russia there are so many circles, that had the government a true conception of the extent of their number it would be even more seriously alarmed than it is.

The audacity with which the Nihilists avow their principles and acts is an important feature of their society, and shows the dangerous character of the organization. This feature was brought into prominence after the recent murder of Prince Krapotkine by a Nihilist agent. A placard was posted through the capital by the society, avowing the deed and stating the causes which had led to its commission, and concluding with these remarkable words: Death for death, execution for execution, terror for terror. This is our answer to the threats, the persecutions and the oppression of the government.

So appalling is the struggle now in progress in Russian society. Injustice and oppression have evoked lawless retaliation, and the social problems of the future will, it is feared, be worked in blood. We can only pray that they may be solved by the doctrines of the Prince of Peace having a full and wide extension in Russia, teaching men that they are brothers, and moving governors and people alike to a mutual recognition of each other's rights, as inculcated by our blessed Lord in his sermon on the Mount.

A Sudden Death at a Revival Service occurred recently at the Ton, in Wales. About nine o'clock, just before the close of the service, Mrs. Burnell, wife of one of the leaders of the chapel, who was not a member herself, was asked by her husband whether she would give her heart to God. In a little while she exclaimed, "I will," and leaving her seat, knelt in front of the penitent rail, still praying.

The congregation were singing "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," when the minister advanced towards Mrs. Burnell, and asked her whether she could praise God from whom all blessings flowed. She replied, "Oh, yes, I can; I have laid my all on Jesus." Then, being apparently overcome, she rose from her kneeling posture, and after an attempt to loose her dress at the throat, walked to the vestry door, still praying aloud. Some of the ladies in the congregation went to her and laid her down, she still being earnestly engaged in prayer, and she died within ten minutes from the time when she announced her conversion, and before a medical man could be procured.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

DR. TALMAGE says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES : "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Candidates in the Next Presidential Election, as at present designated by public opinion, are General Grant and Mr. S. J. Tilden, although it is probable that as the time approaches other names will come to the front.

Republicans are fully alive to the prejudice certain to exist against a third-term candidate, but there is a general feeling that no other man of that side would have an equal chance of success. Many names have been suggested, but of these, some are not sufficiently known, and the others are too thoroughly known to inspire confidence.

Of Mr. Tilden's prospects Democrats themselves are not sanguine, on account of the cipher-telegram scandal, but he has claims on his party too weighty to be ignored, and his influence forms an important factor in calculating the chances of party success. If that influence is not sufficiently potent to secure his own election, it might, in the present condition of parties, be fatal to any other Democratic candidate who might be run, if Mr. Tilden, feeling himself slighted, suffered personal pique to override party ties and opposed the man preferred to himself.

The Sitting of the Senate on April 16th was diversified by a scene between Senators Beck and Hoar, in which the latter endeavored to extract from Senator Beck a retractation of his threat which was to the effect that unless the President signed the appropriation bills as they were, political riders and all, the Democratic majority in Congress would refuse to vote supplies for the support of the Government.

Senator Beck, however, in reply refused to admit he had made such a threat, and an appeal was made to the record and the exact words used by the Senator were read, which Senator Hoar contended constituted a threat, but Mr. Beck denied the imputation. Eventually Mr. Bayard acted as peacemaker and effected a truce.

A Series of Frauds on the Revenue of a remarkable character have produced a loss of over a million dollars a year. Advertisements for old postage stamps are constantly appearing in daily newspapers, and some curiosity has been excited as to the purposes to which they were applied. It has now been discovered that it is possible to wash off the defacing mark impressed on them at the Post Office, and to make them do duty a second time. The Post Office authorities are engaged in experimenting on inks, with the view of manufacturing a kind the marks of which cannot be removed.

The Largest Single Subscription ever made in any country to a government funded loan was tendered by the First National Bank, on behalf of itself and eighteen other banking institutions of New York and Boston on April 17th. The subscription was for $150,000,000 bonds bearing interest at 4 per cent, and the transaction will doubtless have the effect of raising the financial credit of this country throughout the world to no small degree. Secretary Sherman has by his funding operations, replacing bonds bearing a higher rate of interest by those at a lower rate, saved the country since September, 1877, an amount which aggregates nearly $15,000,000 a year.

One of the More Prominent among the Leaders of the Confederacy during the war, General Richard Taylor, died in this city, April 12th. He was born near Louisville, Ky., January 27th, 1826, and was the only son of President Zachary Taylor. After graduating from Yale College in 1845, he participated with his father in the Mexican War, and then retired to a large sugar plantation in Louisiana, where he continued to reside until the breaking out of the Rebellion. Since the close of the war he has lived in New Orleans, employed in a public office. He has contributed during the last three years some notable papers to the North American Review, and recently published a volume that has attracted attention on "Destruction and Reconstruction."

The First of the Appropriation Bills will not, it is expected, reach the President before the end of April ; and it will then be loaded with political amendments which render its acceptance doubtful. It is therefore not impossible that we shall have an almost uninterrupted period of political excitement, extending through this summer and autumn, the next session of Congress, and the Presidential canvass of 1880, which cannot be called a pleasant or reassuring prospect.

Sunday in Cincinnati.—The Religious Portion of the inhabitants have taken steps to promote the better observance of the Lord's Day in Cincinnati.

A committee of prominent men have gone to the Legislature at Columbus, carrying with them a petition praying for a law to suppress the immoral practices hitherto allowed on Sundays. All classes and all denominations signed willingly, for the evil had assumed large proportions, and it is the universal wish that the outrageous variety shows and low dens of infamy be suppressed, if not on week days, at least on Sunday, which, being established as a day of rest, all feel should not be given over to wild orgies and dissipation.

Nine Thousand Dollars Sent in Answer to prayer.—The Bible and Fruit Mission, which has done so much good in New York among the sick poor, was recently in need of a large sum of money to complete the building of a coffee-house, urgently needed to counteract the influence of the liquor-saloons in the neighborhood of the Convalescent Home. While the faith of some was staggered, a band of believing workers for six weeks waited in importunate and regular prayer. With quiet assurance, at last, that the requisite means would be granted, the original mover in the work waited the event which transpired. When it was announced that a gentleman of large wealth had called upon Miss Susan R. Kendall, the President of the Association, and pledged the sum of $9000, the band of praying, believing women, active members of the Association, was thrilled with feelings that found a response in the hearts of all sympathizing in the work.

On Wednesday April 16th, at the praise meeting there were many petitions for blessing upo the donor, who is Mr. J. J. Astor of this city.

The Day Nursery Established in Connectio with the Female Branch of the New York Cit Mission is a great benefit to poor women in th city. The report just issued says : " The statistics of four months show an average daily attendance of twenty-five children. Several mother have been able to procure work who could no have done so but for this provision for the chi dren. Nor is this all ; mothers who before ha not realized how much the loveliness of their li tle ones would be increased by cleanliness hav learned a lesson they seem not to forget. S great is our interest and faith in this mode giving help and instruction together, we woul be glad to see such nurseries established all ove the city, in locations convenient to the thousan of poor women who are forced to leave the little ones to earn their daily bread."

So much good work is being done in man ways by this branch of the City Mission, that ought not to languish for lack of funds. A de of over $900 exists, for the liquidation of whic contributions would be welcomed. They shou be sent to Mrs. A. R. Brown, 50 Bible House.

A Pie-seller's Benevolence.—A Gentlema well known for his generous benefactions w asked what part of his income he was in t habit of contributing to the Lord's treasur "I do not know," said the brother ; " I do ve much as the woman did who was famous for t excellence of her rhubarb pies. She put in much sugar as her judgment dictated, and th shut her eyes and put in a handful more : I gi all my judgment approves, and then add a han ful without counting it." We commend t plan to those who believe that " he that sowe bountifully shall reap also bountifully," a who wish to err upon the safe side.

An Infidel Comedian Converted.—Mr. E. P. Hammond, whose labors in Ontario have been reatly blessed, found an opening among the rand Trunk Railway employ s of Brantford, umbering some 150 men. He made it a prac-ce with some of the Christian workers to hold half-hour meeting at noon in their reading oom, where the stage of a small theatre the en have erected is converted into a pulpit for he preacher and seats for the choir. A great ork is begun among these men. One of them amed Alfred Stevens, who was a comedian in he Grand Trunk Dramatic Company, is convert-d. This man two weeks ago was mocking and aricaturing Mr. Hammond, and was a promi-ent member of an infidel society.

The ministers of Chatham have united in a ard, in which they say that, as the result of Mr. Hammond's three weeks' labor in Chatham, ore than a thousand persons, of all classes of ociety, have professed conversion.

An Immigrant's Landing in the Country of is adoption is a circumstance which never ades from his memory. He is beginning a ew life, and his mind is just then peculiarly live to impressions of good or evil. It is, there-ore, with great pleasure we notice that through he agency of the New York Bible Society all he immigrants to this port have for some time ast been presented with a copy of the New Tes-ament in their own language as they landed at Castle Garden.

During the past year the Society has circulated 9,854 volumes. Several hundred foreign vessels ere supplied with the Scriptures, and 11,000 opies through their aid have found their way nto Roman Catholic ports.

The Negro Exodus.—John Brown, Jr., of Put-n-Bay, Ohio, son of "Ossawatomie" Brown, leclares his intention of volunteering his servi-es to aid the colored refugees from the South. He thinks that the time has come for another grand rescue of the colored race, and although e is now fifty-eight years old, he is ready to de-ote his remaining energies to the cause which was so dear to himself and his father.

A mass meeting of colored people was held in Union Church, on Seventh Street, Cincinnati, on Monday night, at which measures were adopted to extend relief to the suffering negroes at St. Louis. A large contribution was received dur-ng the exercises, and a committee was appointed to canvass the city and solicit aid.

A New Feature in Church Ownership and Pastorship has been displayed in Brooklyn, by the purchase of what was formerly known as the Wesley Methodist Episcopal Church, corner of Tompkins and Willoughby avenues, by a Boston lady named Miss Anna Oliver. This lady bought the building the week before last for $14,000, and on Sunday morning April 6th, she went upon the platform, a large congregation having assembled, and with coolness and self-possession announced herself as the new pastor, and declared her reliance upon the Lord God, who, she fully believed, had prompted her to the step she had taken and guided her in it. Miss Oliver then conducted service in the usual Methodist form, and repeated it in the evening. The church is to be wholly independent, and is to be known as the Apostolic Methodist Episcopal Church.

True to his God and Country.—The Truth of the text "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him," was remarkably exemplified in the case of Deacon Norris, who when living in Delaware on the Chesapeake at the period of the war between this country and Great Britain, was captured while riding through the country by the British, who supposed him to be a scout. Deacon Norris was taken on board one of the British men-of-war then in Chesapeake Bay, and information sought from him respecting the American forces, but he simply replied, "You may kill me, but you cannot make me tell you any thing about our army." His faithfulness not only to his country, but also to his God, was shortly afterwards remarkably manifested, for being present at a dinner on board the flag-ship of the fleet, at its close, when toasts and songs were passing around, a song was demanded from the good Deacon, and as no refusal would be taken by his captors, he consented, and commenced the beautiful hymn of Isaac Watts :

> "Sweet is the work, my God! my King!
> To praise Thy name, give thanks and sing."

As he sang on in a rich voice, the remembrance of his loved ones at home and his own captivity filled the old man's eyes with tears, and at its close a solemn silence had come over the whole party. The Commodore then said, "Mr. Norris, you are a good man, and you shall be sent home." And accordingly he was, accompanied by a highly valuable present of salt, then very scarce at his home. So did a godly man for righteousness sake face an ignominious death, and by his consistency and Christian sincerity pass through all danger, so that not a hair of his head was touched.

A Tiger Scared by a Mouse.—A Tiger kept at the British Residency at Calcutta, India, used to be annoyed far more by a mouse than by poking at him with a stick in his cage. No fine lady ever exhibited more terror at the sight of a spider than this royal tiger betrayed on seeing a mouse whenever it was tied by a string to the end of a pole and thrust close to the tiger's nose. The moment he saw it he leaped to the opposite side; and when the mouse was made to run near him, he jammed himself in the corner, and stood trembling, and roared terribly in ecstacy of fear. Sometimes he had to pass over the spot where the unconscious little mouse ran backwards and forwards, and then he generally took a kind of flying leap so high as nearly to bring his back in contact with the roof of his cage. Cruelty and cowardice are frequently found existing together in the same constitutions in men as in animals. There are blustering revilers of religion who, in the words of Scripture, are faint of heart, so that "The sound of a shaken leaf chases them : and they flee as fleeing from a sword, and fall when none pursueth."

Famine in Egypt.—Sad scenes resulting from the lack of water in the Nile this summer are reported from the banks of that river. One correspondent says : "Passing in the morning we saw a wretched old woman and two children lying on the river bank. The children were skin and bone, and the woman scarcely distinguishable as a human being. We gave her bread, but she seemed unable to eat it, and after a few sighs and moans fell back into her semi-comatose state. She could hardly have lived through the night, and there were several like her. At the same place we noticed a handsome girl of sixteen or so standing on the bank. On asking her what she wanted, she replied, 'Bread,' and ate greedily a piece of the coarse bran bread of the country. Her gratitude knew no bounds when presented with a few piastres, and she unfolded her small history—how she had walked from her native village, where her family were all dead, in hopes of finding relief at Assiout, but had found none, and was still another unit added to the crowd of hunger-stricken Arabs flocking in daily."

A Remarkable Account has just been pub-lished by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The fact is related by Sir Bartle Frere, Governor of the British colony in South Africa. Sir Bartle asserted that he met "with an instance, which was carefully investigated, in which all the inhabitants of a remote village in Hindoostan had abjured idolatry and caste, removed from their temples the idols which had been worshipped there time out of mind, and agreed to profess a form of Christianity which they had deduced for themselves from the careful perusal of a single Gospel and a few tracts." These books had been left amongst them, not by a missionary, but by a merchant, who had never spoken of Christianity. This is certainly an extraordinary instance, but he who believes in the power of the Spirit and of the Truth will see in it a manifestation of the power of the Holy Spirit over the minds of men even in an untutored state.

THE THREE WHATS.

A Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places."—EPHESIANS I : 18–20.

The Opened Eye a Necessity—I. What is to be Seen and Known—1. The Hope of His Calling—Abraham's Hope in His Calling—The Christian's Hope—He Hopes for Divine Protection—For Absolute Perfection — Eternal Happiness — 2. What are the Riches of Glory—God's Inheritance in the Saints—He has Spent upon Them Riches of Love—A Wealth of Wisdom—A Life of Suffering—What the Christian Becomes—Will you Miss It?—3. What is the Greatness of His Power—II. Why we Wish you to Know This—That you may not Despair.

YOU see the text begins with a personal experience within the mind and judgment—"the eyes of your understanding being enlightened." Every thing depends upon the opened eye: the scene may be fair, and the light may be bright, but if the sight be gone all is in vain.

Zedekiah had his eyes put out by the king of Babylon, and then he was taken down to the imperial city, but for aught he could enjoy of all its splendor he might as well have been in a desert. There were vast halls and palaces, and hanging gardens and a city wall which was the wonder of the world, so that Babylon is called by the prophet "the glory of kingdoms and the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency:" but the blinded monarch beheld nothing of all the grandeur of the golden city, and to him her wealth was as though it had not been.

Thus is it with us by nature; we have no apprehension of spiritual things, no power to discern eternal good, but our foolish heart is darkened. Therefore the Lord must first enlighten the eyes of our understanding, or else, however precious the truth, and however clearly it may be stated, we shall never be able to apprehend it.

A PRAYER FOR CHRISTIANS.

Now, the prayer of our text was offered for Christians—for converted persons, for those who had faith in Christ Jesus and love to all the saints; yet Paul says that he never ceased to pray that their eyes might be enlightened. Yes, brethren, he who sees most needs to have his eyes enlightened to see more, for how little as yet of the glory of God have any of us beheld!

Even that favored pilgrim who has been led by the shepherds to the top of Mount Clear, to stand there with telescopic glass and gaze into the glories of Immanuel's land, has yet only commenced to perceive the things which God has prepared for them that love Him. I pray God that if we do already see, we may see more, until our eye shall be so strengthened that the light of the New Jerusalem shall not be too strong for us, but amid the splendor of God which outshines the sun we shall find ourselves at home.

But if believers need to have their eyes enlightened, how much more must those who are unconverted. They are altogether blinded, and consequently their need of enlightenment is far greater. They were born blind, and the god of this world takes care yet further to darken their minds. Around them there broods a sevenfold midnight, the gloom of spiritual death. "They meet with darkness in the daytime, and grope in the noonday as in the night." O blind eye, may Jesus touch thee! May the Spirit bring His sacred eye-salve and make thee see, and though it is not ours to give thee eyes, we would tell thee what is to be seen, hoping that, peradventure, while we give the description, God may give thee eyes with which to verify our report.

I. First, then, what is to be seen and known, according to the text? When you heard me read it, you must have noticed that it contains three "whats." "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe."

1. Our first point is,

"WHAT IS THE HOPE OF HIS CALLING?"

A great many persons never think about religion, because they cannot believe that there is much in it. If they had half an idea of what is to be gained by it even now, and of the unspeakable blessedness which will come of it throughout eternity, surely their own desire to benefit themselves would incline them diligently to consider it, even if they went no further. So promising a matter is at least worth looking into, for it would be a great pity to miss present and eternal happiness if it can be had.

The idea of the text seems to me to be illustrated well by the patriarch Abraham. Abraham was living in his father's house in Ur of the Chaldees when a call came to him. That call came from God. He was to separate himself entirely and to get away to a land which he had never seen. What was the hope of that calling? It was the hope that God would give him a seed, and give to that seed a land to dwell in. Thus spake the Lord unto him: "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."

The great nation which should spring from him would possess the land in which he was to wander as a pilgrim and a stranger, according to the word of the Lord—"For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." For the sake of that hope he forsook every thing, and dwelt in tents, a pilgrim and a sojourner with God, living entirely by faith, but living grandly and sublimely, and thus becoming the father of all believers through all ages, greater than a prince among the sons of men.

Now, there comes to every man who is a true Christian a call from God. We speak of it by the name of "effectual calling." The Spirit of God personally applies the truth of Scripture to the heart, and makes the chosen man to feel that it belongs to him. The believer perceives that he is separated from others by the sovereign grace of God, and that therefore he must come out from the world, and no longer live according to the sight of the eyes and the hearing of the ears, but must live by faith upon God, as seeing Him who is invisible.

This makes the believer very different from the rest of mankind. Those who walk by sight do not understand him. They generally misrepresent him, and frequently they hate him, but he is content to be unknown, for he remembers it is written, "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." "Therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not."

But what is the prospect which leads the believer to this life? What is the hope of His calling? Brethren, let me describe the hope of those of us who have come out to walk by faith in Christ Jesus. We have already obtained enough abundantly to reward us for obedience to the call, and even if nothing were shut up in the closed hand of Hope, her open hand has greatly enriched us. Christian man, you have in possession already the forgiveness of your sin, acceptance in Christ, adoption into the divine family, and the nature, rank, and rights of a child of God.

You already possess that which makes you amongst the happiest of mankind, and often do you feel that if it should turn out that there is no hereafter and if you should die like a dog, yet still your faith in God has given you such consolation and such strength, such peace and such joy, that you would bless God that ever you had it. Our hope has not injured us either as to character or to happiness, and even if it turned out to be false we are at least as well off as the unbeliever. Still our main possession lies in hope. We carry a bag of spending money in our hands, but the bulk of our wealth is deposited in

THE BANK OF HOPE.

What then is the Christian's hope?

Well, first, he hopes and believes that he shall be under divine protection forever and ever, that he shall be the object of divine love time out of mind, and when time shall be no more. He hopes that all things shall work together for his good in the future as he perceives they have done in the past, and as he is persuaded they are doing now. He expects a stormy voyage, but because Christ is at the helm he hopes to come to the fair havens at the last. He expects to be tempted, but he hopes to be upheld. He expects to be slandered, but he hopes to be cleared. He expects to be tried, but he hopes to triumph. Sustained by this hope he dreads no labors and fears no difficulties.

"He holds no parley with unmanly fears,
Where duty bids he confidently steers,
Faces a thousand dangers at her call,
And, hoping in his God, surmounts them all."

His hope is that all through life, whether that be long or short (and he has not much care about the number of his years), underneath him will be the everlasting arms. He hopes that the Lord will be his shepherd, and he shall not want. He hopes that goodness and mercy will follow him all the days of his life. Hence he is not afraid to die, for then he expects to come into actual possession of his best possessions. He looks for his best things last. He believes that when it is time for him to depart, Jesus will come and meet him, and the thought of that meeting puts aside all idea of the grim terrors of the grave. His hope leaps over the grave, and lands him in a glorious resurrection. Does not the hope of our calling open grandly?

We hope also, and have good ground for it, that after death at the day of judgment we shall have, as we believe we have now, a perfect justification. A dread assize will be held. Upon a great white throne reflecting all things, and brilliant with its purity, Jesus the Judge of all will sit, and He shall separate the mass of mankind into two portions, as a shepherd divides the sheep from the goats. We know that in that day He will discern those who believed in Him and trusted Him and obeyed Him and sought to be like Him, and we hope that we shall be of that blessed number. Is not this brave hoping? The hope of a man who sings on forever,—living in the circle of divine love, dying beneath the protection of divine power, and abiding in the judgment justified by divine justice: accepted in the beloved, and beloved of the Father.

What else hope we for? We hope for absolute perfection. The God who has changed our hearts will continue the good work of sanctification till He has taken every sin out of us, every desire for sin, every possibility of sin. We expect Him to renew our minds and prevent our making so many mistakes in judgment. We expect Him to renew our hearts that they may be wholly set on divine and heavenly things.

We hope, also, that this body of ours will be perfected. It will lie in the grave and moulder into dust, unless our Lord Jesus should come before our death hour. Of this we make small account, having no very intense desire to avoid the grave wherein our glorious Redeemer lay. We have nothing to lose, but much to gain, by dying, for therein we put off our mortality that at the resurrection we may put on immortality.

"Corruption, earth, and worms
Shall but refine this flesh,
Till when the Lord our Saviour comes
We put it on afresh."

We are looking forward to a time when we shall have done with aches and pains, with weariness and decay, with old age and its infirmities, and with all liability to death. We expect perpetual youth to be our portion, and that joy shall thrill through every nerve and sinew of our frame, which now, alas! so often becomes the theatre of agony. Yes, this is our hope, perfection of spirit, soul, and body; for Christ has redeemed the whole, and He will have the whole to be His inheritance, and in the whole of our manhood His glorious image shall be reflected forever.

What else is the hope of our calling? Why, that being thus cleared in judgment and made absolutely perfect, we shall forever—for eternal duration is the glory of our heritage—we shall forever enjoy infinite happiness. We do not know what form the joys of eternity will take, but they will take such form as shall make us the most happy. We shall have heaven's best, yea God's best, and what that is who among us can guess, though he use all his knowledge and give the reins to his expectancy? We shall be supremely blessed, for at the right hand of God there are pleasures for evermore. This is the hope of our calling.

Oh, sirs, is not this worth the having? Is not this worth striving for? When you count the cost, what cost is worth the counting? Might not a man for this lay down all that he has, yea, and his life also, to keep this pearl of exceeding price?

And what if you should miss it? What, if you should miss it? What, if it could be proven, as it never will be, that there are no pains of hell and no eternal wrath, yet is not this enough—to have lost this immortality of glory, this immortality of honor, and of likeness to God? This pain of loss, may none of us ever incur it; for it is hell to lose heaven, it is infinite misery to miss infinite felicity.

I do pray that you may know "what is the hope of His calling," and that when you know it you may cry, "I will have it. If it is to be had, by God's grace I will have it now." So may it be, for Christ's sake.

2. And now I turn to the second "what" of the text, and that is more marvellous still. I am sure I cannot preach the text out, it is too great for me; but here it is—"That ye may know of the glory of His inheritance in the saints."

Mark well that God's people are by grace mad to be His saints, His select, His holy ones, an then they are viewed as His inheritance. Th whole world is Gods'. The cattle on a thousan hills and all lands and seas are His, and yonde starry worlds which in profusion are sown i space are all His, but He deigns to call sanctified men and women His inheritance in a specia sense. They are His peculiar treasure, Hi crown jewels, dear and precious to Him. "Th Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the lot His inheritance.

I want you to think of this grand truth, b cause practical results flow from it. If you an I are believers in Jesus we are God's inheritanc and the Lord has what the apostle calls "t riches of the glory of His inheritance in t saints." But how can God make riches out poor men and women? They are believers Jesus, but what is there in them that He coun to be riches—riches of glory, too?

We answer, first, he has spent riches of lo upon them, for he loves them, poor as they a and sick and sorry as they often are. He lov them from before the foundation of the worl and you know how precious a thing becom when you love it. It is a beloved keepsal and you would not part with it for a mint gold. It may have little intrinsic value, but you have long set your heart upon it how d it becomes to you! God has loved His people long and so intensely, with such an unboun love, that there is a wealth in them to heart.

Moreover, the Lord has spent a wealth of dom on His saints. A material may be alm valueless at first, but when a wise man has e cised his thought and skill upon it, the va may be enhanced a thousand-fold. But has thought of His saints forever. Ete wisdom found her delights with the sons of and occupied herself on their behalf before foundation of the world. His thoughts of dom and prudence have been exercised upon nts, and hence it is that there is a riches of ory about them.

What is more, when the riches of His love d of His wisdom had been expended it came pass that it was necessary that He should end a life of suffering upon them.

As the Lord looks over all that He has made e sees nothing that has cost Him suffering d death till He comes to His people. Jesus ows what the saints cost Him. He estimates em at a rate usual among men, for men say, 'The price is what it will fetch," and Jesus ows what His people fetched when He re-emed them by giving Himself for them. easured by that standard God hath indeed hes of glory in His inheritance in the saints.

And then there comes great glory to God om the workmanship which He puts into His ople. When He made the world it was with a ice. "He spake, and it was done." When e made the things that are, He had but to will d they stood forth; but in the making of a ristian it needs the labor of the Godhead; ther, Son, and Holy Spirit must all work to eate a new creature in Christ Jesus. The Father ist beget, the Son must redeem, the Spirit ist regenerate; and when this is done the dhead's omnipotence must be put forth to ep a Christian alive, and to perfect Him, and esent Him "faultless before the presence of od with exceeding joy."

An artisan can put into a small piece of iron, no worth at all, so much labor that it shall be lued at scores of pounds, and the Triune God n expend so much workmanship upon our or nature that a man shall be more precious an the gold of Ophir. Valued thus, the Lord ay well speak of "the riches of the glory of is inheritance in the saints."

Now, as I want if I can to lead you into a nse of this glory for a minute, I should like u to accompany me while I speak somewhat refully but yet enthusiastically about what the ristian becomes when God has perfected His ork upon him.

The perfected saints will be creatures of a very culiar form, for they will not be pure spirit, ssociated from matter. I understand yonder irits before the throne standing in their obeence, because they have no materialism to hamer them and drag them down. Angels are irits without material bodies, and they obey od, hearkening to His commandments; but a rfected saint is a creature in which the mateal is linked with the spiritual. Such are we w, and I suppose, in a measure, such shall we ide, and yet there will be no sin in us, no viotion of the divine command.

Think, again, dear friends. There once stood bright spirit in heaven, leader of the angels, ut the place was too high for him, and the son f the morning fell from heaven and dragged thers with him. God is making, by His grace, eings who will stand next His throne, but will emain reverently loyal forever. They will be eers in His kingdom, but they will never be roud or ambitious.

We, my brethren, though in full possession of ur free agency, shall never fall from our eternal lory, but shall be faithful forever. We shall ave passed through such an experience of sin, e shall so intensely feel our indebtedness to race, we shall so fervently love the dear Reeemer, that we shall cast our crowns at His eet, and we shall ascribe our joy to Him alone, nd so shall never dream of revolting from Him. God is thus making beings whom it will e safe to exalt to honors so near His own: will ot this be a triumph of power and goodness? an you think of it, that you will be one of such avored creatures, if indeed you are a believer?

These beings will have known evil. Think of hat. The unfallen angels have never actually nown evil, but in restored man shall be fulilled the devil's lie made into God's truth: "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." hey shall hate evil as the burnt child dreads the re, and they shall love righteousness, because y righteousness they have been saved, and in righteousness they have been created anew. How wonderful will that creature be which has known sin, and remains a free agent, and yet will never yield to folly, but abide forever in holiness, held by bonds of love. Oh, when I think of the destiny of a child of God, my eyes sparkle, but my tongue refuses to utter what I think.

Now, the point is, that if this be the riches of God's glory in His inheritance in the saints, you may read it in another way, and say, "This is the riches of our inheritance too, for what shall we be if God is to have us for an inheritance?"

WILL YOU MISS IT? WILL YOU MISS IT?

If this be a dream, I could wish to die rather than have the illusion dispelled. But it is fact, as God's Word is true. Will you miss it, then? Oh, if there were crowns to be scrambled for, most men are ambitious enough to seek for one, though it might be a curse to them. If there be gold, or if there be fame, men have but to hear the chink of the metal or the blast of the trumpet, and many stir themselves to win; but here is honor, and glory, and immortality in Christ, and it is to be had for the asking; it is to be had by simply believing and trusting in Jesus Christ,—Will you not have it? Oh, false hand that is not stretched out to receive it! Oh, false heart that does not pray for it! God grant you to know what is the "riches of His inheritance in the saints," that you may seek to be a part in that inheritance and seek it now.

3. Now, the third "what:"

"WHAT IS THE EXCEEDING GREATNESS OF HIS POWER to us-ward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places." I thought I heard somebody saying, "Woe is me! Woe is me! I hear of what man may be, I hear of what God may make of Him, but woe is me; it will never come to my lot. I am so weak, so fickle, so irresolute, so frail. Woe is me; I am undone. I have no strength." Now, the third "what" is this: "that ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward, who believe."

Now, learn ye this and know it—that in the conversion, preservation, and salvation of any one person God exhibits as great power as He manifested when He raised Jesus Christ from the dead and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places. The salvation of no man in the world is by His own strength. It is by the power of God, "for we are His workmanship."

This fact should greatly relieve you who are discouraged: the thing is impossible with you, but it is not impossible, or even hard, with God. He that has wrought us to the selfsame thing is God, and He is quite as able to work it in you, my dear hearer, as to work it in the Apostle Paul himself. God can do all things. Now, when our Lord Jesus lay in the tomb He was dead, but God quickened Him. Jesus was imprisoned in the sepulchre, and the stone at the grave's mouth was sealed and guarded; but the stone was rolled away and the guards were affrighted, and the Lord of life rose from among the dead.

You will be opposed by the powers of darkness, and by your own evil heart; but you shall conquer, for God will put forth the same power in you which He manifested in His dear Son, and you, too, shall lead captivity captive. The very same power which raised Christ is waiting to raise the drunkard from his drunkenness, to raise the thief from his dishonesty, to raise the Pharisee from his self-righteousness, to raise the Sadducee from his unbelief. God has power among the sons of men, and this power He puts forth in making them to be a people that shall show forth His praise. Oh that you knew what is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, because then you would fling away despair.

There remains nothing for you in this case but to submit to the Divine power. God will work in you; be willing to be worked upon. O Spirit of the Lord, work in our hearers this good will. Drop yourselves like plastic clay, at the potter's feet, and He will put you on the wheel and mould you at His pleasure. Be willing, it is all He asks you; be trustful, it is all His gospel requires of you, and indeed both will and trust He gives you. "If ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat the good of the land."

II. The last word is to be upon the second head:

WHY WE WISH YOU TO SEE AND KNOW ALL THIS.

I have in effect been all along enforcing this second head as the sermon has progressed, and so I shall not need to detain you many minutes, except with a practical recapitulation.

We want you to know the hope of his calling that you may not neglect it, nor set any thing in competition with it. I tried, as my poor words enabled me to tell you, what a hope the calling of God gives the Christian. I charge you, do not let it go. I shall, probably, never meet the most of you again, and if any shall say to you afterwards, "Well, what said the man?" I would like you to be compelled to say, "He said this—that there is a future before us of such glory that He charged us not to lose it. There are the possibilities of such intense delight forever and ever that he besought us to insure that delight by accepting Christ and His way of salvation."

Next we want you to believe the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, that you may see where your hope lies. Your hope lies in not being your own any more, but in being the Lord's, and so realizing "the riches of the glory of God's inheritance in the saints." The saints belong to their Lord: your salvation will be found in experimentally knowing that you are not your own, because you are bought with a price; yea, in admitting at this moment that your honor and happiness is found in being the Lord's. If you are your own you will spend yourself and be ruined, but if you are Christ's He will take care of you.

Oh, if I thought that I had a hair of this head that belonged to myself alone I would tear it out; but to be owned by Jesus altogether, spirit, soul, and body; to be Christ's man in the entireness of my being, this is glory, and immortality, and eternal life. Be your own, and you will be lost: be Christ's, and you are saved.

The closing thought is this. We want you to know the exceeding greatness of God's power, that you may not doubt, or despond, or despair, but come now and cast yourselves upon the incarnate God, and let Him save you. Yield yourselves unto Him, that the great glory of His power may be manifest in you as in the rest of His people. I am loth that you should go till you have really hidden these things in your hearts to ponder them in after days. I set bread before you; do not merely look at it, but eat a portion now and carry the rest home to eat in secret.

Our preaching is often too much like a fiddler's playing. People come to see how it is done, and then they pass round the question, "What think ye of him?" Now, I do not care two straws what you think of me, but I do care a whole world what you think of Christ, and of yourselves, and of your future state. I pray you forget the way in which I put things, for that may be very blundering and faulty; but if there be any thing in the things themselves consider them with care. If you judge the Bible to be a fraud, and that there is no heaven to be had, then go, sport and laugh as you please, for you will only act consistently with your erroneous imagination; but if you believe God's Word to be true, and that there is a glorious hope connected with the Christian's high calling, then in the name of prudence and common-sense why do you not seek it?

Give no sleep to your eyes nor slumber to your eyelids till you find it. I ask the Lord's people here present, to pray that this appeal may have an effect upon many in this great crowd, that they may seek the Lord at once with full purpose of heart. O Spirit of God, work it, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE AT MILDMAY PARK, LONDON.

Address by the Rev. Canon Hoare, Tunbridge Wells.

Subject: "WORKING, WATCHING, WAITING."

Three Principles Involved in the Subject—We want to be—I. Doing the Work of the Latter Days—II. Watching against the Dangers of the Latter Days—III. Lifted up by the Strong Glorious Hope above the Cares and Anxieties of the Latter Days.

THERE is one principle I may lay down at the outset. If we are truly looking forward to the Advent, that blessed hope of the Church, "the glorious appearing of our great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," if we reverently trust that it may not be very long ere it takes place, then it follows that we regard ourselves, as we go back to our homes, as occupying the position of men who are living in the latter days—men who may at any moment meet the Lord—men who are called upon to fulfil the duties peculiar to the latter days.

Three principles are here involved. We want to be doing the work of the latter days; we have to watch against the peculiar dangers of the latter days; and we are to be lifted up by that strong, bright, triumphant hope above the cares and anxieties of the latter days.

I. First, we want to be doing the work of the latter days. What is the great work of the latter days? I answer without any hesitation that there is one great work for the Church of God pre-eminently peculiar to the latter days; and that great work is, the work of Missions. "This Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come."

God is accomplishing the number of His own elect Church from among the Gentiles; and the joy of that Advent will not arrive till the number of the elect be complete. So whenever we lay the body of a dear friend in the grave, waiting for the resurrection, we pray God "shortly to accomplish the number of Thine elect, and to hasten Thy kingdom; that we, with all those that are departed in the true faith of Thy holy name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in Thy eternal and everlasting glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord." If, then, we look for the Advent of our Lord Jesus Christ as the blessed consummation, then, brethren, it behoves us to do what we can to hasten that consummation, and throw our whole energy and strain every nerve into the making up of the number of God's elect, and for completing the number of those who are to fill up the olive tree; and this we do by preaching the Gospel, that is by Missions.

II. I pass on to the second point. If we are looking forward to "the glorious appearing of our great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ," that blessed hope which is set before us in Him, we must be prepared to watch against the dangers of the latter days. I know of no passage that encourages me to hope that we are just to go straight on to the harvest of the latter days without having to meet the dangers of these days, and without having to encounter the difficulties without and difficulties within, difficulties in the world and difficulties in the Church.

If we are looking forward for the speedy outpouring of the seventh vial (Rev. 16), when the Lord takes the kingdom, we must remember the warning given to us at the outpouring of the sixth vial, viz., that three unclean spirits should come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world. "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame."

We are at that precise point now, and if we are to triumph right on to the end, we must be fully prepared for seductive influences acting on our minds, and for such influences working in our people's minds—unsettling, disturbing, and harassing. We must be prepared to see various combinations of error and seductive powers, not merely acting in a general way, but in one distinct shape, and in another distinct shape, and in a third distinct shape; and in every possible combination of the three working together to prevent the establishment of the kingdom.

Now of such a time the Lord tells us, "Watch and pray," and the message again in Revelation is, "Watch." "Watch and keep thy garments," lest when He comes, and the song of triumph swells up from the great multitude of God's elect, gathered from the north, from the south, from the east, and from the west, clothed in white robes, and with palms in their hands, any Christian brother should be found in the midst of them naked. Naked before his fellow-men; naked before the angels of God; naked before God Himself. Surely we may well listen to the voice of warning, "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame."

III. Then we come to the third point. We have not only to do the work of the latter days, not only to watch against the seductions of the latter days, but also we are to be lifted up by that strong, bright, glorious hope above the cares and anxieties of the latter days. I believe these latter days are to be full of care. There are to be political cares: "Nation shall rise against nation," "Wars and rumors of wars." There are to be commercial cares: "Men's hearts failing them for fear," "Distress of nations with perplexity." And apparently a great loss of confidence. Now, we are not here to-night to interpret the prophetic Word so much as to apply it; but I cannot help thinking there is something very remarkable in these words, and in the wonderful commercial depression and lack of confidence over the entire world. It is not, as in times past, in one nation or another, but all nations have at present the same cares, the same want of confidence; men's hearts are indeed failing them for fear.

Then physical cares: "Great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences." Then again there are religious cares; there are to be seducing spirits in the world, and in the midst of the Christian Church. Alas! as we look on the Church of Christ our hearts are bowed down sometimes, I fear it is oftentimes, with all we see within it—the heresies, the divisions, the looseness of those who are Christians, the unbrotherliness of spirit, and the half-heartedness. Do we not find all these in the Church?

Now, I can understand people being sorely discouraged by all these things, but it must not be so with those who are looking for the Advent—they have been forewarned of all these things. Other men may have their "hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth;" but if we know what is coming—and we reverently hope and believe that we do know what is coming, "for ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief in the night"—we shall not fear. Why not? Because we are looking for our blessed Lord—looking for our blessed Lord, who Himself said, "When these things begin to come to pass"—(mark the words, "begin to come to pass;" we are not to wait till all these things are finished)—"then look up and lift up your heads."

We are, then, to study unfulfilled prophecy, and be prepared for these things beforehand, so that when they "begin to come to pass" we are to do what? To "look up, to lift up your heads: for your redemption draweth nigh." Now I need not stop to point out to you that the word Redemption here does not mean Atonement; there are people who get into this confusion, and it is caused by a wrong idea of the word. Its meaning I would say is twofold, deliverance and atonement. Christ on the cross completed forever our atonement. It does not mean, then, our atonement draweth nigh. Thanks be to God, that was completed, finished on Calvary eighteen hundred years ago, and nothing on earth or hell can undo that work. It was completed when that cry went up, "It is finished!"

The meaning of the word here is, "your Deliverer, or Redeemer, draweth nigh." Your loving Lord who did the work draweth nigh, and He is drawing nigh now, in His resurrection power He draweth nigh. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, to gather the dear departed from their graves, to open those graves which we have seen close over the dust of dear departed friends, and to call the living ones to Himself.

Let us then, if we believe, as many of us do, that these things have indeed begun to come to pass, lift up our heads and look up; looking for that day, when not only the ransomed spirits but the risen bodies shall come forth to meet the Lord in the air; when all His own shall hear His voice, the voice of the Son of Man, and shall live; when the whole number of God's elect shall be gathered; when not one of them shall be missing; when there shall be one grand glorious gathering together of the saints in loving unity around their Head; when the sleeping saints shall be raised, and the living saints shal be "caught up together to meet the Lord in th air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Having such a wondrous hope, can we be dis heartened by cares without or anxieties within Can we allow our heads to hang down, becaus nations rise against nations, and kingdom against kingdoms? Are we to be despondent i a time of commercial distress? Are our heart to fail because we see one and another dear t us carried to the grave? No, brethren—we wh look for the King, we who look for "that blessed hope"—we are sure of this, that He is com ing, that He is indeed living; He is now living He is now reigning, and we are indeed shadowe by His omnipotence.

But we look for more—we look for His com ing for us, and we know that cares and trials an anxieties shall then be ended. We are like th disciples tossed on the stormy sea; the wate seem to break over the ship, but let our gran thought be "watching and praying;" and th Lord is on the mountain-top "watching an praying" also, and soon, soon we shall see Hi walking over the waters, and hear Him sayin "Peace, be still." So we look up, and lift our heads, for our Redeemer draweth nigh.

LOOKING FOR THE MORNING STAR

Address at the Mildmay Conference, by Rev. I Mackay.

Practical Star-Gazing—The Lord's Coming t Christian's Pole-Star—Parable of the Ten V gins—Anecdote of a Midshipman—Are Watching?—The Missionary's Answer—Chr Desires to be Remembered—The Hope of t Lord's Coming a Separating and yet a Unit Truth—It should Increase our Activity—M sage to the Unconverted.

THERE is a very practical kind of star-gazi When I was crossing the Atlantic, I went deck one night, and saw the officer with his s tant gazing at the stars. "What are you do here?" "I am looking for the Pole-star." "What have you to do with the Pole-star?" drew himself up to his full height, and repli "The Pole-star is the sailor's idol." I k what the good fellow meant. The sailor g on the Pole-star, and by that fixes his latit and finds out exactly where he is. That s gazing is a practical thing on board ship, I tell you; it tells him how to navigate the sh ow I was told to speak on this subject, "The ctical Influence of the Blessed Hope," and I e got down a hundred and twenty texts ch deal with it. But as I find that each text ld take me about a minute to read, so the le hundred and twenty texts would occupy hours to read off; and as I have only half hour to speak in, it would never do. I uld have liked to have read all the texts, but und it was no use trying to marshal this regi- nt of texts, and crushing them into half an ur.

Now I should like to see many Christians lowing the sailor's example, and putting spiritual sextant to the prophetic heavens, f ing out just where they are in the age, and t latitude, and navigating by that. Interpre every thing in the light of His coming again, guiding their course, not by the shifting li of human reason and man's intelligence, bu the sure and blessed hope of the Lord's re —that is our Pole-star; and as our life and is corrected by observing this Pole-star, so we be in the mind of God. It is, then, a ctical thing, looking for the appearing of our at God and Saviour.

ark what the Lord says, in the parable of the Virgins, of what is in fact the Church's pres- position—"They all slumbered and slept." What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." at is His command, and the opposite of ching is sleeping. So we have been doing very opposite of what He has commanded. en we ought to have been watching for the rn of the Lord, we have made ourselves nice nfortable pillows, and gone to sleep. Sleep state of insensibility, insecurity, and inac- ty. These are the characteristics of natural ep, and they are the characteristics of our at- ide towards the return of the Lord. We nt to get cured of that.

young friend of mine, a midshipman in the rcantile marine, lately returned from a long age of eleven months. He had never been sea before, and he told me some of his trou- s. When at home he had always been accus- ned to go to bed at a certain hour, and get a ht's sound sleep, but when he got to sea he l to take his regular watches in the night— r hours on the watch and four hours for sleep, l so on; he could not stand it at first, and d to feel terribly sleepy. Well, one night, he right down on the deck, and went to sleep. e officer of the watch saw him (and you know sea they don't stand on much ceremony; they n't tell you not to do a thing: they take good e you won't do it again) and called him.

He didn't, of course, answer at first, but the ond shout woke him up. "Why didn't you swer your officer when he called the first ne?" "I am afraid I was asleep."—"I think u were, and I don't think you'll sleep again en on watch. Every night for the next three eks, at twelve o'clock, you will go up to the als—whatever it blows, storm or hail, you go to the royals." Charlie told me he would ver forget it. For the next twenty-one ghts, whatever the weather, and although he ght have been up reefing the sails just before, midnight the first officer would cry, "Mizzen- p, Charlie!" and up he had to go. It cured n, though.

And if officers who have the care of a ship and e lives of the passengers have to be so careful, es not the Church deserve some such thing for mbering and sleeping when she should have en watching for the return of her blessed rd? I think our brother Captain Moreton uld tell us that in the old days in the navy it ed to be court-martial, and perhaps death, to to sleep on the watch.

What, then, of us who were to watch against e return of the Lord? Have we done so? e there not even now heathen who have never ard the name of Jesus? We were to watch. hat have we been doing? Making ourselves mfortable, going to nice Conferences, and all at sort of thing. Now, I thank God for these nferences, but they must be the means of aking us look out better than we have yet ne. I thank God for the happy Conferences America and in Canada, where the glorious bject of the Lord's return was brought to the nt. I thank God that in every city I visited, New York, Chicago, and elsewhere, the most iritual men are rousing up to inquire and look to these things.

I know that your prayers offered here are being swered, and that your brethren are being stir- d to look for the Lord, and I have been em- wered to bring back from these Conferences their greetings to those friends gathered at Mildmay, to which place all eyes are turned as a centre for the proclamation of the hope of the Lord from heaven. So from far-off China I have letters, and one of these, from one now laboring amongst the heathen, says, "I never shall forget to my dying day, or till the Lord return, the words I heard at Mildmay: 'Ye shall be witnesses for Me.'"

One asked a missionary who held these views, "Are you going to the heathen holding these pessimist views? what good will you do?" He replied, "I hold neither pessimist nor optimist views, or any such thing. I am a truthist;" and he quietly added, "If I did not hold these views, I would never go to the heathen." That is the only line of truth that will carry us through the work.

"Watch and pray" (Mark 13: 33). In connection with the Lord's return we may well be watching and praying. We have many stimulants to personal watchfulness and holiness. We can recall many of these, but the strongest is actual anticipation and watching for the return of our blessed Lord. "Every man that hath this hope in Him" (in Him, spell it with the capital H; it is not hope in ourselves, it is hope in Him, the Lord) "purifieth himself, even as He is pure." The man who is momentarily expecting the return of his Lord, to call him to Himself, will have the very strongest possible incentive to watchfulness against evil, and to prayer for deliverance from temptation. "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation."

Another thing is, "Exhort one another daily" (Heb. 3: 13). And again, "Exhorting one another; and so much the more as ye see the day approaching" (Heb. 10: 25). So in a similar time in Israel's history, when the hope in many hearts was dim, we read, "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name" (Mal. 3: 16). So it is not only the worker for Christ (though he certainly is rewarded), it is not only the worker who is rewarded, but also the thinker. The scholar shall be rewarded as well as the soldier, the student of prophecy as well as the laborer in the vineyard.

The Lord Himself teaches that He would be remembered; for when He was going away He left His people that table, the Lord's Supper; and He says, "Do this in remembrance of Me till I come again." And it is at a table that we are to remember Him, not at a cross, not at a tomb, not by some relics—relics are mementos of one who is lost. He is not lost; He is alive, and He is coming back. So it is not at a tomb, or at an open grave, that we are to remember Him, to remember Him as one that is dead. No, no; we remember Him as one who was dead, dead for us, but who is now alive again for evermore. Thus His remembrance feast is not at a tomb, but it is at a table, and there we hear the words, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the age."

Then the next thing is, "Be ye separate" (2 Cor. 6: 17). Some people think the truth about the return of the Lord Jesus Christ is not practical; it is practical, and it is the most practical of all truth. With some, I fear it seems too practical, and therefore they are afraid of it. Do you think a man who is really looking to be caught up "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," will care to face the risk of being caught up from suspicious company, from the theatre or from the ball-room? No, no; Christians who love such company dread this practical truth. A man who is expecting the Lord each moment will not cultivate the fellowship and companionship of the world.

The effect with him is to make him separate. The cords that bind him to the earth and to the world are cut, and thus this truth is a separating as well as a uniting truth. "For the Lord Himself shall come with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." "Caught up" from a world I have little in; "caught up" to meet the Lord; "caught up" from earth; "caught up" to Him; "caught up together,"—a beautiful word that together.

I believe the great agony of death is, to the Christian, not so much the fact of dying, as the fact of separation—separation from loved ones, from husband, from wife, from parents, from children, but in the coming of the Lord what a contrast to death; it is, "caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air."

Our Lord's own words as to the evil servant strongly bear on this very point. But if that evil servant shall say in his heart "My Lord delayeth His coming," what is the effect? It is then he begins to keep company with those he ought not, and to give up the company of those he ought to consort with. "Shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken."

Do you think that eating and drinking with the drunken, frequenting the ball-room, the theatre, or the bar-room is the proper place for those who profess the name of Christ, and who are waiting for Him to catch them up at any moment? No, no. No such thing. Thus the hope of the Lord's return is a separating truth, but it is also a uniting truth. Remember the subject is a grand subject to give light, but it also gives a blessed blindness. Paul going to Damascus was struck blind by the glory of Jesus, and if our eyes are filled with the glory of His coming, we shall be blinded to the faults of our brethren, but not blind to our own.

Our last text is, "Go out quickly" (Luke 14: 21). Here is activity. Go out with concentrated forces, and may our going out be in the right spirit—going out as witnesses for God, going out to "Compel them to come in."

How have we done this? Ah, how many steamers have we, as a nation, chartered to send out to South Africa to destroy men? I have nothing here to do with politics, and I am not considering whether the war be a right or wrong one; I simply speak of facts. A million and a half of money spent on a fleet to go out from this Christian land to destroy lives! And when all the power of God is given unto us in order that we may go out quickly to the heathen, when we have such a power and such a motive, how do we act? My brethren, the power is given us, but we fail to take it up and use it. And when we ought to be going out in the King's name, we stay at home and talk about it.

Why should we not send out battalions of missionaries—witnesses for God; not mere recruits, but the best we can find? Let them go out quickly, with the power of God in their hearts, and the Gospel of Christ in their hearts; with a dictionary in their hands, and the Bible and a few books in the language of the people among whom they go; let them go forth thus, obeying the Lord's last command—"Ye shall be witnesses for Me."

Now, unconverted friends, the message is for you just where you are, and as you are. There are just two things you need to know. That is, first, you need a Saviour; that's the first thing. You need not merely a helper, not merely a reformer, to help you to turn over a new leaf. You want a Saviour. "I am done for." That is the last thing a man will give in to; it is the last confession a man will make. But by the power of the Holy Ghost the awakened sinner is taught to make it.

But there is another thing, and that is—there's a Saviour for you. First, I need a Saviour. Second, there is a Saviour for you. For the moment you take the lost sinner's place, that moment you can claim the lost sinner's Saviour. Sinner, look outward, not inward; look upward, not downward; look forward, not backward. Thus will you find there's a Saviour for you.

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

A Life's Crisis.

[For the benefit of readers who may not have seen the previous numbers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD containing this story, we give the following outline of the narrative up to the point where the present chapter opens:

Clara Arnot was the only daughter of a widowed Christian lady, and had been brought up in the village of Wingsdale, in England. Her deceased brother's wife, Mrs. Emma Arnot, having been offered a home by Clara's mother, came over from Barbadoes with her four children, but made the house so disagreeable by her selfish and fretful conduct, that Mrs. Arnot was glad to let her daughter go to London on a visit to her cousin Ada Murray. There Clara was fascinated by the acquaintance of Sir Edwin Erskine, a distinguished writer, but a rationalist in faith. Mrs. Arnot, having read Sir Edwin's principal work, "The Master Mind," became alarmed about her daughter's being so much in his company. However, distrusting her own judgment, she resolved to submit the book to Mr. Ward, the clergyman at Wingsdale; and we now find her in his study with that object.]

"WELL, my dear Mrs. Arnot, this is a singular request, and one which I never anticipated from you," said the aged clergyman, with a smile, as, fixing his spectacles on his nose, he glanced at the title-page of the work which Mrs. Arnot had placed in his hand. When he raised his eyes, however, to the countenance of his friend, he was struck by its worn look and anxious expression—he felt that no light curiosity had led the widow lady to desire his opinion of a novel, and gravely and kindly he promised to give his attention to her request.

"To-day is Saturday, and I have much upon my hands," said the minister, whose desk was heaped with papers; "I shall not be able to look at the volumes at once, but my first leisure hours shall be given to their perusal, and you shall have my candid opinion upon their contents."

Often, very often, did the thoughts of Mrs. Arnot recur to "The Master-Mind" during that and the following day. She was distressed to find that even in the house of prayer she was haunted by the remembrance of the novel. On the Sabbath afternoon she was so unwell as to be confined to her room; not to remain there, however, in undisturbed peace, for again and again the door was burst open by Johnny, who clambered upon her bed to give her news of the chicken that had been nearly drowned, or to repeat to her a beautiful new verse which he had learned "just to please grandmamma." Mrs. Arnot's head throbbed so violently that she could scarcely raise it from the pillow to give the child a kind smile and a kind kiss. Once her eyes closed for a few mintues in sleep; when she opened them, Lyddie was standing beside her, looking on her with a strange, earnest gaze. The girl had brought a tangled bunch of wild flowers, which she laid silently beside the suffering lady, and left the room with her orphan heart warmed by the sweet words of thanks with which her ill-timed little offering had been received.

Monday, as usual, brought no post; but on Tuesday came the envelope directed in Clara's well-known hand, which it was Johnny's delight to carry at full speed to his grandmother, demanding the postage of a kiss. Mrs. Arnot eagerly broke the seal, but the enclosure for once disappointed her; there were merely a few hurried lines, containing little more than an excuse for their own brevity. Clara, however, mentioned that she was to pass the Tuesday at Richmond, that she expected the excursion to be a delightful one, and that she trusted that the weather would be fine, as Sir Edwin had ordered his boat.

Mrs. Arnot silently replaced the note in its cover, and after going through the usual routine of her household duties with a preoccupied mind, again sought the quiet dwelling of the vicar.

All there looked peaceful and cheerful—the thick shrubbery, the neat flower-beds with their border of box, the closely-mown lawn spreading its carpet of velvet beneath the shadow of sycamore trees. Mrs. Arnot passed on without noticing aught. The vicar's wife, she found, was making her round in the village, but the vicar himself was in his study. She entered it unannounced save by her gentle tap at the door, and was kindly welcomed by her friend.

"Mrs. Arnot, my dear lady, this is a warm morning for a walk, but glorious weather for the crops. Pray take a seat," he wheeled round for her his own arm-chair; "and let me release you from your bonnet and shawl. We shall detain you here a prisoner till the cool of the evening, and talk over your novel together," he added with a smile, glancing at the book which lay open on the table.

"What do you think of it?" said Mrs. Arnot.

"I confess that I think very ill of it," replied the old clergyman, seating himself beside her. "It is well written, very cleverly written; but so much the worse for the reader. It is ill to plant flowers by the edge of the pitfall."

"And yet there are such beautiful passages, such noble sentiments—some parts seem calculated to do so much good—"

"My dear madam," said Mr. Ward earnestly, laying his hand on the volume, "there is no good here that will weigh against one tithe of the evil which such a work is calculated to produce in young and enthusiastic minds. It appears written to show that there are some men of natures so noble and hearts so pure that they require no Saviour, no sacrifice for sin; men of intellect so large and exalted that Revelation is by them unneeded, they can walk securely in the light of their own reason, and pity poor, weak, bigoted fools, who seek a guide in the Scriptures. If the Almighty had blessed me with children, most anxiously should I have endeavored to guard them against the art which invests with strong interest such characters as that of the hero of this tale, that makes human pride appear at the root of all virtue, instead of being, as it is, at the root of all sin. My dear friend, believe me, this is a dangerous book, and its author is a dangerous man."

Mrs. Arnot made no reply, but drawing out Clara's last note, gave it in silence to the clergyman.

He read it twice before he made any observation, his brow slightly contracting as he read; then returning it to Mrs. Arnot, he said, "I think that Clara has been long enough absent."

"It seems an age since she left me," said the mother, her eyes filling with tears. "I miss her more than I can express. But then she is so happy in London, and in a house full as ours is at present, I cannot prevent little trials—"

"Believe me, dear lady, these trials are no evil; they are the gentle discipline by which our heavenly Father trains the hearts of such of His children as are spared the more terrible furnace of affliction. Send for your Clara home. Home is the sphere of her duties; it should also be that of her pleasures. She is too young to mingle unharmed in the society of such as Sir Edwin Erskine."

Mrs. Arnot left the house of her friend; he could neither persuade her to wait till the heat of the day was abated, nor to partake of the simple refreshment which the vicarage could afford. The fierce rays of the noontide sun poured down upon her head, the road was dry and dusty, the birds had stilled their songs, all was silent save the drowsy hum of some summer insects, creation lay panting and breathless in the glaring heat. Mrs. Arnot was almost exhausted ere she reached her dwelling. The cottagers whom she had met on her way shook their heads when she had passed, and declared that the good lady had never looked like herself since dear Miss Clara went away!

Mrs. Arnot opened her desk and wrote to her daughter. The letter was a short one, but full of tenderness, rather hinting at than openly telling of the feeble state of her own health, and her longing desire to have her child beside her again.

Clara received that note the next morning; in the evening, just as the first tremulous star appeared in the darkening sky, Clara's step was on the threshold of her home.

"Sweeter, lovelier, dearer than ever!" thought Mrs. Arnot, as she pressed her daughter closer and closer in her fond embrace. When the flush of excitement at the first meeting had passed away, the eye of affection observed that Clara had become paler and thinner, that there was a thoughtful, preoccupied expression on her gentle brow, as though her mind were wandering far away; but there was deeper feeling in those soft blue eyes, more beaming sweetness in that smile, than even her mother had ever seen before.

Clara retired early to her room, pleading the fatigue of her journey. She had scarcely been able to give even the semblance of attention to the multifarious questions of Emma on the amusements and fashions of London, and had answered them almost at random; but when sh found herself in her own apartment, the doo closed, and only Mrs. Arnot beside her, she threw herself again on her mother's bosom buried her glowing face on her parent's neck and, trembling with joyful emotion, uttered, in scarcely articulate accents, "Mother, dear mother, he has spoken!"

"Sir Edwin Erskine!" faltered Mrs. Arnot.

"I must tell you all," continued Clara, without raising her head. "It was yesterday—onl yesterday—at Richmond. I did not know—had scarcely dreamed - oh, mother!" she exclaimed suddenly, bursting into tears of deligh "I never, never believed it possible to be so—the bright, sparkling drops told the rest.

Mrs. Arnot grew very cold. There was a sin ing at her heart and a rising in her throat, whic made her for the moment unable to speak.

"And he will be a son to you, mother, th most tender and dutiful of sons! He will nev separate us—he is so generous—so good!"

"And is he"—said Mrs. Arnot, speakin slowly, as if fearful to break by one word t spell of happiness thrown around her daught —"is he one who holds the same blessed fai in which your dear father lived and died?"

Clara was silent for a short space. "He do not, I believe—indeed, I know—he does not all things hold the same opinions as those whi I have been taught; he is too candid, too ho orable to make false professions; he—he do not view everything in the same light which y do; but his character, his life are beyond proach; his actions prove that his creed cann be far wrong! It is from you, mother, tha have learned to value deeds far more than wor Was it not our Saviour himself who said, ' their fruits ye shall know them?' "

"He did so, my child; and where the fru of the Spirit are found, there we may be su that a blessing abides. But the first fruit is h supreme love towards God, the love of the deemed for their Redeemer, of pardoned sinn for their Saviour: where this is wanting, w cause have we to hope that the soul has b 'born again' unto God?"

Clara raised her head: her cheek was painfu flushed, and the tears of joy which had gliste on her lashes were followed by bitter drops she exclaimed, "Some one has been prejudic you against him; some one has been malign him, mother!"

"It is himself, then," replied Mrs. Ar calmly; "I have been reading 'The Mas Mind.'"

"And do you not think it beautiful—subl —the transcript of a noble heart, an exa mind?"

"Not the heart of one converted—not mind of a Christian!"

There was a long and most painful sile Clara was wounded to the quick, and that hand that she loved. Blinded by her affect she regarded Sir Edwin with an enthusiastic miration which could see no fault, a tender votion which would have regarded the sa fice of life itself but a small one for his s Every fibre of her loving heart seemed to h twined itself round its new idol, and to bre ven a slighting word of him was to wrench and acerate those tender heart-strings. She again uried her face, but this time it was not on the osom of her mother.

"Mamma, you know not how wretched you ake me with your doubts!"

"My child—my own child—I would give my fe's blood to render you happy!" Mrs. Arnot ook the cold hand of Clara, and pressed it con-ulsively to her heart. "But I cannot—I dare ot—trust you to one who is not treading the ame path towards heaven; I cannot—dare not -let you break the command which bids our nions be 'only in the Lord.'"

"You will refuse your consent?" exclaimed lara, starting to her feet, and gazing on her other with a look of wild dismay.

"Oh, God help me!—God guide me!" mur-ured the unhappy parent, pressing her hand ghtly over her brow.

"You will refuse your consent?" repeated lara, more wildly and passionately than before. Mother, mother! you know not what you are oing!—you may break my heart, you may lay e in my grave; but"—her manner suddenly hanged to one of clinging, confiding affection, s she sank at the feet of her mother, and look-d imploringly up into her face—"but you will ot, dear mother, you will not; you will let us e happy together. When you see him—when ou know him—all these terrible doubts will ass quite away; you will look on him as I look -you will love him: only wait till he comes—ill to-morrow."

"To-morrow! is he coming?" gasped the dy.

"Mother, dearest mother, you are trembling!"

"Oh, this is a very, very bitter cup! God give e strength to drink it," exclaimed the widow.

"He will bring sunshine with him; he will lead his own cause—".

"Thankful, most deeply, profoundly thankful ill I be, Clara, if he can indeed satisfy my mind hat he is a faithful servant of our divine Mas-er! I can pass over minor differences—the uter garb of religion—the forms which man ath appointed—we may hold various opinions ere, and yet be one in the Lord. But if I find hat my fears are but too true—that Sir Edwin, ifted and noble as he is, has chosen a path of is own, which is not the narrow one which eadeth alone unto life; that he rests upon a hope f his own, which is not trust in the merits of is Saviour; that he has formed a standard of is own, which is not the standard of the Word f Truth; whatever grief, whatever anguish it ay cost me, my duty is plain before me—I must ot resign the treasure committed by God to y charge to the keeping of one who is not His isciple."

And so they parted, the mother and the aughter, and many and bitter were the tears hich wet their pillows that night. Mrs. Arnot ought and found relief in prayer—Clara, in houghts of him whose idolized image stood be-ween her and the light of heaven.

Sir Edwin Erskine was a brilliant type of a lass of men who are as much to be pitied as to e dreaded. They live in a large world of their wn, while tens of thousands of the enlightened nd the ignorant, the cultured and the illiterate, he great and the little, the strong and the weak, re proving by a practical test the gracious ords of the Son of God: "I will not leave you omfortless: I will come to you. Yet a little hile and the world seeth me no more; but ye ee me: because I live, ye shall live also." (John 4:18, 19.) There was on the surface of his religion no shocking feature to cause offence or o awake alarm. He professed adoration of the lmighty, and he practised much of the high orality which Christ taught. But he rejected hrist as the Incarnation of God, as the Re-eemer of men, as the Conqueror of death, and s the Judge of the world. Even God Himself e acknowledged without fearing Him, and wor-hipped without knowing Him.

THE SUFFERING SAVIOUR.

S. S. Lesson for May 4th.—Isaiah 53; Golden Text, 1 Peter 2:24.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN our lesson for to-day we are, more than usual, on holy ground. The Spirit of God, whose office it is to receive of Christ and to show (or Greek to bring) unto us, opens in this chapter the cross of Jesus and His sacrifice as already accomplished and fulfilled in the mind of God. And the first words of our chapter are a sad questioning from the heart of God: "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" As though He would say, "After the stupendous sacrifice which none but God could devise, and which none but God could accomplish, and a sacrifice so perfect that an entire provision is made for the pardon, sanctification, and perfecting of every man in soul and body, who is there that understands and sets a value upon what I have done?—who, after all, will be saved thereby?"

"For He shall grow up before Him as a tender plant," etc. A Saviour, to be a true Redeemer, must be after God's mind, and not after the perverted mind of man, and while He was the very image of God's person, in man's eyes "He hath no form nor comeliness: and when we shall see Him, there is no beauty that we should desire Him."

But this was not all that He bore: "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Thus He took upon Him, and adopted as His own in order to save us, all our fallen position in soul and body. The Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all, and Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses upon the cross, that in His human body all which sin had incurred and produced might be suffered by Him; and that He might make us members of His risen body, of His flesh and of His bones, over which sin and sickness have no power. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13). Here is the provision, but who hath believed our report? Who is living in power of Christ's resurrection, as dead to sin as Christ is dead to sin, and as free from its consequences as He, because we are in Him? We know the doctrine well enough, but "to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

Our golden text says, "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness." Is it true, dear reader, that you are dead to sins by the very fact that Jesus bare your sins upon the cross? Do you see not only that you are pledged but able to remain dead to sin, and to live unto righteousness, because between you and your Lord there is but one life if you really believe on Him? "I am the Vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without Me ye can do nothing" (John 15:5). Do you deny sin all claim upon you, either to condemn or to overcome you, because your faith says, "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." This is your privilege and mine, and we are guilty if our life does not correspond to it.

But it may be that some of my readers have not yet so much as accepted the pardon of their past sins. Beloved reader, what meaning do you attach to the words, "He was wounded for our transgressions"? Can there be any sense in His bearing your punishment if you are not saved thereby? And why are you not saved? Because you have not believed the report, for "He that believeth on Him is not condemned" (John 3:18). Oh, you say, there is your difficulty: if you only could be sure that you believed, all would be well. Let us look at the facts. Is it true that the Son of God is come? Is it true that He took on Him, without waiting to ask your minds about it, all the sins of thought, and word, and deed, which have sullied your soul? Is it true that God has accepted Him in your stead, because you are a helpless sinner? Then what do you mean by not thanking Him for it with a free full heart, and what do you mean that you are not saying to Him, Lord, take this redeemed life for Thy rightful property: I live henceforth to do Thy will; by the grace of God I "live unto righteousness"?

But who hath believed our report? Do our so-called Christian lands look as though the report had been believed? What mean the huge buildings which contain our criminals? What mean the public-houses, the houses of ill-fame, the many haunts of so-called pleasure, which are hotbeds of vice? Does it look as though the mighty arm of the Lord to deliver from sin was revealed?

But nearer home, in the lives of those who profess to be Christians, and who have received pardon at God's hands, what means the pettishness, the irritability, the selfishness, the want of integrity, and the consequent want of spiritual power? Have not many taken the first part of our golden text, and believed that He bare their sins in His own body on the tree, but His object in doing so has escaped them, and Satan has rejoiced in unsatisfactory conversions? They have not believed the report that in Christ's death they are dead to sins, and the power of the arm of the Lord to maintain them in living unto righteousness is unknown and untried by them. They have been seeking to do themselves what He has already done for them, and thus they have failed.

"He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth," etc. Before the high-priest (Matt. 26:62, 63), and specially before Pilate (Matt. 27:12–14), Jesus "opened not His mouth." And wherefore? Had He said "Not guilty," He must have lost our cause; had He said "Guilty" He must have been untrue. In very faithfulness to us He held His peace. Yet it was proved by all who judged Him that He was innocent. "He made His grave with the wicked, and with the rich in His death; because He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise Him"—"the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God."

"When thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand. He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied." He shall see of the travail of His soul when His elect bride is gathered out from the people and adorned for her husband. We were created, redeemed, sanctified, to satisfy the heart of Christ; we exist for Him, but we must be like Him in order that we may be in very deed and in the fullest sense united to Him. And thus must we be ready also in every thing to lose our own life, i.e. to leave off thinking what pleases us, and to think of what pleases Him; not in any thing to seek our own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's.

"Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong, because He hath poured out His soul unto death." This, and this alone, is the power over Satan, "the strong." "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb." God has purchased, by the blood of Christ, a just right to pardon; through death He destroyed "him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. 2:14), and now all impediments to His grace and mercy are done away. He has made it possible that every man shall be forgiven, that every man shall live without sinning; "these things write I unto you, that ye sin not" (1 John 2:1), and the only hindrance lies in our unbelief and unwillingness. But God will divide Him a portion, the purchase of His sufferings will be His. He sha'l not have been stricken in vain for the transgression of God's people, or have been numbered with the trangressors in vain, or in vain have borne the sins of many, for the spoil shall be taken from the strong.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Determined Attempt to Assassinate the Emperor of Russia was made on April 14th, as he was taking an early morning walk near the Imperial Palace at St. Petersburg. A man named Solovieff, who is said to be a retired functionary of the Ministry of Finance, was observed loitering in the neighborhood, and seeing the Emperor approach deliberately fired four shots out of a revolver at him. Providentially none of the bullets took effect, and the would-be assassin was promptly arrested. An enthusiastic crowd of persons offered their congratulations to the Czar on his marvellous escape, after receiving which he drove to the Kazan Cathedral to offer thanks for the preservation of his life. Several high officials called on him at noon, to whom he observed, "This is now the third time God has saved me." Solovieff is believed to be an agent of the Nihilists, as that society has recently threatened the Czar with assassination.

On receipt of the news at Washington, President Hayes immediately cabled his congratulations.

England's Wars.—News from South Africa shows that the British position is one exciting grave apprehension. Colonel Pearson was still unrelieved in his intrenchment at Ekowe; he had 150 of his garrison ill, and fifty wounded, with only 500 of his men who would be able to assist the relieving column of 6000 which had started to rescue him, and for which latter 35,000 Zulus were lying in wait. The number of the Zulus surrounding Colonel Pearson's position was estimated at 15,000 warriors.

In Afghanistan no further advance has been made by the British, but the attempts to induce the Afghans to abandon continued resistance do not appear likely to meet with success, and a further prosecution of the war seems probable.

The Stagnation of British Trade is evidenced by an article in the London Times, in which the writer says: "There is no business enterprise, no confidence in business prospects, and a strong sense of insecurity in nearly all business departments, which prevent the free employment of loanable capital in mercantile affairs." Money is gathering more and more into a stagnant mass in the London market, and exists now in such amounts that, were the people's minds at ease, gigantic schemes and speculations would spring into being. It is thus evident that even in commercial matters an abundance of money does not insure prosperity. A want of confidence and faith amongst business nullifies all the advantages which usually flow from the possession of large pecuniary resources.

An African Missionary, Mr. Telford, who lately went from Mr. Grattan Guinness's Missionary College at Harley House, Bow, London, said when setting out, "I go gladly on this mission, and shall rejoice if only I may give my body as one of the stones to pave the road into interior Africa, and my blood to cement the stones together, so that others may pass over into Congoland." While engaged on this missionary station a few months ago, he sent a messenger to the next mission to say how ill he was. The friends came to his help but he rapidly sank, his last broken words being, "Tell—my—dear—mother—that—I—am—going—home." A few minutes after his spirit was taken to that Saviour for whose sake he left mother, sisters, brothers, friends, and home in Europe, that he might go and tell these poor heathen of the way of salvation.

The Insolvency of Another Roman Catholic prelate is announced in the English journals. The highly polished, talented, plausible, and winning Monsignor Capel, who led more English fashionables into the Church of Rome than any other man, has got into trouble. His expenses have so far exceeded his resources that it is expected he will be withdrawn from England by the advice of Cardinal Manning, who it is stated has undertaken to discharge Mons. Caples liabilities on condition of his residing permanently at a distance from England.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey is Stated by the "Guardian" to have been for a fortnight in the early part of March the guest of Mr. W. H. Greaves Bagshawe, of Ford Hall, Chapel-en-le-Frith, England, churchwarden. At the afternoon service in the parish church on a Sunday Mr. Sankey sang four of his hymns to a crowded congregation. A platform was erected under the chancel arch, and an American organ placed on this structure for Mr. Sankey's use. The church organ and the choir occupy the west gallery. The Rev. George Hall, vicar and rural dean, was absent through indisposition, but the service was authorized and sanctioned by him. The senior curate, the Rev. Mr. Pink, preached on the occasion. Ritualists are indignant at this, and call on the Bishop of Lichfield to interfere. The Echo, however, remarks, "If opera-singers are allowed to sing for gain at musical festivals in cathedrals, why not Mr. Sankey gratuitously in a church."

The Koh-i-noor Diamond, which is the Largest in the world, and which Queen Victoria wore in a brooch at the wedding of the Duke of Connaught, was, we are told, first discovered in the mines of Golconda, in India, about A.D. 1650, and has cursed the world for 225 years. Of the 17 Indian rulers who successively possessed it, all suffered defeat, and the majority died violent deaths. On the annexation of the Punjaub in 1849 the diamond passed into the hands of the British, and was presented to Her Majesty in July, 1850.

The brightest jewel, however, which adorns her Majesty is that of a blameless life and the moral excellency of her character, which has reflected itself upon her Court during the forty-two years of her reign.

The Colportage Society Conducted by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon supports eighty-two men in needy districts, and does a great work in selling Bibles and healthy literature. He writes: "Owing to the depression of trade and the falling off of subscriptions, this branch of holy service is at this moment in a difficult position, and will soon be in urgent need, unless the Lord should move some of His stewards to help. It seems needful to give this intimation, that friends may know that there is a channel for their gifts and a reason for bringing them forth; but I feel confident that by some means or other the present necessity for the Lord's work will be graciously supplied, and furnish fresh occasion for gratitude and increased faith."

An Avalanche has Fallen Upon the Village of Bleiberg, in Switzerland, and buried nine houses, with all their inmates, including the drug-store, the inn, and the school. All the persons in the chemist's house succumbed—viz., the chemist, his wife, their four children, the assistant, and the servant. In the contiguous houses twenty-five persons were found dead, but nine were rescued alive. Four young people dressed in carnival disguise were surprised in their mirth by the avalanche, and found their death under the snow. It is calculated that eighty avalanches have fallen from the mountains round about.

Mr. Henry Varley, who has been Laboring in New Zealand, writes to a friend: "I know you will rejoice to hear what a wide and effectual door the Lord has opened for us in these colonies. In Wellington (the seat of government in New Zealand) the work has been most successful in every way. Christians have been roused, refreshed, and strengthened, backsliders restored, inquirers brought to Christ, our precious Lord exalted, and His priceless Word magnified. Surely our cup runs over. And in every place the crowds that come to hear the Word of life show how interesting is the blessed Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

A Lawsuit About a Hair.—There is a tremendous dispute raging in India over a hair from the Prophet Mahomed's beard. This holy relic is enclosed in a case, guarded by an official, who has a Government pension of 100 rupees per annum, and six fanatical Mussulmans are disputing for its possession. The dispute has been taken before the High Court.

Lord Radstock in Sweden has lately addressed meetings of 2000 people in Upsala, a university town of 14000. More than a hundred remained each night as inquirers. At Stockholm, also, there were about a hundred inquirers at the last meeting. Lord Radstock says, "There seems a 'sound of abundance of rain.' I am expecting to go to Jon-koping and Carlscrona, and then to Copenhagen; and I request prayer for blessing on my visits to those places. One interesting feature of the Lord's grace in Stockholm is the obedience of faith with which several pastors and elder brethren have accepted their privilege of anointing the sick and praying over them in the name of the Lord. There have been many remarkable instances of God's gracious healing, showing that God has not withdrawn the promise in James 5 : 15.

Eastern Dislike of Daughters.—While the girls of one of Miss Whately's schools at Abeih, in Arabia, were playing together one day, two of them fell into a pleasant dispute as to the size of a certain object—plaything, perhaps. One said, "Oh, it was very little!" and the other asked, "How little?" To which the girl replied, unconscious of the poetry or pathos of her comparison, "As little as was the joy of my father on the day I was born!" This remark receives its point from the fact that, not only in Arabia, but generally throughout the East, the birth of a son causes great rejoicing, while that of a daughter gives rise to lamentation.

Blood-Money.—Canon Wilberforce recently said that benevolently-disposed publicans reminded him of a notorious character arrested upon the penny steamboat, who picked the pocket of an old lady of everything she had, and then, when he had it safe in his own pocket, went about and made a collection amongst the passengers to make it up to her. He did not believe in robbing a nation with one hand and giving it back with the other. He did not believe in spreading sin and misery and desolation and hell-fire amongst the people, and then paying God for it in that way.

A Brave Wife.—Lord Beaconsfield, when Mr. Disraeli, was once driving down to the House of Commons with his wife. Deeply immersed in cogitation, he alighted from his brougham and closed the door on one of his wife's fingers. Although suffering great pain, she uttered no cry until he was in the lobby, out of earshot. Then she summoned the footman to open the door, released her imprisoned finger, and fainted. She is reported to have said to Mr. Disraeli, when telling him next morning of the mishap, "I would not have cried out for the world. In thinking of my sufferings, you would have been so agitated that very probably the most salient points of the important speech you were about to deliver would have been omitted."

The Need of Sailors' Homes, and of Mission work among sailors, is shown by a recent tragedy at Shadwell, East London. James Sims, an American sailor, having received a large sum for wages, proceeded to spend it in drink and dissipation with an abandoned woman, Lucy Graham. After a few days, the money being squandered, he attacked her for having taken as he alleged, some of the money, and cut her throat. He was hung at Newgate last month He attributed the crime to his having been excited by drink at the time.

A Boy Eleven Years Old Attended some evangelistic meetings, about three years ago, a Ned Wright's Mission in London, and becam truly converted. He then testified for Jesus t his parents at home, but the only result was a series of severe beatings by his father. He wa consequently obliged to leave home and liv apart from his parents. His father, however died lately, but not until he had almost with hi last breath bitterly reproached his son for becoming religious.

The boy, having now returned home to liv with his widowed mother and sister, helps t support them by his earnings of eight shillings week, as a zinc-worker, and at the same time b word and example preaches Christ to them.

WILLIAM NOBLE is by birth a Londoner, and was born February 17th, 1842. His parents were in humble circumstances, his father being a plain workingman earning his livelihood literally by the sweat of his brow. His mother was of a somewhat stern disposition, but later in life, after becoming converted, she manifested great sweetness and gentleness of character, and her influence over him was highly beneficial.

His first start in life was as a sailor. Running away from the school in Yorkshire to which he had been sent, he was put by his father on a collier brig, and in course of time he joined the Royal Navy. He has often spoken of these years in terms of the deepest regret, for there is no doubt that he then formed habits of intemperance which had a disastrous influence over his character and prospects.

It was not until 1860, when his father had purchased his discharge, and he was at work in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, that he came under [illegible]

[illegible] HIS FIRST ORATORICAL ATTEMPTS consisted in his redelivering several of the more striking orations of Mr. J. B. Gough, for whose character and eloquence he has so profound an admiration. His success was undoubted, for in thirteen evenings he had no less than sixty thousand persons to hear him in the National Standard Theatre in London. The late well-known and beloved Mr. George C. Campbell, of the National Temperance League, was his first chairman.

The novelty of the effort and the marked success attending it resulted in his becoming widely known, and the demands for his services were so frequent that he was induced at length to devote himself entirely to the advocacy of temperance principles.

The term "Gospel Temperance" is now becoming increasingly well known in all Christian nations, but it deserves notice that he was one of the first in England to make it clearly understood. To him total abstinence has ever been a means to a higher end. He has regarded it as but the untying of the grave-clothes, in which dead souls are bound, loosing them and letting them go that they may follow Jesus.

In the numerous addresses which William Noble has delivered total abstinence has ever been preached as a means to a higher end than that of making men sober. He has not of course undervalued the great triumph won when a man who has for years been the slave of drink shakes off his fetters. He has not been so foolish as to dispute the great social gain to the community, and the great personal gain to the man himself when he [illegible] comes sober; but by every illustration which he can use—and he has no slight skill in this direction—he regards this as, so to speak, the giving power to a lame man to walk, that he may forthwith enter the temple to praise the Lord.

As regards meetings on Sunday evenings, after places of worship are closed, to advocate what he persistently calls "Gospel Temperance," at first some Christian friends, on whose judgment and wisdom he was disposed to set a high value, felt some misgivings. It seemed to them that while temperance addresses might be suitable and most desirable on other days in the week, the Lord's day should be reserved for the proclamation of the Gospel. William Noble, however, knew what his one and only motive was, and did not swerve from the purpose he had formed.

When it is remembered that on thirteen successive Sunday nights, from February 10th to May 5th in 1878 (the service lasting from eight till ten o'clock), upwards of sixty thousand persons attended the National Standard Theatre at the east end of London, it must be evident that his addresses have taken a strong hold upon the popular heart. No one could doubt that the great majority of those present consisted of persons who were unaccustomed to religious services. The meetings were kept up and their interest never wavered.

HIS TEMPERANCE TOUR IN AMERICA.

Of the manner in which his efforts have been regarded by those who have long worked in the temperance cause, it will be sufficient to refer to his hearty reception in America, when he spent [illegible] not long [illegible]

Invitations to address other meetings poured in upon him during his first month in America, [illegible] addresses. From New York he next set out on a tour of observation, as he wished to examine for himself much that had come under his notice in books and public journals.

In Lancaster City, Pennsylvania, after speaking in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Judge Black, who was present, said, "I hope that Mr. Noble may soon return to our country for a more extended visit, and labor for temperance with us. May our Father protect him during his voyage home" He afterwards addressed large audiences in the Opera-house, when well-known public men presided. He then visited the prisoners in the county gaol, and one of the newspapers in reporting the service that he held there, said it was one which would be long remembered. The prisoners appeared to be deeply affected, and in place of the cheers with which a public meeting is greeted when the popular heart is stirred, the sobs of these unhappy men resounded through the building, giving a melancholy emphasis to the words spoken.

At Ocean Grove, N. J., on the invitation of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, he addressed an immense audience in the Memorial Tabernacle, numbers being unable to obtain admission. On this occasion he spoke about two hours, and at the close had the gratification of knowing that nearly one hundred persons had signed the pledge. It was during his visit to Ocean Grove that he received a letter from Mr. John B. Gough, giving him a cordial invitation to visit him. Mr. Gough wrote that he was quite desirous of meeting him, promising him a cordial welcome.

Mr. Noble's visit to the house of the great temperance orator will not soon fade from his recollection. Mr. Gough paid him the most courteous attention, sending his carriage for him, as his residence was five miles from the railway station, and the three or four days spent here were certainly bright red-letter days in his history. Nor should the fact be omitted, to which Mr. John B. Gough gave prominence in his very first oration at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, that it was chiefly through Mr. Noble's persuasion that he was induced to pay another visit to England.

Leaving Worcester city, he proceeded to Boston, and in this city spoke in Dr. Withrow's church to a large and influential audience. Dr. Withrow said that his address on the Christian Aspects of the Temperance Question was "felicitous and full of sticking points," and, after thanking him in the name of the people, wished him a hearty God-speed in his campaign against King Alcohol. He made the best use of his time in seeing the various points of interest in America which Englishmen generally appreciate. He took a run through Maine for the purpose of seeing the working of the Maine Law, details of which will shortly appear in the autobiography, on which he has been long engaged. He then visited Canada, and the Niagara Falls, speaking on his way in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, and elsewhere.

Eventually returning to New York, he spoke in Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, Brooklyn. Of the personal kindness of Dr. Talmage he retains the most lively recollections. In introducing the speaker to the audience, Dr. Talmage [illegible] Temperance Union, interesting details, with [illegible]

He also spoke in the First Presbyterian Church Greenpoint, Brooklyn, under the auspices c Mr J. A. Stearns, Secretary of the National Temperance Society: and likewise to two crowde audiences in the South Second Street M. E Church, and in Dr. Scudder's church, as well a others. One interesting service was held in th Navy Yard, Brooklyn.

HIGHLY COMMENDATORY TESTIMONIALS TO HI

For five months he may be said to have bee busily engaged in the kind of work at which glance has been taken. On November 25 what the New York Herald termed "a nob demonstration," and "a brilliant send off" William Noble was held in the large hall of t Cooper Institute, New York, where he h spoken several times.

The building was crowded to excess, so 2,500 persons being present, all of whom paid f admission. On this occasion Mr. John Gough was the principal speaker. He said deemed it a great privilege to meet his frie Noble on this probably his last appearance fore an American audience. After a characte tic address, he presented Mr. Noble with a v uable gold repeater watch, on which was scribed, "Presented to William Noble, by Jo B. Gough, at Cooper Institute, New York, N vember 25th, 1877, on behalf of his Ameri friends."

He was also presented with a finely bou copy of the "Poets of America," on behalf Mother Stewart. Mrs. Emma Gates Conl presented him with an elegant copy of the "C tennial Temperance Bible" for Mrs Noble; with other gifts an American organ, from Mes Smith & Co., of Boston, an instrument wh he has found of great value in conducting his various meetings. Amongst the contributo hese testimonials it may interest some to know hat there were many well-known American celebrities, including the Hon. W. E. Dodge, John B. Gough, Philip Philips, the singing pilgrim, Mr. J. N. Stearns, Rev. S. Merritt, Mr. Thomas Organ, and many others.

On "Thanksgiving Day" his final meeting was held at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, Brooklyn. Rev. Dr. Cuyler presided, and his estimate of the value of the work done by he English advocate of temperance may be gathered from the following letter, written in an album presented to Mr. Noble on this occasion:

"I give you, my dear Noble, the following old version of Psalm 125:

"'Who sticketh to God in stable trust,
As Zion's mount he stands full just—
Which moveth no whit, nor yet can reel,
But standeth forever as stiff as steel.'

With love to Britain's workers—in 'League and Alliance' for the right, yours teetotally, THEO. S. CUYLER.—Nov. 29th, 1877."

There was a numerous attendance of the leading friends of temperance in Brooklyn and New York, the names of whom are appended in the album. The Rev. Dr. Talmage wrote the following:

"Mr. Noble: We have enjoyed your visit, and are sorry it was so brief, but hope you will have a safe return, and that you will come again. Grace, mercy, and peace be with you.—T. DE WITT TALMAGE.—Brooklyn, November 27th, 1877."

Mr. J. B. Gough also wrote to the President of the Temperance Union, "I am glad I met Mr. Noble; I esteemed him before I met him for his work's sake, and now I hold him in respect and affection as a man, and am gratified to be able to call him my friend."

HIS WORK AT HOXTON AND STANDARD THEATRE.

With these affectionate farewells sounding in his ear, our friend left New York on December 1st of 1877, and, arriving in London in eleven days, found a great number of invitations awaiting him to resume his old work of lecturing in the large towns of England. He thought it wise, however, to decline accepting any engagements at that time, and did not commence public work again until February of 1878. With the co-operation of a few friends he then resumed work in the Standard Theatre on Sunday evenings. It was while thus engaged an offer was made to him for renting, with option of purchase, a large building long known as the Hoxton Music Hall. It is situated in the midst of a dense population, where such a work as he could do was urgently needed. After some deliberation this hall was taken, and from the day of opening in March last the Blue Ribbon Army, or the Gospel Temperance Band, have made this their head-quarters.

A true idea of the nature of the work there may be gathered from the pledge card issued, on which there is the following inscription:

"Gospel Temperance Movement.
THE BLUE RIBBON ARMY.
With charity to all and malice to none. I, the undersigned, promise by Divine assistance to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and to discountenance their use in others. Lord help me to keep this pledge for Jesus' sake."

Since the commencement of the work at the Standard Theatre on less than TEN THOUSAND persons have signed the pledge. Perhaps a better description can hardly be given than that of Mr. J. B. Gough, who in the course of an oration at Sheffield thus spoke of it:

"William Noble is doing a grand work at Hoxton Hall, in the north of London. I went there to one of his meetings, and took with me Dr. Taylor, of New York. I never shall forget it. There were from 1000 to 1500, amongst whom were some low, debased, ragged, wretched creatures; the gallery filled with those who probably came to look on just out of curiosity. Dr. Taylor had asked me where I would take him that night; I said, 'To the Hoxton Music Hall.' 'Oh, dear me!' said he, 'you don't go to such places as that, do you?' 'Oh yes,' I said, 'I shall go to-night.' 'What do they do?' 'They sing.' 'Well,' he said, 'I will go with you: I will trust you.' I said, 'They are going to sing now,' when we stood on the platform; and they sang—'Oh, I am so weary of sin.' My heart went out to them, poor wretched, sinful creatures, steeped to the very lips in impurity, crying out as they lifted their soiled hands and stained arms, 'I am weary of sin.' Then Mr. Noble said, 'Let us sing our favorite hymn,' and they sang—'When I survey the wondrous cross.'

"Dr. Taylor and I sat like a couple of boys. We were deeply affected and could not help it. Oh no! we did not want to help it. And when, Mr. Noble said, 'Those who will sign the pledge, come forward!' they came. 'Now,' he said, 'before you take the pledge we will have two minutes of silent prayer.' I said to myself, 'This is a risky business with all those roughs up yonder,' but you could have heard a whisper during the whole two minutes. You heard some sighs and some soft aspirations, and that was all. Well, I never had my heart so stirred in my life as I did when I looked upon them and realized the work that was being accomplished by the means of William Noble. The whole country ought to help him and support him in that grand and noble work."

MRS. NOBLE.

It is only just to say that, since Mr. Noble's work began in Hoxton, he has been vigorously sustained in his efforts by Mrs. Noble, to whom he was married on November 7th, 1865, who has done much amongst the poor of the neighborhood that can only be successfully attempted by a Christian woman. Although naturally shrinking from publicity, she has not hesitated to take a leading part in meetings held specially for the benefit of those who are attracted to the Hall by the novel services. She has visited them in their homes, and [illegible] sympathy has won them to attend religious services and social meetings. In all weathers she has been instant in season and out of season in supporting her good husband's hands, and the help she has rendered has been of the most valuable character. A vast amount of correspondence has grown out of the work in which Mr. Noble is engaged, and this she has taken upon herself, heavy though it occasionally may be. The courage she displays in her efforts to help on the work in which her husband is engaged is truly remarkable. She has been seen frequently in some of the lowest neighborhoods of London, visiting the public-houses of the district, distributing tracts, and inviting loiterers in the bar to come to the theatre, where they would hear what would do them good. Her work is the more praiseworthy when it is remembered that she is not in strong health.

The marvellous success which has attended the work of the Gospel Temperance movement hitherto is a reason for great thankfulness. The liquor traffic in England is said by judges, magistrates, and persons whose positions bring them into contact with the poor and with the criminal classes to be the cause of the greater part of the crime and misery which weigh down the heart of the nation. Mr. Noble's work will have the hearty sympathy and a share in the prayers of all our readers.

A Great Religious Revival is taking place at Rhondda Valley, in South Wales, in connection with evangelistic meetings held by the Rev. W. Booth's "Salvation Army." Clergymen there testify to the good that has been done. Miss Sheppard and two other young women have been the principal preachers. Five hundred persons are stated to have been converted. A telegram to a London paper stated last week that an all-night prayer-meeting was held on Wednesday night. Young men and women threw away their silver ornaments, pipes, etc., and the women tore off ornamental articles of attire, renouncing them as idols. Numerous penitents were seeking salvation.

A RECKLESS YOUTH SAVED AT MR. MOODY'S MEETINGS, AND BECOMING A MINISTER.

THE following letter, written to Mr. Moody since his return to this country, is a striking instance of the results of the meetings in the London Agricultural Hall four years ago:

"My dear Sir: I take the liberty of writing you, hoping that God will use this letter to encourage you in your labors. My parents are well-to-do, moral people; I have eight brothers and sisters.

We were always sent to Sunday-school, but when fourteen years of age, together with an older brother (now in Australia), I commenced to lead a wild, loose life. I left Sunday-school and gradually chapel too; and at last my brother and myself led such bad lives that father turned us out of home. My brother soon afterwards went to Australia, and I was to follow him in one year's time. However, I continued to live in England by myself, and led pretty much the same life as before, until I was nearly twenty years of age. At this time I had hardly been in a place of worship for six years.

"It was in 1875, one night about the end of March; I was having tea in a restaurant in the city, when one of my friends came in, and invited me to go with him to hear Moody and Sankey. I laughed at the idea, and told him I didn't go to religious meetings. However, he reminded me of the fun we should have, pushing about among the crowd; and at last as I had nowhere else to go, I consented to go with him. We pushed our way into Agricultural Hall (it was the first night you were there); the place was full.

We could hear but little; but the spirit of inquiry was upon me, and, though I laughed at you and the whole of the service, I made up my mind that I would hear you again. And accordingly, 'on the quiet,' night after night I visited the Hall until April 8th. Upon that day my friends (companions in sin) had found out where I went to of an evening, and had been ridiculing me. The 8th was a Thursday, a very wet night. I had to walk two miles through the rain to the Hall, but go I felt I must, though I got wet through.

"When I got there, the Word of God as an arrow went home to my soul. You pleaded earnestly for souls, entreating us to rise if we wanted Christ. I wanted Christ, and, careless of those around me, I rose. When I got upon my feet I thought I should have fallen. I thought of the thousands around me, some of whom might know me. I thought of the prayers being offered for me. I thought of my past life—it passed before me in a moment; but the next moment I cast myself upon Christ and was saved. I went to the inquiry-room, and saw an old Scotch gentleman there. He said, 'Are you a seeker?' I said, 'I don't know.' 'Do you believe?' he asked. 'Yes, with all my heart,' I replied. Then he said, 'You are saved; you can do no more; rest on your Saviour.' And my own heart echoed his words. I knew, I felt, I was saved. The Spirit of God bore witness with mine that I was a child of God.

"I went to my lodging-house—whether I ran or walked I know not. My heart was light. I prayed all night. I joined the Young Men's Tent Mission at Bow. After that I could not feel happy until my brothers and sisters knew of the dear Saviour I had found, and to-night I bless God that eight out of the nine brothers and sisters in my family are now happy in the Lord—in fact, all of us but my brother in Australia,—and we are now praying for him.

"Besides this, the Lord has greatly blessed me as a Wesleyan local preacher, and I am now in the —— College, where I have been for the past six months preparing for the regular ministry. I have offered myself as a missionary for Japan, and that will, I believe, be the land to which I will be sent. I pray that the Lord may continue to bless your labors for the salvation of immortal souls."

BALSAM FOR WOUNDS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage preached Sunday Morning, May 4, 1879.

"The disciples came and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jesus."—ST. MATTHEW 14 : 12.

The Catholicon for all your Troubles—Go and tell Jesus the Best Course—I. For Those who Feel Themselves Unpardoned—The Great Business of Christ—The Caustic of the Surgeon—II. For the Tempted—Different Men have Different Temptations—Sixtus Plotting for the Papal Chair—III. For the Slandered and Persecuted—Slander always Attacks the Godly Man—IV. For the Bereaved—The Emigration to the NextWorld a vast one—Sympathy of Friends fails—Through Ignorance or Absence—Christ knows and is always near—The Captain's Child at Sea — Xerxes weeping — Whither? Whither?

AN outrageous assassination had just taken place. To appease a revengeful woman, Herod had ordered the death of that noble, self-sacrificing, Christian man, John the Baptist. The disciples were in great trouble. There was no court to which they could make appeal. But grief must have utterance, and if there be no sympathetic ear to hear it, then it must be cried aloud to the winds, and the woods, and the waters. But there was an ear ready to listen. What beauty of pathos, and what wonderful picture in the words of my text: "they went and told Jesus"! He was ready to listen, and He was ready to assuage their grief.

We see Christ standing, His own face shadowed with His own sorrow, surrounded by a group of disciples in violent gesticulation, and with many tears, and with great outcry of woe. Raphael, with skilful hand, putting upon the wall of a palace a picture of Bible story was not so skilful as the plain hand of the evangelist as he puts upon canvas the sketch of the text: "they went and told Jesus."

The Goths and the Vandals came down from the North of Europe, and upset the gardens, and broke down the altars, and swept away every thing that was good and beautiful; and ever and anon in the lives of men there are rough-handed despoilers, crusaders, who come down to despoil, and plunder, and ransack the soul. No cavern is so deeply cleft in the mountain as to allow you shelter from trouble. The foot of fleetest courser is not swift enough to bear you beyond pursuit. The arrows brought to the string fly with unerring dart, and often you have fallen pierced and stunned.

Now, I am this morning, as your pastor, to bring a "catholicon" for all your troubles. I am going to gather all your griefs. I do not care what they are—I am going to gather all your griefs into a bundle, and set them on fire with a spark from God's altar.

THE PRESCRIPTION

of the text, which healed the sorrow of the disciples, is just as successful a prescription to-day, and will heal all your sorrows.

I. Now, in the first place, I commend the behavior of the disciples of the text to all those who feel themselves sinful and unpardoned.

There comes a time in every man's life when he wakes up to an appreciation of a sinful nature. The thought may not have enough heft to fell him; it may only be like the flash of a cloud at the close of a hot summer day; but the man must somehow get rid of that feeling. One man flies to prayer, another man stimulates himself with ardent spirits, another man dives deeper into secularities. It is not wonderful, when a man sees his eternity poised on an uncertainty, he is determined to do something violent and immediate. Now, can it be that there is in all this house this morning one man who is unwilling to have the cancer of sin taken from his soul when the divine surgeon is ready to do the work and do it successfully? I cannot believe it.

I think the first thing for you to do, if you are oppressed, my brother, if you are oppressed with a sense of your sinfulness, is to go and tell Jesus. Why, my friends, that is the business of Christ. He does other things, but I think is to pardon. To relax the grip of death from your soul, and to plant your unshackled foot on a golden throne, Christ allowed the tortures of the blood mount to transfix Him. With the beam of His own cross He will this morning crush in the door of your dungeon. Out of His own thorny crown He will pick enough gems to make your brow blaze with eternal victory. In every tear of His wet cheek, in every gash of His wounded side, in every long and blackening mark of laceration from shoulder to shoulder, in the grave-shattering, Heaven-storming death-cry, I hear the words: "him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out." Oh what a glorious Gospel! What a Gospel to preach! what a Gospel to hear! "Where sin aboundeth, grace shall much more abound."

Oh! says some man, "why, then, you propose to cure the wound of sin by making another wound—the wound of conviction." Why, my brother, that is what every physician does of all schools. The physicians, when they find an old rankling wound, they come with caustic and they burn it out, and then health and restoration come. Here is the old sore of sin, and God comes by His convicting grace, and He burns it out, and the flesh comes again as the flesh of a little child.

Well, there is not a man in the audience but is ready to have that process go on in his soul. He says: "That's reasonable, that's right, that's just what I would suppose, and I mean to have that process in my soul." When? my brother, when? "Oh!" you say, "some time." Well, I cannot afford to have you put off the subject in that way, and you cannot afford to put it off in that way. I want to know just when.

I have heard that Alfred the king, before the invention of timepieces, used to measure the day by three wax can[illegible] Each wax candle would burn e[illegible] hours, so that when one wax candle was consumed eight hours were gone; two wax candles, sixteen hours were gone; and when the third wax candle had been consumed, then the twenty-four hours, the whole day, was gone. O my friends! I wish, instead of measuring our days and nights and years on earth by a timepiece we would measure them by mercies and opportunities which are burning down and burning out never to be relighted, lest at last we wake up with the discomfiture of the foolish virgins, and cry, "our lamps are gone out!"

II. But, in the second place, I commend the behavior of these disciples in the text

TO ALL THE TEMPTED.

I have heard people say they were never tempted—people who had come to mid life that never had been tempted. Ah! my friends, it is because they have never tried to do right. If a man be handcuffed and hobbled, and he lie quiet, he does not test the power of the chain or the manacle; but let him once try to rise up and break off the handcuffs and the shackle then he finds out the power of the chain. If, my dear brother, you do not know the power of temptation, it is because you are bound hand and foot of sin, and have never made the attempt to be emancipated.

Why, it is easy enough to go down stream in a boat. You can lie upon your oars, you go just as fast as the tide goes; but suppose you turn around and head up stream, then it is not so easy making progress. As long as you go down with the tide of sin and iniquity, it is easy enough to go that way; but when you turn around and head toward God and heaven, then it is a struggle, an awful struggle.

Can it be that you have never tested the power of temptation? You have one kind of temptation, you another, you another. There is not a person in the house but has been tempted, whether you realize it or not. I never like to hear a man say: "Oh! I couldn't be tempted the way that man is." He could not be tempted the way you are. A lion cannot understand why a fish should be caught with a hook, and the fish cannot understand why the lion should be caught with a trap. You may be free from certain kinds of temptations, but there are other temptations after you.

You see some man with a phlegmatic temperament. "Why," you say, "that man hasn't any temptations at all." You mistake him. He has temptations to indolence, to censoriousness, to sinkdown into more latitude and longitude of fattiness, to lie down on the road of life, to stop great enterprises. He has just as many temptations in one direction as you have, being of a nervous and excitable temperament, have temptations in another direction.

You will see some aged man arise in a prayer meeting, and at eighty years of age he talks so sweetly of Christ and heaven, you say, "That man has lived without temptation." Ask him He has as many temptations at eighty years o age as he had at twenty. They are only

DIFFERENT STYLES OF TEMPTATION.

Ask that aged man whether he has lived be yond the reach of the powers of darkness i this world, and he will say it has been a conflic all the way through.

Sixtus was a cardinal and he wanted the pon tifical chair, and history says he pretended t be sick and crippled. He said, "Now, if yo elect me to that chair, I will occupy it, and won't live long anyhow, and then you will p some one else in the chair." He was elected t that position. He moved to it on his crutche Getting the chair, he threw aside the crutche He said, "While I was hunting for the keys St. Peter, it was appropriate I stooped; b having found the keys of St. Peter, there is reason why I should stoop any longer." So h crutches were gone and he was well. Oh! h suggestive of temptation. It seems at one ti to be wan and weak and crippled, but give the throne and it becomes a tyrant to grind yo soul into ruin.

Well now, you say, "[illegible] persons being tem ed, what are we to do when we are assailed temptation? When the wave dashes against is there nothing to hold on to? Is a man to into this war with the world, the flesh, and devil with no help?" I will tell you, my frien the wisest thing for you to do in the day temptation is like these disciples of my text— go and tell Jesus. In the eyes that wept w the Bethany sisters I see shining hope. In t voice that broke the silence of the tomb u the widow of Nain got back her son and stupe ous sorrow woke up in the arms of raptu aye, in that voice I hear the command and promise: "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and will sustain thee." He knows all about te tation. Tempted in all points like as we Go and tell Jesus.

THE BEST COURSE FOR THE PERSECUTED

III. Again: I commend this behavior of the disciples in my text to all those who are slandered and abused and persecuted. When these disciples saw that Herod had taken the head of John the Baptist, they knew their own heads were not safe. Every John has his Herod. There are people that do not think overmuch of you. misfortunes would be honeycomb to them. hiss at you through their teeth, and misinte your actions, and would be glad to see set. They would be the most submiss ers at your funeral!

Every one comes during the course be pommelled. Some slander comes horned and tusked and hoofed to trample gore you, and you think you are peculiar in respect. No. All who live godly in C Jesus must suffer persecution. If you are ab this morning, to say, "I haven't an enemy in all the world," it is proof positive you have not done your duty; for when a man does his duty, he challenges all earth and hell, and that challenge will bring against him opposition and scorn and persecution. It is so in all circles of li

One would have thought that if any man ought to have been free from persecution was George Whitefield, bringing great masses the people into the kingdom of God, wearing himlf out for Christ's sake, and yet the learned octor Johnson called him a mountebank! obert Hall preached about the glories of heav- as no uninspired man ever preached about em, and it was said when he preached about eaven, his face shone like an angel; and yet ood Christian John Foster writes of Robert all, saying: "Robert Hall is a mere actor, and hen he talks about heaven the smile on his ce is the reflection of his own vanity!" John esley stirred all England with reform, and yet e was caricatured by all the small wits of his ay; he was pictorialized, history says, on the ard fences of London, and everywhere he was e target for the punsters; and yet, John Wes- y stands to-day before all Christendom, his me mightier than any other name except "the ame that is above every other name," the ame of Christ. And can you expect to escape ardship and assault and abuse and slander? ou will not.

But what are you to do when you are lied about d assaulted? Are you going to hunt up the ander? While you are explaining one false- od, there will be fifty people who have just at moment heard of that particular falsehood. hile you are not to omit any opportunity of tting yourself right, I want to tell you who e abused and slandered of the world, I want to ll you of One who had the hardest things said out Him, whose sobriety was disputed, whose ission was scoffed, whose companionship was nounced, who was pursued as a babe, spat on a man, and howled at after He was dead. Go Him with all the wounds of your soul.

Do not go around trying to crush this false- od and to crush that slander: you will only me out of the contest irritated and exasper- ed; but take the counsel of the text, do as ese disciples of the text did—go and tell Jesus. o in His presence, and say: "Lord, I see Thy ounds, the wounds of Thy head, the wounds Thy feet, the wounds of Thy hand, the ounds of Thy side, and Thine own wounds ask Thee to pity mine." Try no longer to rry that burden. O abused soul! go and tell sus.

IV. Again, I commend the behavior of these sciples

TO THE BEREFT.

As I stand here Sabbath by Sabbath, and I ok off upon this audience, how many signals mourning do I behold! God has His own way breaking up the family. The emigration om this world to the next is so vast an enter- ise that God only can conduct it. That emi- ation from earth to eternity keeps three urths of the families of the world in desolation. he child that lay near the mother's heart is ken to lay in the cold and in the darkness. The ughter freezes to the girl's lip, and the rose atters. The boy comes in from the harvest elds of Shunam, saying, "My head! my ead!" and dies on the lap of his mother. idowhood stands with tragedy of woe struck to the pallor of the cheek, and orphanage cries vain for father and for mother.

Sometimes when we have sorrow our friends me in and they try to sympathize with us, and ey do sympathize with us to a certain extent; it they cannot understand all the grief. They as well as they can, but they cannot under- and it altogether. But blessed be God, hrist knows. He has been all through the ouble and all around about it. He has counted e tears and counted the groans, and before the ars started and before the groans began He w the hiding-place of the sorrow. Bone of our ne. Flesh of our flesh. Heart of our heart. orrow of our sorrow. As long as He remem- rs Lazarus' tomb, He will stand beside us in e cemetery. As long as He remembers His own eartbreaks, He will stand with you in the ceration of your affections. When He forgets is footsore way, and His lonely nights, and is weary mind, and His exhausted body, and is awful cross, and His solemn grave, then ill He forget you, but not until then.

Sometimes when we have trouble our friends are far away from us. We write a letter, saying: "Come right away," or we telegraph to them, saying: "Take the next train, come immediately;" but it may take hours, it may take days, before they reach us in our trouble. But I have to tell you this morning of One who is near to help, ever near, near before you, behind you, within you, nearer than the staff on which you lean, nearer than the cup you press to your lip, nearer than the handkerchief with which you wipe away the tears. I preach Him, an ever-present Jesus. Sometimes when we have trouble our friends come, and they do all they can for us; but they cannot relieve all the trouble, they cannot disentangle our finances, they cannot cure our sick, they cannot raise our dead.

Blessed be God, the One to whom these disciples went has all power in heaven and on earth, and He will at just the right time balk our calamities, and at just the right time, in the presence of an applauding earth and a resounding heaven, raise our dead. Oh! I preach Him, an Almighty Christ. The last sword will leap from the scabbard of omnipotence, and the last resource of the infinite God be exhausted before God will allow one of His children to cry for comfort and not get it.

I HEARD OF A CHILD

who went to sea with her father, a sea-captain, and when the first storm came in the midnight the little child awakened and rushed out in great fright, and cried: "Where's father? where's father?" Then they told her the father was on deck, and that he was guiding the ship, and he was watching the storm, and she said: "Well, if father's on deck, then I'll go to sleep." So she went to sleep.

O ye who are tossed in the storms of this life! I want to tell you the Lord is guiding the ship; your Father is on deck, and He will bring you through into the harbor. O ye whose cheeks are wet with the night-dew of the grave, ye whose hearts are [illegible] with a [illegible]! in the name of a religion which can wipe every tear, and lift every burden, and deliver every captive, and illumine every darkness, I implore you go and tell Jesus. If you will not, if you try to carry your sins and your burden yourself, I tell you, my brother, plainly, your life will be a failure, your death will be a disaster, and your eternity a calamity; but if you will go to Christ with all your sins and all your sorrows to-day, your foot will strike the upward path, and the shining messengers who tell above what is done here will make the arches of God resound with the tidings that you have gone to tell Jesus.

Well, I look over this audience, and I wonder whether you will carry your own burdens, whether you are going to be so foolhardy as to take the consequences of your own sin, when there is a balm, a balsam for all wounds, and pardon for all transgressions. Soon you will be gone, and gone forever. You remember how Xerxes felt when he looked at his army—two million men—perhaps the greatest army ever marshalled. Xerxes rode along that army and reviewed it. Two million men! And after he had reviewed the troops, he came to a hill, and he looked off upon the great host and burst into tears. One of his staff officers expressed surprise that at a time when he ought to be full of exultation and triumph he should weep, and asked him why he wept. "Oh!" he said, "I weep because so soon all this host will be gone."

And this morning, I look off upon this audience, and I realize what you must realize, that soon you will all be gone—gone from the church, gone from the home circle, gone from business circles, and gone forever. Whither? Whither?

"'Tis not for man to trifle:
  Life is brief, and sin is here;
Our age is but a falling leaf,
    A dropping tear.
Not many lives, but only one, have we—
    One, only one.
How sacred should that one life be,
    That narrow span!"

RESCUE OF SEVEN ENTOMBED MINERS.

The Mine considered Unsafe—Fall of the Roof—Seven Men Imprisoned—Scenes at the Pit's Mouth—Digging a New Entrance—Obstacles in the Way—Fighting Fire and Water—"They are all Alive"—Narratives of the Rescued Men—Futile Efforts to Extricate Themselves—Hunger—Killing the Mule — Prayer-meetings—Close of the Boarding house for the Season.

THE whole community of Wilkesbarre, Pa., has been agitated during the past week by a mining disaster which it was feared at one time would involve the loss of seven lives.

The mine, leased by the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and operated by Charles Parrish, known as "number ten slope," located about three miles from Wilkesbarre, has been known among miners as a very dangerous place by reason of the insecure roof. Gas has also been known to accumulate in certain sections of the mine in great quantities. But one vein is being worked, which crops out on the hillside, but which bends downward in the form of a basin.

It was in the bottom of the basin, 1200 feet below the surface of the earth, that a new gangway was projected, and men were employed night and day in pushing it to completion in order to open up new breasts and chambers. It was something like a mile away from the foot of the slope, but a large fan, driven by a powerful engine, dissipated the gases, and from this danger, generally incident to coal-mining operations, there was freedom.

But the shaky rock overhead filled every miner's heart with misgivings. For several days and nights the mine had, to old workmen, sounded the alarm in unmistakable tones. It had "worked heavy," the creaking sounds reverberating through the old, abandoned chambers like the crackling of the dry limbs of a forest in a hurricane. The pillars had cracked and bulged out, and other premonitory symptoms were noted. On the morning of April 23d the crisis came, while there were in the mine the following delvers in the black-diamond bed

William Hawkins; Edward Price; Patrick Green; John Green; Barney Riley; John Clarke, door boy; William McKinney, driver boy.

The men entered the mine on Tuesday night, April 22d, at eleven o'clock, to work out the night shift beginning at that time. At about twelve o'clock a miner passed over the main gangway, which was being driven by the above-mentioned men, and discovered that some considerable quantities of the roof had fallen upon the bed of the road. An hour later, and from that time until about three o'clock, men came out of the dismal abyss and related indications of danger they had observed in the mine.

At a few minutes past three o'clock Dennis Gilgallon and his brother and two other miners were on their way out of the mine when they found about a car-load of coal upon the road track. Climbing over this this they met the two boys, Clarke and McKinney, who worked in conjunction with the men who were driving the gangway. Gilgallon urged them to make haste and save themselves and their companions from harm.

The boys started at full speed on their errand of mercy to warn the men at the head of the gangway half a mile distant, to flee for their lives.

Only a few moments after the two young boys started away, a loud crash like a thunderclap was heard, and it was known that the roof of the mine had fallen in. The fate of the men and boys at work was the first thought of all. The fallen coal blocked the passage and cut off all communication with them, if indeed they were not lying mangled corpses under the massive weight. The question anxiously asked on all hands was, If the imprisoned miners are not dead from physical violence, can they withstand the gas that is in all likelihood choking up the mine?

A MOURNING COMMUNITY.

It was about four o'clock when the accident became known to the men, and word was soon carried to the main office in Wilkesbarre and to the families of the ill-fated colliers. The roads and bypaths to the mouth of the slope soon began to present an animated scene, and by six o'clock the surroundings were melancholy and dispiriting. The relatives of the entombed men, male and female, raised their voices in the loudest lamentations over the loss of their dear ones. Women tore their hair, and, rolling upon the ground, inflicted tortures upon their own bodies in the vain hope to assuage their grief.

NO HOPE FOR RESCUE.

Brave volunteers descended into the yawning sepulchre to investigate and see if by any possible chance the fated seven, 1200 feet below, could escape. But each returning squad wore the same sad expression of face. No one asked the result of the visit below. Too well did the anxious wife, mother, or brother know the meaning of the look of despair as each coal-begrimed visage came up out of the inky blackness below. The report was that the fall of the roof was becoming general.

DIGGING A NEW ENTRANCE.

The immense mass of rock and coal had, it was thought, fallen between the place where the men were at work and their usual point of egress from the mine; and it was considered a task easier as well as safer to dig a new passage from the surface on the other side of the fallen roof than to cut a way through the obstruction.

Upon the suggestion that a new opening might be made from the surface and followed to the highest breast of the mine, half a thousand voices said "aye," and a point was quickly selected a short distance east of the supposed fall. The pick and shovel and drill were faithfully taken and plied with alacrity, but the progress through the rock was slow.

OBSTACLE AFTER OBSTACLE.

With steady persistence, 200 willing men, divided into three companies, who relieved each other at intervals, worked vigorously at the new opening. Discouragements, of which there were not a few, seemed only to stimulate them to renewed exertions. First, it was found an impracticable spot had been selected for the new passage, for the axes struck rock too hard to penetrate with sufficient speed when human life was at stake. The work ceased, and another point chosen where only earth and coal intervened, and once more the rescuing party were energetically engaged. Then two men, who had brothers among the imprisoned men, descended by the old entrance on an exploring expedition, and returned not only unsuccessful, but with the appalling intelligence that they had accidentally ignited the foul gas below, and that the mine was now on fire. At this new calamity general despondency prevailed, but hope revived when, after a steam fire-engine had operated for a considerable period, it was announced that the fire was finally extinguished. Afterward news came that the water in the pit was rising rapidly and a general flooding was anticipated. The pumps were at once set to work, and the new danger vigorously grappled with.

For six days these untiring efforts had been going on with alternations of hope and despair among the anxious crowd at the pit's mouth.

"'THEY ARE ALL ALIVE.'

"It was just nine on Monday morning when strong knocks in rapid succession were heard upon the trap-door that leads to the dismal abyss. The utmost silence prevailed. Men with bathed breath awaited the opening of the mouth of the messenger. It might be a voice freighted with excessive joy: it might be weighted down with the bitterest woe. The familiar head garb of a miner appeared at the hole. It was Daniel Lewis, and he cried out, 'They are all alive!'

"Never have the rock-ribbed hills of Sugar Notch echoed with joy as they did in response to this intelligence. Huzzah after huzzah was wafted out on the atmosphere, and the people in the village came out of their houses and gazed up to the place where the devoted men had been laboring upward of five days in succession without stoppage for the rescue of their fellow-men. Speedy messengers were despatched to Ashley for physicians and restoratives. There was rejoicing all around, and all gave expression to their feelings and congratulated one another upon the result of their protracted search.

"'HERE THEY COME.'

"Hardly had the cheers died away before another rap was heard at the trap-door, and another miner came up with the shout upon his tongue, 'Here they come!' 'Twas true; one after another of the imprisoned men was helped through the trap. As fast as they came up they fell into the hands of friends with unalloyed pleasure. The meeting was one of those scenes that cannot be faithfully portrayed. To the friends who had waited so long for their return it seemed as if the dead had risen. The rescued felt then, if never before, the blessings of friends, and the gloriousness of God's sunlight."

William Kinney, the driver boy who displayed his courage by running to warn the men at the time the fall was impending, instead of securing his own escape, gave the following of the time in the pit: "As I was coming out along the lower level gangway, about 500 yards from the facing, I was stopped by Martin Lee and Pat Devany, who had gone out to clear the track of a fall that had occurred before. This was about two o'clock Wednesday morning. I went ahead and saw that the track was obstructed by about twenty car-loads of roofing. I ran off at once to warn the men.

"While we were running toward the slope it was falling before us and behind us so we turned back. One said, 'What are we going to do?' One of the Green boys said there must be an opening on the back branch, and we started for that place. We found that that was full and we retraced our steps back to the main gangway and tried to roo[illegible] way through the fall. We hooked our way through that about fifteen yards, and gave it up. Little pieces were falling all around us.

"We saw it was useless trying to get out and by this time were all very hungry. So some of us went to where the mule was and we killed him and cooked some of his flesh. While we were eating we prayed to God that we might get out. Then we went on a back bench and laid down on an old door. We had a little camp-meeting there.

PRAYERS ANSWERED.

"On Thursday, just after we had eaten the first mule meat and had all declared it was good, as if in answer to our prayers, we heard a shot fired. Then we heard other sounds, and we sometimes thought it was men working for us, and more times we thought it was the fall of the roof, and we all got down and prayed that it was the rescuing men. Charley Hawkins sang some hymns. Saturday night we all felt in good cheer, but on Sunday there was no shooting, and we gave up all for lost. Charley Hawkins, the cook, then reduced our rations so that our food would last longer.

"We laid down and slept until this morning, when Hawkins went to try the gas and he found the gas was coming on us, and the air was getting worse. Then we went along the gangway to where the cave had broken down, an old breaking, to look for the course of the first air.

"WE ARE SAVED."

"Riley started to do something to the air passage, and we thought we heard somebody talking. We had been fooled so many times before when we hallooed, but we thought we would try it once again, and we cried hallo, and then we heard Mr. Smith say to Nick. Rapson, 'We have found them and they are alive.' He came right out to us; and wasn't we glad! We then went back and put out our fire and closed our boarding-house for the season. The rats will have a feast from the old mule—they are in sole possession now."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Arnold Percival Assumes his Benefactor's Name—Trouble with the Tenants—The Murder of Percival Montaigne Resolved upon—Lawyer Gogharty Warned of the Fact—He Longs for a "Good Sickness" or a "Providential Course" for Arnold Montaigne—Jimmy Mehaffy Breaks his Leg—Percival Goes in Search of Help—Percival Montaigne Falls into Trouble—He Interrupts a Ribbon Lodge Meeting.

Of a vigorous physique, young Montaigne took great delight in open-air amusements; and, when entered upon his teens, fishing and shooting became his favorite recreations. Summer and Christmas vacations found him at an uncle's, a Mr. Percival, whose abode too was not far from what had been his father's parish; a considerable sweep of the property, also, in the neighborhood would one day pass into his own possession, since the greater portion of the late Sir Christopher's landed estate lay in this part of the county. This, of course, gave the lad a special interest in it, and the moors, hills, and streams around furnishing good sport, were, during the weeks mentioned, traversed by him in all directions. On these occasions, as a rule, Jimmy Mehaffy, an intelligent and good-tempered young man in his uncle's employ, attended the youthful sportsman

When Percival Montaigne (in honor of the late knight he now prefixed to his own the former name) was fifteen years old, it so occurred that, admonished by the Court of Chancery, the trustees appointed over the Percival estate were required to evict from their holdings some non-paying tenants, several years in arrear. As they would come to no terms—indeed had got to believe, with many in the county at the time, tha all rent was an extortion—nothing remained t do but to put them off the property. As usua in Ireland, this sharp but necessary procedur aroused the enmity of the whole district, an this the more as the big war meditated by th Ribbon conspiracy was soon to come off, whic would end, it was calculated, Saxon rule in Eri forever, and restore to the ancient clans all th lands of which in the old time they had bee wrongfully dispossessed.

At a secret meeting of malcontents upon th estate, revenge was resolved upon, and since th trustees, residing in Dublin, were out of th way, what could be better than "to put off t walk"—that is, murder—the young heir to t estate, "which 'job' could be easily done," it w suggested, when he was out on his sport, and some lone place with Jimmy Mehaffy. The pl was feasible, and at a solemn meeting it was solved to be done.

In all such cases it was the rule, however, a it had—strange to tell—the force of a law in t Ribbon society, to give some warning of murderous intent to the proposed victim, and the person to be sacrificed was only a lad, it thought that the right thing to do would be send a notice of their fixed intention to Gogharty, the lawyer. That gentleman s received the following letter, headed with picture of a coffin: "Lawyer Gogharty, thi to inform you that unless thim who by your anny has ben done out of their own is put b into their holdings, and that at wanst, y young employer may look out. There's t who will take rite and justice on him. W on his march to shoot snipes and hares let make up his mind to be baged himself by t who can do the gob in the natest and pur manner; and this is the honest truth th towld ye, so beware. Sined and saled by t who has the rite."

When Mr. Gogharty received this letter rious emotions struggled in his mind. Sinc Christopher's death, large sums, the accun tion for years of interest and rent, had added to the wealth which the knight had behind him. And covetous desires were at up in the heart of the lawyer, and this the more from his having, of late, lost large sums of money by unfortunate speculations—money which he once hoped to leave to his only son. Very often of late did that moment come up before his remembrance when Sir Christopher, at the mention of his Alick's name, had all but made up his mind, it was evident, to make him his inheritor. "Upon my word," he would say to himself, "it was by the merest accident—by a downright 'fluke,' as they say—that Arnold Montaigne's name came to be thought of by the knight, and my boy was cut out of the money.

"It is true Arnold Montaigne has some right of blood to it, but one so slight it was absurd for Sir Christopher to make it the ground of his legacy—it was, in fact, a piece of downright superstition on his part, and certainly had in it nothing of natural affection." Then, observing the dangerous direction in which his reflections were veering, he would add, still speaking to himself, "Well, I'm sure I don't wish harm to young Montaigne—he personally has done me no evil; and yet—and yet, I must say I shouldn't fret if a good sickness, or a thing of that sort, would come some of these days and take him out of the way, it would be, 'pon my word, if not a merciful, yet certainly a very lucky, Providence for me and mine."

The beginning of strife, we are told, is like the letting out of water—from a small beginning there soon grows an impetuous flood (Prov. 17 : 14); and so it is with the permitted entrance of evil thought into the mind: it quickly increases in pertinacity, darkness, and power. Thus it was with Mr. Gogharty. Once he was startled at himself, and his conscience recoiled from entertaining malice against the lawful heir; but he came in time to long even for his death, so that his own son, according to the will of Sir Christopher, should in due time succeed to the deferred inheritance, and meanwhile that he, as guardian of his son, when a ward of Chancery, should pocket the allowance which Mrs. Montaigne was now enjoying.

It was while in this malicious and vexed condition of mind toward Percival Montaigne, aggravated by bad financial news, come by post that morning, that Mr. Gogharty received the Ribbonmen's letter. At first a flash of indignation rushed up in his heart, and his impulse was to put the criminal missive at once into the hands of the authorities, but it was not long until the temper within suggested another course of action. As though hissed into his ear, he heard a voice saying, "Why should you do any such thing? Percival Montaigne's life is much in your way. Why should you guard it? Here is just the means of getting rid of it, without trouble or cost, by deputy. Do not move a hand in this matter. Quietly put the letter you have received into your pocket. Let things take their Providential (!) course, and the issue will not be undesirable."

It thus came about that during the Christmas season Percival Montaigne went, as he was wont, on his shooting excursions, and, attended by Jimmy Mehaffy, ranged over the whole district around his uncle's dwelling. He had not the slightest suspicion of any insecurity. He had no hand in the eviction of tenants. As a minor his approval in such matters was never asked, and such proceedings were carried out almost without his knowledge.

One day, at the very beginning of the year, he and his companion went in search of game far beyond the bounds of their usual expeditions. Sport became plentiful, and without thinking of the distance they were going, they were led on into a wild, unknown, desolate and boggy region. The shades of evening coming on, they were reminded of home, so, having well filled their game-bags, they resolved to make good their return.

Every thing went on well for some time, and a considerable portion of their journey was retraced, when Jimmy Mehaffy, in jumping over a fence, caught his foot on the topmost rail, and fell heavily upon a large stone on the other side. He was not stunned, but, making an attempt to rise, he could not. No, his leg—poor fellow!—was broken. It was not long until he fainted; but a flask put to his lips by his young master speedily revived him. Having sat for several minutes to recover himself, the evening gloom every moment thickening, with the aid of Percival Montaigne he got up, standing on one leg, and tried if motion were possible; but the broken limb was useless, and every effort to walk was attended with agony.

Here was a painful predicament. No house was near. Not a light glimmered from any point in the darkness. Percival Montaigne shouted aloud for help, but there was no returning answer. The hale lad then sought to carry on his back his beloved attendant; but Mehaffy was a large and heavy man, so that the youth only helplessly staggered under his load, and after, with tremendous labor, advancing a few steps, to prevent a fall he was compelled to put down his burden. The lad was too manly to weep, but in the deepest distress he stood and looked down piteously upon his maimed companion. "O Jimmy," he cried, "what in the world is to be done? It's all owing to me, for if it had not been that I brought you here you would not now be in this sad and painful plight."

"Whisht, Mr. Percival—God bless you!—and don't talk nonsense," said the wounded man. "What have you to do with my hurt? Shure, it's all due to me own awkwardness. Take me advice, sur, and lave me here. The Lord 'll send me some help in wan way or another. It's gettin' darker and darker it is, an' if you don't make yer way home at wanst, ye'll not this night be able to git there."

"I'll never desert you," responded the lad; "I'll die first;" but then he thought the next moment that it would be perhaps advisable to leave his companion for a while, descend the hill they were on, see if some cottage could be discovered in the hollow, summon help, and return as soon as possible to Mehaffy.

Making known his thought, he did not wait for any reply from the moaning man, but hurried off in the direction he deemed most promising for help.

PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE hastened on over scrub, stones, and fence, and choosing also, when he could, mountain sheep-paths and shallow gullies. After some peril and toil in the darkness he reached the level ground; it was one wide expanse of bog. He found, after some search, what seemed a cart-track across it, and hoping it would lead to some dwelling, he hurried along it.

After a considerable time the wheel-ruts came to an end, and a trackless bog region spread out before him. The trackway had been made by carts conveying turf from the centre of the bog, and the starting-point was where the bewildered lad now stood, trying to pierce with his eyes the onward darkness.

It struck him that some distance on he could perceive, between him and the horizon, a structure. The object was very indistinct in the gloom, but it might turn out to be an inhabited cabin, so he determined to make his way to it. To do this he had to cross many cuttings in the morass, several of them wide and deep, and into one of them he heavily plunged. In his leap to clear the cutting he hardly gained the opposite side with half his foot, the soft bank of peat gave under his weight, and before he could secure his position he sank backward into a hole full of bog-slush. Blinded and almost suffocated he struggled out; but the thick and dark-colored fluid had covered him, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, so that to his nearest friends he would have been unrecognizable. His fowling-piece, too, had fallen from his hand, and he felt it would be useless to attempt to recover it. He had scrambled out, however, on the right side of the cutting to reach his destination.

There it was, and not far off, and now that it was nearer, he felt more assured that the object which in the gloom had caught his eye was, in truth, a cabin. Hence, with uplifted hope, he made for it. Alas! when, wet and weary, he reached it, it proved to be only a turf-pile, which had been erected on the moor by its owner, to remain there until a convenient time should come for conveying it to the homestead.

He felt utterly wretched and discomfited, and becoming a little faint, he leaned for support against the turf-pile which had so cruelly deceived him. "What am I to do now?" he asked himself. "Instead of obtaining succor for my poor friend Jimmy, I am this moment in almost as bad a plight as he is, and my case is wellnigh desperate; I cannot remain here all night, and yet to regain firm ground will be, I fear, impracticable." In extremity, human hearts ever turn to supplicate Divine aid—even the hearts of wicked men do; much more, then, did the heart of Percival Montaigne, who had been taught to pray by a pious mother, look up, from the desolation and darkness around him, to his Father in heaven for strength and guidance.

While thus praying and waiting to recover strength for another onset, he thought he heard, amid the silent gloom, and very faint from distance, a sound as of singing. Yes, he was right; there was singing in the direction towards which his ear had been turned, and it came from a band of men singing in chorus.

A Ribbon lodge was holding a meeting that night on the bog, and in a very singular place of assembly. Had you seen it by day, you would have taken it for an immense peat-stack. It was that, and something more, which fact only very careful scrutiny, however, would have detected. Turf, as is well known, is cut from the bog, by a spade formed for the purpose, in pieces about the size and shape of a brickbat. The builders of the stack before us had not piled up the sods of turf solid, but in rectangular walls, about four feet in thickness. When the walls had been raised from the ground six feet or so, the sods of turf were deftly placed, layer after layer, a little inwards, until at last they met in the centre and formed an arch. Upon this more turf was piled, and the heap at last was covered with sward cuttings and heather. It thus became a snug and weather-proof "hall" of assembly, and standing far within the bog and away from any beaten track, and besides having no windows, since none were needed for night assemblies, it was a safe and convenient place for the "boys" to meet in without much danger of police intrusion.

On the present night there was a large and important gathering. Two or three offending landlords had to be tried and men to be chosen—not to assassinate them—such a word has never been uttered in a Ribbon lodge—but rather "to put them off the walk" or "out of the way," which phrases sound far more euphonious.

This business, with little discussion, settled—foregone conclusions never require much—arrangement was made for some "divarshin." Potheen whiskey and boiling water, heated on a fire near, but in a hollow to hide any flame, were at hand, and glasses of "punch" for each soon stood ranged upon a table of loose boards before the "brethren." One of them, Mickey Haley, was known to have a good voice, and he was asked for a song. Proud of his gift, he did not need much pressing, and the well-known "Shan Van Voght" was the melody he treated them to. Before he began, however, one man suggested that it might not be safe to sing "They say walls have ears," he said, "and perhaps to raise the voice would be dangerous." "Tut, you fool!" cried the President; "aren't there sintenels outside? and beside, sorra a wall, at all, at all, is there hereabouts to hear me, man—nothin' but turf. Who's afeard, in this lonesome place, of any one wan hearin' but oursels? Fire away, Mick, jewel, and without delay let us have the music."

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the American public and readers of his sermons. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

DR. TALMAGE says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Veto of the Army Bill was sent to the House on Tuesday, April 29th. He objects to the bill in the first place on account of the objectionable character of the legislation proposed in the sixth section, which prohibits the use of troops at the polls, which legislation he declares unnecessary and uncalled for at this time; secondly, because the section will have the effect of preventing the use of force by the civil officers of the law at elections to keep the peace or enforce the laws, thus forbidding the enforcement of a law which is still allowed to remain on the statute-book. Further, he objects to placing extraneous matter on appropriation bills.

The House appointed Thursday, May 1st, to take the veto into consideration, but on that day there was no discussion of it, the previous question was moved, and the bill received 120 votes to 110 in the negative; a strictly party vote, insufficient to carry it over the veto.

Conversation with leading Democrats led to an opinion gaining ground at Washington, that the Army Bill will be cleared of extraneous legislative matter, and passed before the adjournment takes place.

The Ten-Dollar Government Certificates are in great demand by all classes of investors. The number of applicants at the New York Post Office for these securities increases daily. On May 3d the sales amounted to $209,000 making a total of $1,124,590 in New York since they were first issued to the public on April 12th. The bulk of the purchasers are of the working class, who are obviously disinclined to let so good an opportunity slip of obtaining fair interest and absolute Government security for their savings. The low denomination of ten dollars brings them within the reach of the masses, and the eagerness with which they are sought is another proof of Secretary Sherman's sagacity. Sales commenced May 5th at Brooklyn, N. Y,. and Boston, Mass.

The Civil Damage Law for Massachusetts has passed both branches of the Legislature, and as the Governor is known to sympathize with its principles it will probably be enacted. It provides that any person suffering injury throug the intoxication of any person, may sue for damages against not only the person intoxicated but against the dealer who supplied him with liquor and the owner of the premises in which the liquor was sold.

The Best Solution of the Chinese Problem is indicated by the following announcement in a New York journal: "On Sunday afternoon next a Chinese mission and school will be opened at No. 14 Mott Street. It will be in charge of Moy-Jin-Kee, a Christian Chinaman. Over 1,000 Chinese live in Mott street, and the mission is established there as a central point."

Mr. J. W. Powell stated recently in a Chicago newspaper that the Chinese emigrants to this country have come under the influence of Christianity to an extent not generally known. Of Chinamen members of Christian churches in California the Presbyterian Mission reports 160; the United Presbyterian Mission, 20; the Methodist Mission 78, with 10 probationers; the Congregational Association of Christian Chinese, 164, and 30 others ready to unite with the Church—making a total of 462. In addition to this, night and Sunday-schools gather for Christian instruction from three to four thousand, the majority of whom are led to renounce idolatry.

A Cordial Welcome of a European Guest was accorded May 1st, at Brooklyn, to Mr. Charles Fermaud, of Geneva, Switzerland, President of the late convention of the Young Men's Christian Association of all lands, held in Geneva last August. Mr. Fermaud is now visiting this country for the purpose of studying the workings of the association here. He is a young man of prepossessing personal appearance and engaging manner, who, since the convention of last August, has given up his business of banking to devote his whole attention to forwarding the interests of the association on the Continent of Europe. The reception of last evening was attended by 100 gentlemen prominently interested in the work to which Mr. Fermaud has devoted himself.

Mr. Fermaud's address showed him to be thoroughly interested in and conversant with the work he has undertaken. He said that of the 2400 Young Men's Christian Associations in the world nearly two thirds are in this country, and that in the management of the associations they in the Old World had much to learn on this side of the ocean. He alluded to the difficulties against which the associations had to contend in Roman Catholic countries, and of the great benefits to be derived by associations in all parts of the world from the International Association.

Chief Moses, with his Nephew, one or two of his band, and an interpreter, who are now on a visit to Washington, attended the Calvary Baptist Sunday-school and Church at Washington last Sunday morning. In the Sunday-school the chief made an excellent speech, through the interpreter, expressing pleasure at the sight of so many boys and girls and men and women studying the good book, which, he believed, taught the right way of living. He said that the most earnest wish of his heart was to see all his people becoming civilized, and cultivating the arts of peace and husbandry, and becoming Christian people.

Timely Aid in Answer to Persevering Prayer.—The following letter received at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, April 30th, tells its own tale:

"I desire to be one to return and give thanks for a most tangible answer to a special prayer, entered here almost constantly in secret for the past three years. I have realized how deeply God tries our faith, but never forgets our petitions if they are asked in faith, believing, and are according to His will. I have had the care of and supported entirely for the past four years two forsaken children, under a flood of discouragements, but constantly asking help of God. In over three years I have never received a dollar toward their support, even a promise, and had not the least reason to think I ever should. But Saturday, while under great pecuniary pressure, I was on my way in the street to collect some small bills. I met a person I had not seen in over three years, who, without any explanation, stepped into a bank, without saying any thing about what he intended doing, and drew $300 and presented it to me, stating it was for this work to help me in supporting these children. Did this little help come by chance? No, no! Our Heavenly Father sent it."

An Escaped Prisoner Returned to Jail for conscience sake recently at Valparaiso, Indiana. During the revival there several ladies assisted by their pastor held daily religious services at the jail, for the seven prisoners confined there for the crimes of grand larceny, seduction, robbery, and murder. After some time four of the seven professed conversion. A few days later the other three broke jail and escaped, opening the way for all to go out. One of the four converts, conscious that the penitentiary was his doom and seeing his opportunity fell into the temptation, and "made way for liberty" at the top of his speed. When he had made a couple of miles, conscience "made way" for principle: he sat down to rest and reconsider the matter, and arose and returned to his cell! The three who refused to escape, when they could have done so by simply walking through the open door, were as glad to see him back as they were sorry at his leaving. Singularly enough, the Scripture lesson at the jail service the day before the escape was Acts 16: 16 to 34.

Mr. Moody Contemplates Commencing a Series of Revival Services at New Haven shortly. The prayers of all readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD are desired that the Holy Spirit may abundantly bless His labors as He has done at Baltimore.

A Jaguar at Large.—The "Philadelphia 'imes" of May 2d reports that as a train conveyng a menagerie passed Washington, Pennsylana, the previous night, a full-sized Brazilian aguar, a beast more ravenous and ferocious han a tiger, escaped from his cage on a flat car nd bounded into the woods. The train had topped to permit another train to pass, and a ramp, who had secreted himself on the car, pened the cage, allowing the animal its liberty. About twenty of his fellow-tramps had been preiously ejected from the train, and it is supposed e committed the act for spite. One of the cirus hands saw him open the cage, but supposed e was one of the regular attendants. When the nimal escaped, the tramp jumped from the rain. The jaguar was a powerful animal, and ost $1500 two years ago. He was about five eet long, and naturally one of the most feroious beasts in the menagerie. Early this mornng the mangled remains of a man were found ear the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, fifeen miles east of this place. It has not been asertained yet whether this is the first victim of he jaguar or not. The people are much exited, and have been warned to take all precauons against an attack.

This savage beast will probably soon be detroyed and the minds of the people relieved of his fear; but there is an enemy "who goeth bout like a roaring lion," whose assaults are far nore deadly and who is continually carrying off is prey from our midst.

A Great Author's Penury.—The extreme povrty in which the authors of some of our most alued works have lived and written has often een the subject of remark. It is not generally nown that Jonathan Edwards, of world-wide ame, was one who suffered from this curse. ismissed from his church in Northampton, ver which he had been pastor for over a quarer of a century, he removed to Stockbridge to abor among the Indians. He was obliged to upport his family on a mere pittance. In this ecluded place he wrote his treatise on the Freedom of the Will," which is regarded as a asterpiece in theological literature. So great as his poverty at that time, that the treatise as written largely on the backs of letters and e blank pages of pamphlets, as paper was beond his means to purchase. His daughters, ho were all women of superior mental powers, orked hard that they might add something to e family resources.

The American Missionary Association has ecided to accept Mr. Arthington's proposition, ccompanied with an offer of $15,000, to occupy district in Central Africa. It is in a region acessible by the Nile, and steamers can be used n the Nile and its tributaries so as to facilitate ommunications. The Association believes the pening to be a providential one, and it calls for contribution of $35,000, which, added to the onation of Mr. Arthington, would make $50,00 to start the mission with. A force of about n missionaries would be required.

Palestine Mortgaged to the Jews.—The South erman Evangelische-Protestantische Wochenatt states that the Holy Land has fallen out of e hands of the Turk into the hands of the ew. It says that the great banking house of e Rothschilds has lent Turkey the sum of two ousand million francs, and has received in reurn a deed of mortgage upon the entire land of alestine. It observes further that, as it is quite npossible for a bankrupt and declining state ke Turkey to pay back the money, the Israeles may now count upon their return to the nd of promise as a clear certainty.

Human Sacrifices are still Offered in the iger country in Africa. The Rev. J. Buck retes that a few weeks ago a leading man at lenso died, and an attendant had to be providd to accompany him into the world of sprits. slave was bought and bound in chains. A pe was brought to him, which he smoked, a ew cloth was exchanged for his rags, and, while e was having his last smoke, the daughter of e deceased chief stood before him, and began to eulogize her deceased father, telling of his former greatness and achievements before all the people. The address was directed to the victim, as if to the deceased father, in order that he should be well informed to repeat the same to the inhabitants of the world of spirits. The Rev. J. Buck, with some Sierra Leone friends in the factories, hastened to the spot, and used all arguments, entreaties, and pleadings possible in behalf of the release of the man, but failed. Bullocks were offered in place; these they flatly refused; and while they stood begging, the corpse was brought and laid on the poor slave, who was laid on his back at the bottom of the grave, and an order given that he should embrace it, which was obeyed. The grave was then filled up, and thus a man was buried alive as a sacrifice to the dead. At Osamare, not long ago, one of the kings died; and nine men and women were buried alive with him. At Onitsha, twenty miles off, the king is generally intoxicated soon after breakfast.

A Young Mother says: "My Heart is almost heavy that my little babe does not know how very much I love her. I fear I am impatient for her to know and love me. But God is teaching me, by my love to her, so helpless, dependent, and unresponsive, how He loves me.

At a Deaf and Dumb Asylum a Visitor was particularly struck with the comeliness and intelligence of one of the young inmates. He asked him many questions, which were promptly and correctly answered. At length he ventured upon a most delicate inquiry: "Why did God make you deaf and dumb and make me to hear and speak?" The boy took the chalk and wrote, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight." Asylums in which such truths are taught are the supreme ornaments of any nation.

A Good Bargain All Round.—A certain farmer hired a young man to work for him a year, for a stipulated sum. When the bargain was made the farmer asked him "how much he would take over and above not to drink any whiskey during the year?" The young man hesitated a little, and before he could give an answer the farmer asked him "if a sheep would be enough?" "Yes," the young man said. There were three sons of the farmer present and heard the bargain. Said the oldest to his father: "Father, will you give me a sheep if I drink no whiskey for a year?" "Yes," said the father. The second and third sons put the same question to their father, and received the same answer. And now, when the bargain was made all round, the youngest son, quite a little fellow, stepped up to his father, with an earnest and wishful look, and said to him: "Father, you had better take a sheep too."

Education no Safeguard against Drink.—We are sometimes told that education is the sovereign panacea for intemperance. Yet from week to week there are testimonies rising up to belie this fond expectation. An inquest was lately held on a man named Dunn, who was brought to a premature death by his drinking habits. This man could speak with fluency five languages. He had held several offices, as cashier and accountant, in large companies. He was on the literary staff of the Daily Telegraph, sent out to the Servian war. Some time ago he came to be possessed of 300*l*. ($1458), and at once he gave free course to his habits of dissipation, which have now resulted in his being taken to the London Hospital, with his teeth knocked out, his clothes almost entirely gone, and not a penny left in his pocket, and there he died.

The Portrait of Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with a sketch of his life, will appear (D. V.) in the next number of this journal. He preached with great success at the Tabernacle in London occasionally during his father's illness, and his sermons were remarkable for the same earnestness, simplicity, and power which distinguish those of his father.

THE PHILOSOPHY AND PROPRIETY OF ABUNDANT PRAISE.

A Sermon Delivered on Easter Morning, after his Return to England, by C. H. Spurgeon.

"They shall abundantly utter the memory of Thy great goodness, and shall sing of Thy righteousness."—PSALM 145 : 7.

The Great Object in View—To Secure the Abundant Proclamation of God's Praise—I. The Methods—1. Careful Observation—2. Diligent Memory—The Memory may be Strengthened—By the Documents—By the Memorials—By Personal Experience—By Association and Classification—3. Utterance—4. Song—II. The Motives —1. We Cannot Help It—2. Others Try to Drown It—3. It Confers a Benefit—4. God is Glorified thereby.

THIS is called "David's Psalm of Praise," and you will see that all through it he is inflamed by a strong desire that God may be greatly magnified. Hence he uses a variety of expressions, and repeats himself in his holy vehemence. Run your eye down the psalm and notice such words as these: "I will extol Thee"; "I will bless Thy name"; "Every day will I bless Thee"; "I will praise Thy name forever and ever"; "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised"; "One generation shall praise Thy works to another"; "I will speak of the glorious honor of Thy majesty"; "Men shall speak of the might of Thy terrible acts," and other words of like import, down to the last verse: "My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord: and let all flesh bless His holy name forever and ever."

David is not content with declaring that Jehovah is worthy of praise, or with pleading that His praise ought to be felt in the heart, but he will have it publicly spoken of, openly declared, plainly uttered, and joyfully proclaimed in song. The inspired Psalmist, moved by the Holy Ghost, calls upon all flesh, yea, and upon all the works of God to sound forth the praises of the Most High. Will we not heartily respond to the call?

In following out his design of praise, David had spoken in verse five of the majesty of God, the glorious King. His eye seems to be dazzled by the glorious splendor of the august throne, and he cries, "I will speak of the glorious honor of Thy majesty." Then he bethinks himself of the power of that throne of majesty and of the force with which its just decrees are carried out, and so in verse six he exclaims, "Men shall speak of the might of Thy terrible acts, and I will declare Thy greatness." Here he speaks in brief both as to the majesty and the might of the dread Supreme; but when he turns his thoughts to the divine goodness he enlarges and uses words which indicate the stress which he lays upon his subject, and his desire to linger over it. "They shall abundantly utter," saith our text, "the memory of Thy great goodness."

Now, our desire this morning is that we also may praise and magnify the name of the infinite Jehovah without bound or stint, and may especially have our hearts enlarged and our mouths opened wide to speak abundantly of His great goodness. O that in the whole of this congregation the text may become true—"They shall abundantly utter the memory of Thy great goodness"; and having uttered it in plain speech may we all rise a stage higher, and with gladsome music sing of His righteousness.

You see our object, an object in which I trust you all sympathize. Come one and all, and praise the Lord. Is the invitation too wide? Observe the ninth verse: "The Lord is good to all: and His tender mercies are over all His works. All Thy works shall praise Thee." I will not limit the invitation of the Lord; since you all drink of the river of His bounty, render to Him all of you such praises as you can.

But there is a special invitation to His saints. Come ye and bless His name with spiritual, inward, enlightened praise. "Bless the Lord, O house of Israel. Ye that fear the Lord, bless the Lord." In your heart of hearts extol, adore, and make Him great, for it is written—"Thy saints shall bless Thee." Verily this shall not be written in vain, for our souls shall bless the Lord this day as the Holy Ghost shall move within us.

We shall speak upon two things that we may promote the object we have in view. The first is, the method of securing the abundant utterance of God's praise as to His goodness; and, secondly, the motives for desiring to secure this abundant utterance.

I.—THE METHOD

Of securing the abundant utterance of the divine praise concerning his goodness. Our text gives us the mental philosophy of abounding praise, and shows us the plan by which such praise may be secured. The steps are such as the best mental philosophy approves.

First, we shall be helped to abundant praise by careful observation. Notice the text—"They shall abundantly utter the memory of Thy great goodness." Now, in order to memory there must first of all be

OBSERVATION.

A man does not remember what he never knew; this is clear to all, and therefore the point is virtually implied in the text. In proportion as a fact or a truth makes an impression upon the mind, in that proportion is it likely to abide in the memory.

If you hear a sermon, that which you remember afterwards is the point which most forcibly strikes you while you are listening to the discourse. At the time you say, "I will jot that down, for I should not like to forget it, for it comes so closely home to me;" and whether you use your pencil or not, memory obeys your wish and makes a record upon her tablets.

It is so with the dealings of God towards us. If we want to remember His goodness we must let it strike us; we must notice it, consider it, meditate upon it, estimate it, and allow it to exert its due influence upon our hearts; and then we shall not need to say that "we must try and remember," for we shall remember as a matter of course. The impression being clearly and deeply made will not easily fade away, but we shall see it after many days. The first thing, therefore, towards the plentiful praising of God is a careful observation of His goodness.

Now, see what it is that we are to observe—it is God's goodness. Too many are blind to that blessed object. They receive the bounties of providence, but they do not see the hand of God in them. They are fed by His liberality and guided by His care, but they attribute all that they receive to themselves, or to secondary agents. God is not in all their thoughts, and consequently His goodness is not considered. They have no memory of His goodness because they have no observation of it.

Some, indeed, instead of observing the goodness of God, complain of His unkindness to them, and imagine that He is needlessly severe. Like the unprofitable servant in the parable, they say, "I knew thee, that thou art an austere man." Others sit in judgment upon His ways, as we find them recorded in Holy Scripture, and dare to condemn the Judge of all the earth. Denying the goodness of Jehovah, they attempt to set up another God than the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who for this enlightened nineteenth century is a God much too sternly just. In this house, however, we worship Jah, Jehovah the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and none other than He.

In many a place of worship at this day they adore new gods, newly come up, which our fathers knew not; not like unto the God of the Old Testament, who in the opinion of modern philosophers is as much out of date as Jupiter himself. This day we say with David, "This God is our God forever and ever." "O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before Jehovah our Maker. For He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand."

As we find the Lord revealed both in the Old and the New Testament, making no division in the revelation, but regarding it as one grand whole, we behold abundant goodness in Him. Mingled with that awful justice which we would not wish to deny, we see surpassing grace, and we delight that God is love. He is gracious and full of compassion; slow to anger, and of great mercy. We have no complaints to make against Him, we wish to make no alteration in His dealings or in His character; He is our exceeding joy; our whole heart rejoices in the contemplation of Him. "Who is like unto Thee, O God? Among the gods who is like unto Thee?"

We are then to consider, what many will not so much as believe, that there is great goodness in Jehovah, the God of creation, providence, and redemption; the God of Paradise, of Sinai, and of Calvary. We are thoroughly to acquaint ourselves with Him as He has made Himself known, and we are continually to consider His great goodness, that we may retain the memory of it.

2. I have said that the text contains the philosophy of great praise, and we see this in the second stage of the process, namely,

DILIGENT MEMORY.

That which has made an impression upon the mind by observation is fastened upon the memory. Memory seems to lie in two things—first in retaining an impression, and then in recollecting it at a future time. I suppose that, more or less, every thing that happens to us is retained in the mind, but it is not easy to reproduce the fainter impressions when you wish to do so.

I know in my own mind a great many things that I am sure I remember, but yet I cannot always recollect them immediately. Give me a quarter of an hour to run through a certain arrangement of ideas, and I shall say, "Oh, yes, I have it. It was in my mind, but I could not recall it at the time." Memory collects facts and afterwards *re*collects them. The matters before us are recorded by memory, but the tablet may be mislaid: the perfection of memory is to preserve the tablet in a well-known place, from which you can fetch it forth at the moment.

I have dwelt rather long upon observation, with the view that you may begin aright from the beginning, and, by getting vivid impressions, may be the better able to retain and to recall them. We cannot utter what we have forgotten; hence the use of close observation to make a strong memory touching the Lord's great goodness.

How are we to strengthen our memory as to God's goodness? First, we should be well acquainted with the documents in which His goodness is recorded. A man may be said to keep in memory a fact which did not happen in his own time, but hundreds of years before he was born: he remembers it because he has seen the document in which the fact is recorded. In a certain sense this is within the range of memory; it is within the memory of man, the united memory of the race. Beloved, be familiar with the Word of God. Store your memory with the ancient records of His great goodness: drink in the whole narrative of the evangelists, and despise not Moses and the prophets; let them be as it were at your fingers' ends because they are in your heart's core, and then you will be sure abundantly to utter the memory of His goodness, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Next, if you would strengthen your memory, right diligently observe the memorials. There are two in the Christian Church. There is the memorial of your Saviour's death, burial, and resurrection which is set forth in believers' baptism, wherein we are buried and risen with the Lord Christ. And as for the Holy Supper, never neglect it, but be often at the table, where again you set forth His death till He come. He has bidden you do this in remembrance of Him; cherish devoutly the precious memorial.

Great events in nations have been preserved upon the memory of future generations by some ordained ceremonial, and the Lord's Supper is of that kind: therefore observe ye well the table of the Lord, that ye forget not His great goodness. See how the Jews kept their Exodus in mind by means of the Paschal Lamb; how they ate it after the sprinkling of the blood; how they talked to their children and told them of the deliverance from Egypt, abundantly uttering the memory of God's goodness, and then after supper they sang a hymn, even as our text bids us sing of the righteousness of God. Strengthen your memories, then, by reverent attention to the historical documents and the memorial ordinances.

Still, the most important is the memory of what has happened to yourself, your own personal experience. I will not give a penny for your religion unless it has taken effect upon yourself. The power of prayer! What of that? Did you ever receive an answer to prayer? Did you ever wrestle with the angel and come out victorious? What do you know about prayer if you never did? You are very orthodox. Yes, but unless the doctrines of grace have brought to your soul the grace of the doctrines, and you have tasted and handled them what do you know about them? Nothing certainly to remember.

I have heard that the science of mnemonics or the strengthening of the memory, for which have not a very high esteem, lies in the followin of certain methods. According to some, yo link one idea with another; you recollect a dat by associating it with something that you ca see. Practise this method in the present cas Remember God's goodness by the objects aroun you which are associated with it. For instanc let your bed remind you of God's mercy in th night watches, and your table of His goodness supplying your daily needs. My garment when I put them on this morning, reminded m of times when my hand was unequal even that simple task.

All around us there are memoranda of Go love if we choose to read them. The memory some deed of divine goodness may be connect with every piece of furniture in your roo There is the old arm-chair where you wrestl with God in great trouble, and received a gra ous answer; you cannot forget it; you do n pray so well any where else as you do there; y have become attached to that particular ch That thumbed Bible—that particular one mean: it is getting rather worn now, and marked a good deal; but, nevertheless, out that very copy the promises have gleamed fo like the stars in heaven, and therefore it he your memory to use it.

I remember a poor man giving me wha thought great praise. I visited him in the pital, and he said, "Ah, you seem to have h this room round with your texts, for every th reminds me of what I have heard you say, an I lie here I recollect your stories and your ings." In much the same way we should re lect what God has done for us, by looking a the various places, circumstances, times, persons which were the surroundings of mercy. O for a clear remembrance of the g ness of God.

Memory is sometimes helped by classifica You send a servant to a shop for a variety ticles: she will forget some of them unless so arrange the order that one suggests ano Take care, then, to set God's mercies in ord fore you, and reckon them up in number, i can, and so fix them in your memory.

At other times when persons have very memories, they like to figure down on a paper that which it is important to remen I have often done so, and have placed the where I have never found it again. A t around the finger, or a knot in a handker and many other devices have been tried. not mind what it is, so long as you try and lect God's mercy to you by some mea other.

Do make some record of His goodness know the day in which you lost that mon you not? "Yes, very well." You recolle day of the month of Black Friday, or Monday, up in the City; you have evil da elibly noted in the black pocket-book of memo- r: do you remember as well the days of God's ecial loving-kindness to you? You should do o. Take pains to make notes of notable benefits, nd to mark remarkable blessings, so shall you n future days utter the memory of God's great oodness.

3. The first two processes for securing abunnt praise are observation and remembrance. he next is utterance :

"THEY SHALL ABUNDANTLY UTTER."

The word contains the idea of boiling or bubing up like a fountain. It signifies a holy fluncy about the mercy of God. We have quite nough fluent people about, but they are many f them idlers for whom Satan finds abundant ork to do. The Lord deliver us from the noise f fluent women: but it matters not how fluent en and women are if they will be fluent on the pic now before us.

Open your mouths; let the praise pour forth; t it come, rivers of it. Stream a way! Gush way, all that you possibly can. "They shall bundantly utter the memory of Thy great goodess."

Do not stop the joyful speakers, let them go n for ever. They do not exaggerate, they canot. You say they are enthusiastic, but they re not half up to the pitch yet; bid them beome more excited and speak yet more fervently. o on, brother, go on; pile it up: say someing greater, grander, and more fiery still! ou cannot exceed the truth. You have come a theme where your most fluent powers will il in utterance. The text calls for a sacred fluncy, and I would exhort you liberally to exerise it when you are speaking of the goodness of od.

You cannot praise abundantly unless your emory supplies materials, and on the other and your memory will lose strength unless you tter what you know. When you went to school nd had a lesson to learn you found out that by eading your lesson aloud you learned it more uickly, for your ear assisted your eye. Utterng the divine goodness is a great help to the emory of it. By teaching we learn; by giving he truth expression we deepen its impression pon our minds.

4. Now I come to the last part of this admirble process. When we have abundantly utered, then we are to sing. In the old Greek myhology Mnemosyne, the goddess of memory, is he mother of the Muses, and surely where there s a good memory of God's loving-kindness the eart will soon produce a song.

But what is surprising in the text is that when he joy is described as mounting from plain uterance to song it takes another theme—"Sing f Thy righteousness." When the heart is most doring, and selects the grandest theme for revrent song, it chooses the meeting of goodness nd righteousness as its topic. How sweet is that anticle—"Mercy and truth are met together, nd righteousness and peace have kissed each ther."

The atonement is the gem of the heart's oetry. Do not your hearts burn within you at he very mention of the glorious deed of Jesus ur great Substitute? Parnassus is outdone y Calvary; the Castalian spring is dried and esus' wounded side has opened another fount f song.

The goodness of the Lord to us in all the blessngs of his providence we gladly chant, but when we tell of the grace which led our Lord esus to bleed and die, "the just for the unjust, o bring us to God," our music leaps to nobler eights. Incomparable wisdom ordained a way n which God should be righteous to the sternness of severity, and yet should be good, illimtably good, to those that put their trust in him; ift up then your music till the golden harps hall find themselves outdone.

Thus, then, we have explained the method of ecuring an abundant utterance, may the Holy Spirit help us to carry it out.

II. In the second place, we shall very briefly ote THE MOTIVES FOR THIS ABUNDANT UTTERANCE.

These lie very near to hand. The first is, because we cannot help it. The goodness of God demands that we should speak of it. If the Lord Jesus Himself should charge His people to be silent as to His goodness they would scarcely be able to obey the command. They would, like the man that was healed, blaze abroad the mighty work that he had done. But, bless His name, He has not told us to be quiet; He allows us to utter abundantly the memory of His great goodness. The stones of the street would cry out as we went along if we did not speak of His love.

Some of you, good people, seldom speak of the goodness of God; how is this? I wonder you can be so coldly quiet. "Oh," said one in his first love, "I must speak or I shall burst;" and we have sometimes felt the same, when the restrained testimony was as fire within our bones.

Is it not a sacred instinct to tell out what we feel within? The news is too good to keep. Indulge to the full the holy propensity of your renewed nature. Your soul says, "Speak," and if etiquette says, "Hush, they will think you a fanatic," regard it not, but speak aloud, and let them think you a fanatic if they please. Sir, play the organ very softly when the subject is your own praise; but when you come to the praises of God, pull out all the stops; thunders of music are all too little for His infinite deservings.

2. Another motive for abundantly uttering the praises of God is that other voices are clamorous to drown it. What a noisy world this is, with its conflicting and discordant cries. "Lo here," cries one; "Lo there," shouts another. This uproar would drown the notes of God's praise unless His people uttered it again and yet again. The more there is said against our God the more should we speak for Him.

Whenever you hear a man curse, it would be wise to say aloud, "Bless the Lord." Say it seven times for every time he curses, and make him hear it. Perhaps he will want to know what you are at, and you will then have an opportunity of asking what he is at, and he will have more difficulty in explaining himself than you will in explaining yourself. I say, unless you give forth abundant utterance, God's praise will be buried under heaps of error, blasphemy, ribaldry, nonsense, and idle talk. Abundantly utter it, so that some of it, at least, may be heard.

3. Praise the Lord abundantly because it will benefit you to do so. How bright the past looks when we begin to praise God for it. We say, "I am the man that hath seen affliction," and we are to fill the cup of memory with gall and wormwood, but when we see the goodness of God in it all, we turn the kerchief with which we wiped our tears into a flag of victory, and with holy praise, in the name of our God, we wave the banneret.

As for the present, if you think of God's mercies, how different it seems. A man comes to his dinner-table, and does not enjoy what is there, because he misses an expected dainty; but if he were as poor as some people he would not turn his nose up, but would bless the goodness which has given him so much more than he deserves. Some I know even among Christians are growlers in general, always finding fault. The best things in the world are not good enough for them. Ah, my brother, abundantly utter the memory of God's goodness and you will find nothing to grumble at, nothing to complain about, but every thing to rejoice in.

Again, I think we ought to do this because of the good it does to other people. If you abundantly talk of God's goodness you are sure to benefit your neighbors. Many are comforted when they hear of God's goodness to their friends.

Draw a long face, and lament the trials of the way; sit down with sombre brethren, and enjoy a little comfortable misery, and see whether crowds will ask to share your vinegar-cruet.

> "While here our various wants we mourn, > United groans ascend on high," says Dr. Watts, and I am afraid he speaks the truth, but very few will be led in this way to resolve—"We will go with these people, for we perceive that God is with them." Is it good reasoning if men say, "These people are so miserable that they must be on the way to heaven?" We may hope they are, for they evidently want some better place to live in; but then it may be questioned if such folks would not be wretched even in heaven.

We have glorious reasons for being happy; let us be so, and soon we shall hear persons asking, "What is this? Is this religion? I always thought religious people felt bound to be down in the dumps, and to go mourning and sighing all their days." When they see your joy they will be tempted to come to Christ. There is a blessed seductiveness in a holy, happy life. Praise then His name; praise His name evermore; abundantly utter the memory of His great goodness, and you will bring many to Christ.

Such happy utterance will help also to comfort your own Christian friends and fellow-sufferers. There is a deal of misery in the world—just now more than usual. Many are sorrowing from various causes; therefore, my dear friends, be happier than ever you were.

That venerable man of God, now in heaven, our dear old father Dransfield, when it was a very foggy morning in November, used always to come into the vestry before the sermon and say, "It is a dreary morning, dear pastor; we must rejoice in the Lord more than usual. Things around us are dark, but within and above all is bright."

What if it is bad weather? Bless the Lord that it is not worse than it is. We are not altogether in Egyptian darkness: the sun does shine now and then, and we are sure it is not blown out. So, when we are sick and ill, let us thank God that we shall not be ill forever, for there is a place where the inhabitants are no more sick.

And now to-day, if your harps have been hanging on the willows, take them down: if you have not praised the Lord as you should, begin to do so. Wash your mouths and get rid of the sour flavor of murmuring about bad trade and bad weather. Sweeten your lips with the pleasant confection of praise.

I will tell you this, brethren, if any of you shall confess to me that you have sinned by going too far in blessing God, I will for once become a priest, and give you absolution. I never tried my hand at that business before, but I think I can manage so much. Praise God extravagantly if you can. Try it. I wish you would say within yourself, "I will go beyond all bounds in this matter;" for there are no bounds to the deservings of an ever-blessed God.

4. Lastly, let us praise and bless God because it is the way in which He is glorified. We cannot add to his glory, for it is infinite in itself; but we can make it to be more widely known by simply stating the truth about him. Do you not want to give honor to God? Would you not lay down your life that the whole earth might be filled with His glory? Well, if you cannot cover the earth with His praise as the waters cover the sea, you can at least contribute your portion to the flood.

Oh, keep not back your praises, but bless and magnify His name from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. It will lift earth upward and heavenward if we can all unite in praise: we shall see it rising as it were beneath our feet, and ourselves rising with it, until we shall stand as upon the top of some loftiest Alp that has pierced the vault of heaven, and we shall be among the angels, feeling as they feel, doing as they do, and losing ourselves as they lose themselves in the eternal hallelujah of "Glory, and honor, and majesty, and power, and dominion, and might, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

THE NATURE OF THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

When the First Resurrection has taken place and the destruction of Antichrist has been completed, we may inquire in what form and character shall the Kingdom of Christ be revealed to the world during the Millennial period, or how will it differ from all that went before or that shall follow?

The nature of the Millennial Kingdom appears to be this: 1st.—The Lord shall reign directly over the whole earth. 2ndly.—The saints shall reign with and under Him. 3rdly.—Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, and Israel restored. 4thly.—The whole world shall become converted. 5thly.—The earth shall become more fruitful, and the seasons shall be altered. 6thly.—The saints who share in the First Resurrection shall not live upon the earth, but in the Heavenly City.

The Heavenly City will be suspended over the earth during the Millennial reign, and probably over the earthly Jerusalem, and will be a visible object throughout all the land of Israel. This supposition solves a difficulty which must occur with regard to the Millennial climate. We all imagine that some great improvement must take place in the climate, productions, and fertility of the earth, during the reign of Christ, and all the prophecies seem to concur in foretelling this improvement. But the question is, by what miracle shall this change be produced?

We reply, that the Heavenly City will become a source of light, and heat, and fertility to all the world, being 1500 miles square measurement, being filled and lit up by the glory of God (Rev. 21), and being suspended not far from the surface of the earth, it will fulfil the office of an additional sun, especially throughout the land of Israel, and will thus produce that physical renovation of the earth which the prophets have foretold as the effect of the reign of Christ. (See Isaiah 35.)

But this City is described in such peculiar language that it seems impossible to understand by it any thing but a literal place of residence, a really existing structure, whether it be a City or otherwise, and a place whose materials will be the most magnificent and costly that imagination can conceive—a place filled with the glory of God, inhabited by resurrection saints, and containing within its walls the throne of the Lord Jesus Christ, as King of Israel and of the world.

Around the palace of the King of kings will be seen the palaces of all His saints, each of whom will be himself a king and a priest unto God, having "washed his robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and He that sitteth upon the throne shall dwell among them: they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light upon them, nor any heat, for the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Nor is this the whole: for along with the presence of God, and the possession of more than royal magnificence, they shall possess irresistible power—they shall reign with Christ over the nations of the earth, and shall rule the ungodly with a rod of iron. The empire of Satan shall be broken—the reign of radicalism shall be swept away—the boastings of infidel science shall be silenced in darkness, and all power, knowledge, dignity, and wealth shall be transferred from the man of the world to the man of God.

The whole course of things shall be inverted; the worldly man shall serve where once he ruled, and the saint shall rule where once he was despised. And the nations upon earth, looking up every hour to the Heavenly City, and gazing with wonder upon its ineffable beauty shall exclaim, with a different tone than that of formal repetition—

"Thou art the King of glory, O Christ'
  Make us to be numbered with thy Saints in glory everlasting."

OLD TESTAMENT SAINTS—WAITING.

An Address by Rev. A. Saphir, D.D.

The Old Testament Saints in the Attitude of Waiting—Jehovah, the Coming One—I. The Horizon of Israel—The Ultimate Future—II. The Proximate Future—III. They Thought the Coming Near—The Two Things Rationalism Attacks—Seven Bridges—Three Divine Unconditional Promises—Daniel's Prophecies—A Puzzle to the Old Testament Saints—The Appointed Time.

I have in my paper to bring before you the general fact that the saints of God, from Abraham to aged Simeon, were always in the attitude of waiting.

The saints of God, from Abraham to aged Simeon—this brings before us the whole history of Israel as it is recorded in Scripture. The saints of God, from Abraham to aged Simeon, waiting—this brings before us the whole prophecy which God, by His holy messengers, intrusted unto His ancient people, in which they hoped and rejoiced. The saints of God—that is history; the saints of God waiting—that is prophecy. For in Israel history and prophecy are intimately and inseparably connected.

It is only in the light of the future, in the light of the ultimate fulfilment of God's council, that we are able to understand the beginning and the middle of the history of Israel; and it is only by understanding the history of Israel as the basis, the foreground, or instalment, of the future, that we are able to understand those promises which were given by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

Therefore the Scripture is eminently historical; it is a record of that supernatural history. And, on the other hand, as the Apostle Peter teaches us, it is the more sure Word of prophecy; and the reason of this inseparable connection between their history and prophecy is simply this, that the centre of the Old Testament is that salvation which is everlasting and universal, comprehending all ages and all nations, which Jesus Himself has declared to be of the Jews.

Jehovah is simply the coming One; as Jesus said unto the beloved disciple, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, which was, and is, and is to come, the Almighty." This is the Jehovah whom we expect; this is the Jehovah whom the remnant in Israel will expect, and, to their utter astonishment, will discover that this Jehovah, the God for whom they have waited, is none other than Jesus who was crucified upon Calvary.

If Jehovah is the coming One, and if the Old Testament is the Book of Jehovah, and if Israel is the nation of Jehovah—then the whole attitude of the Old Testament, and the whole attitude of the nation, must be future-wards. And they can have no other horizon, no nearer horizon, than that of the future. Nothing short of the ultimate future can be the horizon of Israel, the everlasting nation of the Old Testament, the Book of Jehovah. There must be a perfect fulfilment of the promises which He gave to the fathers; a perfect manifestation of the eternal One, who condescended to come into time; a perfect realization of the idea He had concerning this earth of ours; and therefore all Scripture must be prophetical, else it would not be God's Scripture, and Israel must be looking forward, or else it would not be God's Israel.

In this I see three things of great importance. The first is this, that must be the ultimate future. Therefore all members of Israel, no matter what century they lived in, all saw the same thing. Israel is directed to look out for the ultimate future; and from the beginning of the nation to John the Baptist they all saw the same thing.

And here I must go back to Adam and Eve—what did they see? The seed of the woman bruising the head of the serpent. What did Enoch, the seventh from Adam, see? The ultimate end—"Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints!" What did Abraham see? The ultimate end—"In thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed." What did John the Baptist see? The ultimate end—in exactly the same way in which the Old Testament prophets saw it; for to him there was as yet no distinction; and he was on exactly the same level—Jehovah, who is to come suddenly to His temple, "whose fan is in His hand, and He will throughly purge His floor, and will gather the wheat into His garner."

From Adam to John the Baptist, the thing upon which the eye of God's people rested, was the ultimate future, the coming of Jehovah; stretching through the millennial ages into the new heaven and the new earth.

The second thing I want to bring before you is this—not only that all saw the same thing, but they each saw it connected with

according to their individual position. That is to say, the ultimate future connected itself with the present, and hence with present duties. To make it more clear, let me remind you of this, the patriarchal promise was this, God will bring your children into the land of Canaan. Therefore, in their mind, the entrance of the twelv tribes into Canaan, and the coming of the glory were coincident. Jacob thought that when th twelve tribes came into Canaan, the Shiloh would come at the same time.

Take again Moses; he also connected th great position with his waiting for the sam thing. Then Isaiah saw great oppression from Assyria, and he connected deliverance from Assyria with the coming of Emmanuel, unde whom would be the reign of peace.

Take again Jeremiah; he saw the taking awa of the children of Israel into the Babylonish cap tivity, and he thought that when the sevent years were accomplished, then would come th Messiah and the reign of peace. Then we hav the other prophets; in every redemption tha God brought unto His people, they saw alread the last great redemption, and it was a very prac tical thing thus to look forward unto the ult mate end. It decided upon this questio whether they would be worldly or unworldly strangers and pilgrims on this earth, or amon those who seek an abiding city here.

Thirdly, yet

THEY THOUGHT THE COMING NEAR.

Abraham knew his children would be a lon time (400 years) in the land of Egypt. Mos knew it would be a long time ere they got i the land of Canaan, and yet at the same tin the coming of the Lord is expected by ther Their thought was, He is coming quickly, a the prophet Habakkuk says, "The vision is y for an appointed time, but at the end it sh hasten and not lie: though it tarry, wait for because it will surely come, it will not tarry Just as in the Book of Revelation He says I will show unto them things that will surely co to pass, and Jesus says, "Behold, I come quic ly."

What is the meaning of this—Abraham, Mos and all the prophets expected it? They kn that in the eternal spiritual world every thing h life and meaning; God does not delay; He h no object dearer to His heart than the fulfilm of His promises. He comes as quickly as can. He comes, and that is the great and cent point, and therefore it is that they see. T things nearest and dearest are shown unto th in their directness.

Before I pass on, let me, for the sake of th who may be troubled about the things said written against the authority of the Word God, make this remark. The difficulty of lieving the Old Testament is very great, but i neither greater nor less than the difficulty of lieving in the living God.

What are the two things rationalists atta Miracles and prophecy. They might as well simply, We do not like to believe in the liv God; for a miracle is simply the omnipot nd of God interfering in His grace ; and proph- is simply the omniscient eye interfering in stimony, and guiding His people ; and there- e unto us miracle and prophecy are the two lars on which the whole edifice of Divine ith is resting.

Unless able to believe in the coming One, it is possible to understand the Book of God. om Genesis to Malachi, it is only in the light the future that we can see any connection in e meaning of the Old Testament. This is my nviction, that the moment faith in Jehovah as e future One is given up, faith in the Word of d is undermined. It may take centuries to velop it, but it must surely develop ; for with- t this faith in the future Jehovah, the Bible is t intelligible, and not interesting. You know at, to a great number of people, nine tenths the Bible is not interesting ; and if it is once interesting or unintelligible, we lose its au- ority.

Now I must pass very rapidly to

THIS WAITING ATTITUDE OF HISTORY.

It may interest us to think of this history as a er, and to take as our stations seven bridges, m which to trace its course. The first I all call the Patriarchal—Abraham, Isaac, and cob ; the second, Moses—the Law ; the third, avid and Solomon, the bridge of the kingdom ; e fourth, the earlier prophets, before the captiv- , of whom Isaiah is representative ; the fifth nds not in Palestine, but Baylon—the cap- ity predicted by Jeremiah has set in, Ezekiel d Daniel are the prophets of God ; the sixth is presented by Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, o prophesied in troublous times, after the storation : while the seventh is characterized the lowly band of Israelites, who at the birth Christ waited for the redemption of Israel.

Look at Abraham, who is our father. This tion is thus peculiar ; its beginning is not hid mystic darkness, but shines out clearly. We not know the name of the first Englishman, of the first Russian, but the name of the first w was Abraham. We know this, and can see wn to the very beginning of our history, like to transparency. Israel can also look forward to e future, and know the end of our history. hat is the wonderful thing in this nation of Je- vah, who was, and is, and is to come.

But since it is a universal salvation, a salva- n of all nations, Abraham must be linked with e whole race ; and therefore, as Jesus said, Before Abraham was, I Am." So I may also y, paradoxical though it may seem, be- re Abraham was born, there were children of braham. For he was so not only to believers the New Testament generation, but also to e whole family of saints. Thus in the days of oah, the promise was already given through hem. Enoch waited for the Lord : Adam and ve, when their first-born son was brought rth, thought he was the promised Redeemer, d so they also looked for the Messiah.

There were three Divine promises given unto e patriarchs—the promise of a numerous na- on, of a country, and of a Messiah ; and how ere these promises given unto Abraham ? Un- nditionally. It is an unconditional covenant. does not depend upon Abraham, or upon the edience of a nation. Let me remind you that is is the foundation upon which not merely e Old Testament rests, but your own salvation so.

Come we now to the third bridge—David. he children of Israel had entered into the romised land ; but did Joshua give them rest ? od raised up mighty judges, of whom Samson as one of the greatest. They appointed unto emselves misery, in the election of Saul as ing. God brought blessing out of this in the ection and anointing of David. Now he was a pe of Christ—a picture of the future anointed ne. He through affliction and suffering was ised to reign. He exerted a spiritual influence ver his people, because they knew he was be- ved of the Lord God. He lifted not up his eart above his brethren ; He sympathized with hem in their sorrows. This was the King, realized to a certain extent in the person of David : and the spirit of prophecy revealed unto him what is to come.

And then come

THE PROPHETS.

What shall I say of Isaiah ? Oh ! what a wonderful future is revealed to him. The first cycle of prophecies is in connection with Assyria, the second in connection with Sennacherib, the third in connection with the Babylonish captivity. With regard to Israel, Isaiah dwells constantly on the remnant, left after the sifting judgments of a just and holy God. The Holy One of Israel. Twenty-one times is this expression in his book, and only three times is it found in other books of the Bible.

Isaiah is deeply impressed with this, that no unholy person shall inherit the promise, or partake of the covenant. And he knew severe judgments would gather around Israel, and only a very small portion of the nation would really be God's people, whom He would bring to glory. There is to be a remnant, who shall come to the glory, but God will bring it to them through deep humiliation and repentance.

Come now to the fifth bridge. According to the prediction of Jeremiah, Israel was led into captivity. Forty years had Jeremiah witnessed to this rebellious and disobedient people ; and of all men in the world, he was the most tender-hearted, he could not bear to think of the judgments coming upon them, his eyes were always full of tears. It was this Jeremiah whom God chose to be a fortress of iron and brass.

And this is what I think so Christ-like in Jeremiah : when the armies of Babylon proved that his predictions had been God-given, for the sake of which he had been rejected and persecuted ; then there was no bitterness in the heart of Jeremiah ; but he sat himself down and wept, and poured forth these lamentations, which to this day are the expression of Israel's misery and desolateness. It was the spirit of Jesus who wept over Jerusalem.

And so we come to Babylon, where God raised up wonderful prophets. There was Daniel and Ezekiel. Now Daniel differs from all other prophets of the Old Testament. Jesus calls him

THE PROPHET DANIEL.

I am so thankful for that word of Jesus, " The prophet Daniel ;" for that single expression of the Lord Jesus has annihilated all the opposition against Daniel, whose prophecies are in a peculiar sense the pillar of truth.

Now all the other prophets take their starting point from Israel. Daniel, being a politician and a statesman in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, takes his starting-point from the world's point of view. While the other prophets see the whole future history of Israel as regards the nations, Daniel sees the whole future history of the world as regards Israel. First in the form of four metals, and then under the form of the four beasts.

The four metals show power as it is given of God ; we see the world-power in its good and God-appointed aspect (Rom. 13). The most absolute government, strange as it may appear, is the best. Where there was the influence of the nobles, it degenerated, and lower down it is still worse, until we come to the worst form of all, when the people's influence on the government was fully developed.

The other view is represented by four beasts, as if to show their inward character. God honors the government of kings, and when Paul wrote to the church, although the conqueror Nero was on the throne, yet he lays stress on the divine appointment and authority of governments. But in the second vision the inward character of the world-monarchies is described ; they do not represent humanity, they are likened unto beasts, because their rule is by force and cunning.

Daniel beheld the Son of Man coming from heaven, and this must have been a problem to Old Testament saints, how He had first ascended. That He was to come out of the root of Jesse and the stem of David, they could understand. They expected Him from Bethlehem, while the Church now expects the Lord from heaven. Yet all their own prophets taught them He was to come from heaven. But He was the Son of David : how then does David call Him Lord, when He is his son, and how does David's son come down from heaven ? It must have exercised their faith indeed, but their heart was right, and they believed in Jehovah.

With regard to his own nation, Daniel studied the words of Jeremiah, and he saw there that the end of the seventy weeks was nearly attained. Then it was revealed to him that seventy times seven times were to elapse ; he beheld the coming of Messiah, and the last week, detached from the others, brought the crisis and victory.

Now I must go to

THE SIXTH BRIDGE.

'Look at Malachi, the last of the prophets. He sees the Lord coming to His temple, the angel of the covenant, in whom they delight. He is Jehovah ; but before Jehovah there shall be a man to prepare the way. But who will stand this crisis, this coming ? therefore he speaks to the ungodly and to the stout-hearted : " For who may abide the day of His coming ? and who shall stand when He appeareth ?" He shall burn them up like stubble. With great solemnity the whole past is reviewed, " Remember ye the law of Moses My servant."

Notice the conclusion of Malachi. It shows unto us, so to speak, the humility of the whole Old Testament. All the prophets were only stars in the dark night, the morning has not yet dawned. But says the last Old Testament witness, " Unto you that fear My name, the Sun of Righteousness shall arise with healing in His wings." The whole Old Testament is waiting for the sunrise.

THE LONG SILENCE

from Malachi is broken by an angel. An angel comes down, and appears to Zacharias, and to the Virgin Mary. What does the angel say ? No modern critic will venture to charge the angel with prejudice. He comes from eternity, if I may so speak, from heaven, and predicts that there would be born to the blessed virgin Jesus who shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and shall have the throne of his father David, and shall rule forever over the house of Jacob. How they understood this is perfectly clear from the song of Mary, and from that of Zachariah. They expected deliverance from all their enemies, He being raised up to fulfil the promise to Abraham and his seed forever. And now let us for a moment see how it came. In the Gospel of Matthew we see that Israel was at its lowest state (chap. 1). Herod, the Idumean, ruled. And still more striking is it in the Gospel of Luke. Cæsar Augustus was Emperor of Rome, and decreed that all the world should be taxed. Thus the theocracy had ceased. The fourth monarchy included also Judæa. It was an insignificant province of all the world.

Now look at this contrast. Bethlehem, little even among little Judah. While the fourth monarchy is at Rome, and the theocracy has ceased, there come down angels from heaven, from the Lord, King of kings, and Lord of lords, announcing to the shepherds who were out on the plain minding their flocks, that unto them was born this day a Saviour Christ Jehovah, and theocracy has in reality again begun.

Behold, the time is fulfilled ; God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, made under the law. But before the priest can act, God sent forth His testimony, that the child was the Lord ; that the servant was Lord of the law. Simeon, in the name of the Old Testament prophets, comes and declares the dignity of the child. He was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel, and was full of the Holy Ghost. Thus he is a representative of all Israel—the law, the prophets, and the godly remnant taught by the Spirit—and what does he say : " Let Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people ; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel."

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

CLARA BECOMES LADY ERSKINE.

WAS the Almighty indeed a pitying Father? So Clara reasoned with herself in her distraction. Had He led her into the paths of peace? Had He not rather filled her cup with bitterness, and withered her soul with disappointment? Nay, was it not religion that lay at the root of all her misery? Were not the conscientious misgivings of her mother as the worm that had destroyed the gourd that she delighted in? Had Mrs. Arnot's views been less strict and puritanical—less bigoted, as Clara called them, in the anguish of her soul—would not her daughter have been the happiest of women?—would not she herself have been the proudest of mothers?

Such thoughts were sinful, marked with the deepest stain of ingratitude; yet Clara indulged in them freely. She almost accused Providence in secret of having exposed her to trials beyond what she could bear; unmindful of the fact that she had herself, in impatience of petty annoyances, chosen the path which, however flowery at first, she had found to be strewn with sharp thorns. If she was conscious that her faith was growing weak, and her love toward God becoming cold, she laid the blame upon the cruel circumstances of the position in which the Almighty had placed her.

She had loved and served the Lord—at least so she deemed—when she was happy; but when His hand lay so heavy upon her, she was ready to forget all past mercies, all present blessings, all bright hopes of a blissful future. With Jonah her spirit exclaimed, "I do well to be angry:" with Elijah, "It is enough; take away my life!" Impatient to throw down the burden which her unchastened will refused to sustain, she longed, almost prayed for death—little deeming in her present state how unfit she was to die. The sun of trial was now indeed glowing with intense and burning heat on the seed which had been sown in rocky ground; the plant which had shown in the world's eye so fair, unwatered by grace, having no root in itself, in the time of temptation withered away.

Deep was the affliction of Mrs. Arnot; darker and darker grew the path before her. She had stood firm against the sophistry of human wisdom, the power of human eloquence; she had resisted even Clara's pleading tears: but to see, week after week, and month after month, her child wasting to a shadow before her, was a lengthened torture to her loving heart which wore away the very thread of her life.

In vain medical advice was sought for Clara. There was no physician to "minister to a mind diseased;" all the skill of man was unavailing where the patient chose death rather than life. There was an awful possibility before Mrs. Arnot, too terrible to contemplate, but which recurred to her mind again and again, as she gazed on the fading form of her child. There was nothing which appeared to rouse Clara, or to excite in her a moment's interest, except the letters which she received from Ada, and which were perused only by herself. Mrs. Arnot never sought to know their contents; she felt that her daughter's confidence and affection were now given to another, and that she herself stood in the position of a tyrant towards one who was far dearer to her than life!

"Have I indeed done what was right? or have I mistaken my duty—sacrificed to blind prejudice the happiness of my child—destroyed her health, her peace—ruined her hopes, in my ignorant, misguided zeal?" Such were the bitter reflections which recurred again and again, and ever with increasing bitterness, to the mind of the unhappy mother. In vain her pastor endeavored to support her with the promises of God, to assure her that she had not only acted faithfully, but wisely: she could not endure to see the consequences of her own decision, still less to contemplate what might possibly be its final result.

Autumn rain was fast descending, streaming from the heavy black clouds, while ever and anon a wild gust of wind stripped the boughs of their faded leaves, and scattered them far and wide. Emma tried to beguile the weary time with a novel, but looked up from it every five minutes with a languid sigh, to complain of "the horrid weather," and contrast the English climate with that of her native island. The children were restless and noisy, impatient of the confinement of the house, till Mrs. Arnot found employment for them all in looking over the curiosities of an old cabinet.

Where was Clara? Her mother sought her in the small sitting-room in which her daughter usually pursued her occupations. Her books, her piano, her desk, were there. The room was not, however, now occupied; Clara was in her own apartment. Mrs. Arnot noticed that an album was laid on the desk, in which Clara usually wrote her poetical effusions; and the sight of it made the mother hope that at least one favorite occupation had not been relinquished by her daughter. Often had Mrs. Arnot copied out verses from that album, and shed tears of pleasure over them. She opened the book to see if Clara had recently added to their number. Between the last written pages there were compressed flowers, their beauty faded, their life gone; yet precious, perhaps, as relics of the hours when they had bloomed as freshly as the hopes which, like them, had withered. The last verses in the volume were new to Mrs. Arnot; they bore the date but of yesterday; and she with anguish perused them as the transcript of the feelings of a young being whose life had not yet numbered twenty years.

LINES.

Is it sinful to gaze on the morning sun,
And wish that the gates of the west he had won—
That life's day were over, its labors done?

Is it sinful to mark the first silver hair
'Mid dark tresses touched by the hand of care,
And wish time had shed all his winter there?

Is it sinful in life no joy to take,—
To feel like a captive bound to the stake
By a chain that galls us, and will not break?

Some fear to die: 'tis not so with me;
Rather, O Death, I pine for thee!
I long in the quiet grave to be!

"Oh, this is too much—too much!" exclaimed Mrs. Arnot, wringing her hands. "I can endure any thing myself, but I cannot—oh, I cannot break the heart of my child!"

She hastened to Clara's apartment with a quick and agitated step. She unclosed the door—she saw Clara on her knees, her hair dishevelled, her bosom heaving with sobs, as she pressed again and again convulsively to her lips a little diamond locket which she held in her hand.

Clara started to her feet at the sound of her mother's entrance: as she did so a letter fell to the ground. Mrs. Arnot's eye rested upon it for a moment: the handwriting was not that of Ada.

"Oh! mother—mother—forgive me; it was—from him!"

"He loves you still?"

"More than ever!" exclaimed Clara, bursting into a fresh flood of tears.

"Then let him be happy with you!" cried the mother, folding her child in her arms, and kissing away her tears, while her own flowed freely and fast. "I can resist no longer. O God! forgive me if I do wrong! Clara, my own beloved! be united to the husband of your choice; you have your mother's consent and her blessing!"

Throughout the protracted and painful trial of which this was the termination, Mrs. Arnot had exhibited a constancy of reliance upon God such as it is given to few to exhibit. But if her faith had held out a little longer she would not have needed to say "If I do wrong," for God never fails to give clear light to those who wait patiently for Him. Abraham's trial was far greater than Mrs. Arnot's, and that case is related in the Bible expressly to teach us that there is no such thing as holding out too long under God's trials. "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord" (Lam. 3:26). "God s faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (1 Cor. 10:13).

On the day when the first snow fell Clara Arnot was the bride of Sir Edwin Erskine.

More than two years had elapsed since the day when in the little church of Wingsdale, Clara plighted her troth to him whom she s deeply loved, while many a fervent prayer arose for her happiness from the poor whom she had tended, the young whom she had taught. Th interval between her engagement and her marriage had been one of brightness to Clara. A mountain's weight seemed to have been remove from her spirits, and with the elasticity whic youth and hope give, they had more than rebounded to their former elevation. Again sh had smiles and kind words for all, and she appeared resolved by her winning sweetness manner to deepen the regrets of the village losing its "sunshine." Mrs. Arnot had stifle her own misgivings, that she might cast shadow on the bliss of the young bride; and one could have told from her outward mann how heavy lay the heart within. Even Emm had shaken off a little of her languor, roused something like interest by the excitement of wedding. Her children had brought their litt offerings, prepared in mysterious secrecy wi the assistance of their grandmother, who was them teacher, companion, and confidant; a Clara's surprise and thanks on receiving th presents almost realized their juvenile expec tions.

More than two years had rolled their cou since that exciting, joyous day, when a drove up to the door of a large house in Cav dish Square, one of the most fashionable tricts of London, and a lady stepped out rang the bell. She was attired in habilime which once had been handsome, but which decidedly seen their best days; the rich dress had been dyed, the shawl was faded, sable boa showed tokens of age, and neat fin had repaired the Lisle lace veil which gave g to the bonnet of straw. In the staid mar and somewhat care-worn face, where cer lines were traced across the brow which smooth some two years ago, we mark a cha beyond that which time would have made in old acquaintance Ada Murray.

"Ada! oh, how delighted I am to see y! What an age it is since we met!" cried Cla as the visitor was ushered into the elegant a ment of Lady Erskine, and the cousins changed an affectionate embrace.

Has Clara also been altered by the plain ld ring, which often works wonders as stran as those wrought by an enchanter?

Clara is lovely as ever, her beauty enhanc by a womanly dignity which beseems the baro 's wife. But she too has lost the joyous brigh ess which rested on her gentle countenance hen Ada first visited Wingsdale. An expressi of thought, almost of melancholy, is there; nd she certainly looked far happier in her g sy bonnet, seated on the gnarled roots of th ld oak, than she does now in her spacious man on, robed in velvet and surrounded by luxury.

"I could not resist the temptation of co ing to see you!" cried Ada sitting with Clara's nd clasped in her own, and surveying her w h a look of affectionate interest.

"I hope that you have brought your twi to London with you?" said Clara.

"Oh, the little cherubs! how I should d ght to show them to you! But we left the in Wiltshire; it is a serious matter to trave ith two infants not a year old."

"Then I am afraid that your stay in L lon will be but short," observed Lady Erskine, " ith two such powerful magnets drawing you a ay."

"Only two!" laughed Ada; "you forg my sband's children—a whole scale of magnets, om five feet five to three feet nothing! I thought at I should never have managed to get away all! But the Major was obliged to come to wn to fit out his middy, and I took such a ging to revisit my old haunts, look at old ces, hear the sounds of carriage wheels, and ocks at the door, and street cries, and hurdy-rdies again, that, like a dutiful mamma, I ist see Jack off myself, and pay a flying visit

dear smoky London."

"I can scarcely fancy you the staid, sober other of such a large family!" exclaimed ra.

'Very odd—isn't it? reversing the order of ture; instead of the quiet spinning caterpillar rning into the gay butterfly, the butterfly doffing silken wings and beginning to crawl through e routine of daily duties, a prisoner to its cab-ge-leaf. Only imagine me, mending stockgs, shaping out pinafores, bandaging cut fin-rs and broken heads, scolding tradespeople, eping servants in order, paying bills, and ncing babies till my arms ache!"

'I should think the last a very delightful oc-pation," said Clara suppressing a sigh.

'None but a mother can tell how delightful," plied Ada; "but I do not take so kindly to all domestic employments. I never yet took asure in solving the problem how far a shilg would go, nor finding out how it is that boys always wanting new shoes, and how elbows d knees are perpetually running a race as to ich should first run through the clothes. I ieve that children have found out the secret perpetual motion, to the great discomfort of ose who have to look after little rogues!"

'But children make a house so cheerful," said ra, abstractedly.

'And now, my dear child—ah! you see that I
n't get over my old way of talking to you yet lo give me your last news from Wingsdale.
u know that I'm such a shocking corresponnt that I know as little of what passes in the rld beyond Salisbury Plain as if I were a denin of the moon."

'Poor old Mrs. Ward, my mother tells me, is onfirmed invalid, and unable to leave her bed."

'And your sweet mother herself?"

'She never mentions her own health; her lets are full of the children."

'Ah! the whity-brown legion of little hors, who like a swarm of hornets literally drove u out of Laurel Bank, and compelled you to e refuge in Grosvenor Square! I suppose at they have been undergoing the process of ning, at which my aunt is so famous, and that nny now does not scratch out any one's eyes, l that Lyddie may be trusted in a store-room l of treacle and sugar. I should think your ther a first-rate hand at bringing up children, ging from the charming specimen before me!"

lara neither smiled nor blushed at the flattery v.

'But tell me how they all appeared when you re last at Laurel Bank."

Then, indeed, the color rose to Clara's pale ek, and it was with an appearance of some em-rassment that she replied, "I have not been re since you were there, on the day of my rriage."

Ada suppressed the exclamation of astonishnt that was upon her tongue, for she saw that utterance would give pain.

'My dear husband has been so much engaged f course I could not leave him—it is so diffit sometimes to make arrangements—but I e soon—" Clara stopped short, for her lips
e not accustomed to utter an absolute un-th.

How your mother must be longing to see
! I should not have thought that she could e lived so long without you!"

Words cannot express how I long to see
!" exclaimed Clara, with tears in her eyes.

I think it might be managed in some way.
you could not visit Wingsdale, she might ne to London—"

THE SAVIOUR'S KINGDOM.

S. S. Lesson for May 18th.—Micah. 4 : 1-8; 5 : 1, 2. Golden Text, 4 : 2.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR subject for to-day treats of our Lord's millennial kingdom, i.e., His reign on earth for a thousand years, when Satan shall be bound (Rev. 20 : 1–4), "that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled." Our Lord reigns not alone. The Bride of Christ, the Lamb's wife, reigns with Him, having first suffered for and with Him, for we are "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him" (Rom. 8 : 17).

We see that not only have they who reign with Christ a martyr spirit, but that they are a holy people, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years" (Rev. 20 : 6). And, again, from Rev. 3 : 21, we see that they must be overcomers who would reign. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father on His throne." To be eternally united to Him we must be like Him; to share with Him above we must first share with Him here.

It is in the days of Christ's reign with His ascended people over the earth that the prophecy of our subject shall be accomplished. "But in the last days," etc. Here, then, we see that Jerusalem is to be, in the millennium, the centre of missionary effort. But instead of missionaries going out to the heathen, as we are commissioned to do, it would seem in those last days of peace and blessedness the nations shall come to Jerusalem. Then will be national turning to the Lord, as in the old times of Israel and Judah, when the whole people as one man turned unto the Lord: or as Nineveh, that great city which repented at the preaching of the prophet Jonah.

It is very clear that the Jews will first be gathered back into their own land in unbelief before the time of Jacob's trouble comes, in the end of that time of "tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (Matt. 24 : 21). It would seem that in those days of trouble all nations shall be gathered against Jerusalem to battle (Zech. 14 : 2), and God will seek to destroy all those nations that come against Jerusalem. And then it is that the prophecy of Zech. 12 : 10, will be accomplished upon the Jews who are already in their own land: "And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplication; and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for Him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born." And thus converted, will the Jews become a blessing to the whole earth, and the promise will be fulfilled which God made to Abraham, "And in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed My voice" (Gen. 22 : 8).

Then we find that "the law shall go forth of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Things will be in their normal condition. "And He shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off." But what kind of rebuke shall it be? A rebuke which propagates peace instead of war, for "they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

That will be a time of prosperity as well as peace, "They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it. For all people will walk every one in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God forever and ever." That which is now by faith the condition of a child of God will then be visibly so, and all men shall see that "the Name of the Lord is a strong tower." "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10 : 19), is now our heritage by faith, but then the adversary himself, who raises up enemies, invents the tortures of sickness, plays upon the nerves, and seeks to draw all the circumstances of our lives into an impossible tangle of perplexity, he himself will be prisoner and powerless. Now by faith we can set him and his machinations at defiance, for we know that Christ "hath delivered us from the power of darkness," but then there will be neither wicked man nor wicked spirit to make any one afraid.

Verses 6 to 8 are promises to the Jewish church and people. "In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation." Surely in the days in which we are living every thing is preparing for this renewal of power among the Jews. Everywhere one hears of the increasing power of this formerly downtrodden and despised people. Wealth, position, power, are in their hands, and it needs but that they should have a land to make them at once "a strong nation." It is here clearly predicted that the Jews shall be the leading nation upon earth —"Unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem."

In the 11th and 12th verses we see allusion is made again to the time of the tribulation. "Now also many nations are gathered against thee. . . . But they know not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understand they His counsel: for He shall gather them as sheaves into the floor." Chapter 5 is but a continuation of what precedes, but the prophecy is interspersed with references to the first coming of Christ. "They shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek." Surely this was fulfilled in the house of Pilate, when "they spit upon Him, and took the reed, and smote Him on the head"

But the third verse of chapter 5 remains yet unfulfilled. "Therefore will He give them up" (the thousands of Judah?) "until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth"; i.e., until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, and the Church has accomplished her mission, to take of the Gentiles a people for His name (Luke 21 : 24; Acts 15 : 14). Then, when He has presented unto Himself "a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing" (Eph. 5 : 27), "then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel." "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. 11 : 25, 26).

"And He shall stand and feed (or rule) in the strength of the Lord, in the majesty of the name of the Lord His God." We understand now so little the power of the Name of God, and the power of the Name of Jesus. "In My Name," said our Lord Jesus, of them which should believe in Him, "shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Where do we find this exercise of the power of Jesus' Name? In the times of the Apostles truly it was general. In a few remote villages in Germany and Switzerland, in some cases in America, we see and hear of diseases healed and devils cast out in the Name of Jesus; but this is the exception rather than the rule. But when Jesus comes again, it will be otherwise; then the majesty of the Name of His God shall be the power by which He governs, and "at the Name of Jesus every knee shall bow," and the homage of the universe will be universal, the earth with its inhabitants shall be no exception "of things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2 : 10). "And they shall abide;" for He is their guarantee, and "now shall He be great unto the ends of the earth."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Example of the United States was pointed out by Mr. Goschen in the English House of Commons on Monday, April 28th, as worthy of imitation by the British Government. "That nation," he said, "had paid off their debt $150,000,000 during a period of gloom and depression, while the Beaconsfield Government were postponing the payment of their liabilities."

Mr. Gladstone declared that the increased expenditure had been incurred in the furtherance of a policy which had not, in a single instance, improved the English relations with any nation or race on the face of the earth.

Sir Stafford Northcote said the expenditure depended upon the policy of the Government. If the policy is wrong, let it be censured and abandoned; but if it is right, the country must take the consequences.

There is sound logic in this last utterance; if the British taxpayer prefers a Government which deals largely in blustering and bravado, it is childish in him to complain of the expense involved. But as a general election is approaching, when every seat in the House falls vacant, the constituencies will have an opportunity of expressing their judgment on the policy of the Conservative Government and their opinion of its effects.

The British War in Zululand, according to a despatch in the London Daily Telegraph, has assumed a more hopeful aspect. The despatch is dated April 15th and states that "Dubalmanzi, who led the attack on Ismandula, and other chiefs with large armies following, have proffered submission. Lord Chelmsford promised them personal safety and possession of their cattle, but said pending the termination of the war they should be located on British territory. Cetywayo's pride is considered to be broken. Before the war he regarded the British as useful neighbors, not contemptible in strength, and, partly from good feeling and partly from incredulity of their ability to molest him, Cetywayo refused to molest them. Now he sees his mistake, and, provided he gets good terms personally, it is thought probable he will come in."

The New European Principality of Bulgaria has chosen its ruler. It will be remembered that at the Conference which closed the Russo-Turkish War last year it was decided to liberate Bulgaria from Turkish control, and form it into an independent nation. The choice of a Prince was left to the people, subject to the approval of the Great Powers. Considerable diplomatic intrigue has been employed in the interval to influence the people in their selection. The issue may be regarded as a triumph for Russia over Great Britain, for the Prince chosen is a protegè of Russia, and his election indicates that Russian influence will be paramount in the new State. Bulgaria as a neutral state interposed between Russia and Turkey, would, it was thought by the Congress, have the effect of promoting the interests of peace between the two, but by this election Turkey will probably regard Bulgaria as a hostile nation, whose policy is dictated by the Czar.

Prince Alexander of Battenberg, in Germany, who has been chosen by the Bulgars as their Prince, is only twenty-three years old. He is the second son of the Prince of Hesse, a diplomatist well known and very popular in European courts, where he is said to have much influence. Prince Alexander had received a military education, and at the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish war received permission from the Czar to join the staff of the Grand Duke Nicholas, commander-in-chief. He was one of the first to cross the Danube, and continued on active duty throughout the campaign. He took part in the defence of the Shipka Pass, the investment of Plevna, and the victorious advance on Constantinople. After the war he returned home to Darmstadt, and in a short time was transferred to the Emperor William's body-guard. His aunt is Empress of Russia, and his cousin, Ludwig IV., Grand Duke of Hesse, was the husband of the late Princess Alice of England.

The proceedings in the Assembly at the election of the Prince were very brief. Bishop Clement said that of three eligible candidates one was too old and another would not be acceptable to Germany. The Assembly then elected Prince Alexander by acclamation, amid a scene of great enthusiasm. In the evening the town of Tirnova, where the election took place, was illuminated.

The Egyptian Crisis.—Events, pregnant with momentous consequences as viewed in the light of inspired prophecy, are advancing rapidly in Egypt.

The English and French agents in Egypt have been instructed to represent that their government regard the good administration of Egypt indispensable to their interests, and they therefore invite the Khedive to comply as promptly as possible with their demand and hand the portfolios of Finance and Public Works to English and French Ministers.

A telegram from Constantinople states that the Khedive has refused to comply with the Anglo-French demand. Should he continue obstinate, he will probably be deposed, as the Sultan of Turkey has offered to dethrone him if the Western nations desire such a course.

If the Khedive is got rid of, there will probably be ultimately an English, perhaps in the firs instance an Anglo-French, protectorate established. Meanwhile a considerable panic has arisen among the Egyptian bondholders in both countries.

Amongst the miserable inhabitants of Egypt generally, a "sore famine" continues its ravages. Mr. Baird, who was sent to Upper Egypt to take measures for relieving the starving population, has sent in a report to the Egyptian Government, in which he fully confirms the appalling extent of the famine, and proves by statistics that 10,000 persons have died from starvation alone in Ghirgeh, Kena, and Esna, as much from over-taxation as from want of food.

An Escaped Nihilist in New York.—The steamship Mosel, which arrived April 29th, had on board a Russian Nihilist named Ivan Strelitzky, who managed to escape from his prison at Kieff, where he was awaiting transportation to Siberia. He is one of the medical students who took a prominent position in the earlier stages of the conspiracy.

His narrative shows how measures of repression unduly severe tend to foment the evil they are intended to suppress. Political discussions in the colleges were prohibited by the police, and then, Ivan says: "We speedily indorsed the Nihilist programme, and were soon initiated into the secret circles, swearing on the sword-blade to fight and die for liberty. The oaths were very binding indeed, and soon we found that it was no idle position we held. We were urged on, against our better instincts sometimes, to activity in the cause. Orders from the 'headquarters' in Moscow came frequently, and they had to be obeyed, or death by razor or rope was our lot. After that all was a whirl; we were no longer able to advance properly in our studies, for both our time and means were levied on to carry out the most audacious plans."

The Horrors of Russian Prisons are thus described by Ivan Strelitzky: "I was seized in my bed one night, handcuffed, gagged, and driven away in the bitter cold, without even my coat or other outer garments, to the dungeon, and there thrust violently in among over one hundred others. Some, with fiend-like inhumanity, were sent there suffering from sabre and pistol wounds, and no amount of entreaty could induce the guard to bring down the jail physician. The filth lay thick on the floor, our breaths congealed in the frosty air, the heating not being arranged for; and worst of all—far worse to endure than the rotten straw palliasse and blanket—was the food. Soup, like thin water, with no taste of barley in it, and a cube of half-baked rye bread were served us twice a day. Meat we never saw, except on holydays. Poor as was the food, there was not nearly enough of it, and in a few weeks the strong fought the weak for more than their share of it, so famished had we become.

"At the trials the court had no mercy. I would rather have appealed to the mercy of a wild beast. There was not even a shadow of justice, and without being heard in our defence we were summarily condemned and removed, some to the back of the cemetery to be shot, and others to go to Siberia for life. Flogging with the knout was inflicted on all who did not confess, and at Kharkoff, where many delicate women were imprisoned, I am told, some died from the effect of the knout."

"In concluding, I can tell you that the Czar and his nobles are doomed to an early death, and every copeck I can save I shall send to aid in freeing noble Russia from a ruinous tyranny."

Mr. Strelitzky is about 24 years old, and a member of a highly respectable Russo-Polish family. He says his experience while in Russia was that of thousands of others, and the majority innocent people, having committed no politica offence whatever.

A Violent Hurricane at Szegedin April 29t destroyed the works prepared for restoring th railway and filling the breaches in the dam caused by the recent floods. The barges fille with building material and earth were mostl sunk. The storm caused extensive fresh breach in the railway embankment, and the laborers a in great danger. The fund for the relief of t sufferers now in the hands of the New Yo committee amounts to $15,878.36.

The late JOHN CROSSLEY, the Christian Philanthropist.

THE LATE MR. JOHN CROSSLEY,

One of the Three Philanthropic Brothers of Halifax, Yorkshire, England.

His Birth in 1812—His Industrious and Pious Mother—His Early Work at Weaving—His Conversion and Sunday-school Teaching—His Aid in Chapel Building and the Crossley Orphanage—His Energy as Town-Councillor and Mayor of Halifax—Prince of Wales's Visit to Him—His Private Benefactions to the Embarrassed—His Christian Endurance of Crushing Commercial Losses—His Death on April 16th, 1879.

JOHN CROSSLEY, whose name has long been "familiar as a household word" amongst Yorkshiremen and in English religious circles generally was born at Dean Clough May 16th, 1812. His parents were in comparatively humble circumstances, but they had a small carpet mill, which was admirably managed, and which by the hard work of all the members of the family, the mother not excepted, enabled them to live respectably. Perhaps few persons in the neighborhood bore a higher character for integrity, industry, and godly simplicity than the parents of John Crossley.

The mother, indeed, in her untiring energy, her rich, sound sense, and noble industry, was the very counterpart of "the virtuous woman" so graphically described in the last chapter of the Book of Proverbs. Of her, too, it might have been said, "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh diligently with her hands. She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens. She considereth a field and buyeth it. . . . She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff."

Nor, emphatically, must one portion of the picture be lost sight of: "She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy." It was one of the fixed resolves of this noble-hearted woman, while trudging away to market to sell what had been made at the loom during the week, that if ever prosperity came to be their portion, those who were in straitened circumstances should be the better and happier for it. "The poor shall have a slice of it," were her memorable words; and in after years her children had no higher pleasure than to use their wealth in such a way that it might become the memorial of her generous disinterestedness. It might truly be said of her three sons that they rose up to call her blessed. One became the well-known and widely-beloved Sir Francis Crossley, another the Joseph Crossley whose memory is still precious, and a third the John Crossley the subject of this member.

As a boy he was carefully educated, first in his native place and next at a boarding school. Some fears were entertained that he would "never make old bones," on account of his delicate constitution, and those who remember him in later life will not fail to recall that he never looked a man of robust strength. He could and did do an amazing amount of work, however, although so delicate. On leaving school he at once went to his father's carpet mill to make himself generally useful. Part of his work, coming fresh from school, was to keep the books, but another part, of which he was never ashamed to tell the story in his later years, was to do his share of the weaving. It was a homely education for the lad who lived to entertain at his mansion at Manor Heath, Halifax, the Prince of Wales; but it furnishes another, and not the least striking, illustration of the path of duty becoming the sure road to honor.

The great house, which in the course of time became as well known in this country and all foreign markets as it was in England, was slowly and surely built up by the combined efforts of the three brothers, John, Joseph, and Frank, this being the name by which the baronet was usually known. On the death of their father, about forty years ago, they entered into partnership, and for a considerable time did a world-wide trade.

Mr. John Crossley from his youth took pleasure in works of usefulness, especially perhaps, in Sunday-school teaching, and his success in this direction has been highly spoken of. When quite a young man he had made a profession of his faith in Christ by becoming a member of the Rev. Alexander Ewing's church. Mr. Ewing was then the highly-esteemed pastor of the Congregational Church at Square Chapel, Halifax, and his ministry was greatly appreciated by the subject of this sketch.

In 1839 he married Ann, the eldest daughter of Mr. Kitchenman Child, of Ovenden, and upon this lady dying in 1846, he married Sarah, the daughter of Mr. Josiah Wheatley, of Mirfield, who survives him. By his first marriage he had one son, Mr. Louis John Crossley, of Moorside, Halifax, and two daughters, one of whom, Mrs. G. Marchetti, also survives him,

In Congregational circles Mr. John Crossley was distinguished by the interest he took in the multiplication of new places of worship. The friends of the English Chapel Building Society ever found in him a warm supporter, and it has been stated that for twenty years he never seemed to slacken in the encouragement he gave by purse and personal effort to the building of new chapels or churches.

The number of Congregational churches of which he laid the foundation-stones is extraordinary. It is the custom to present the person performing this ceremony with a silver trowel to be used for the purpose, and Mr. John Crossley received and preserved a sufficient number of these mementos to form. For several years he was the chairman of the society referred to, and though never a vigorous public speaker on the occasions when he presided, his eloquence of generous readiness to co-operate with those who were desirous of planting a new sanctuary where one was needed was even more to the purpose.

He also united with his two brothers in building, at a cost of 46,000*l*.,

THE CROSSLEY ORPHAN HOME AND SCHOOL on Skircoat Moor, which was in the first instance intended to be a school for the education of the sons of Nonconformist ministers. This was a subject in which Mr. Crossley throughout his life took the keenest interest. He well knew that, with their comparatively small incomes, many ministers found it next to impossible to give their sons the training which they anxiously desired them to receive, and on his own responsibility he started a school for this purpose. For years, we are told on the best authority, he clung to his project, but wise friends persuaded him that the needs of this kind were already fairly met by the schools at Silcoates and elsewhere, and that it was not desirable to offer inducements to an unnecessary separation of ministers' sons into a class. In 1863 he became the treasurer of the institution at Silcoates, and in the mean time his brothers united with him to give wider effect to his benevolence by the establishment of the Crossley Orphanage.

While thus engaged in helping forward movements of a most valuable character on behalf of the denomination in whose prosperity he took so deep an interest, Mr. John Crossley won the respect of the people of Halifax by his public spirit and open-handed beneficence. For more than twenty years he was an active member of the Town Council. He served the office of Mayor two years successively, and he was in this position when the Prince of Wales visited Halifax to open the new Town Hall in 1863. The newspapers of that day give many interesting accounts of the reception of His Royal Highness by the Mayor at his residence of Manor Heath. No expense was spared to do honor to his royal guest, and the visit of the heir-apparent was believed to be as pleasing to himself as it was to the host who had the honor of entertaining him. He was also elected Liberal Member of Parliament for Halifax in 1874.

It was, however, in channels of usefulness not so open to the public eye as those which have been glanced at that Mr. John Crossley displayed a quiet benevolence of character which is beyond all praise, which has not been referred to in public prints. There are some who can say that had it not been for his prompt assistance in seasons of commercial panic or depression they would never have been able to weather the storm, and so the blessing of some who were ready to perish may be said to have sweetly rested on him. This was notably the case during that year of commercial disaster 1866, which many have such bitter reason to remember. Failures on a large scale were the dismal order of the day, and every morning's newspaper was opened with anxiety to see the next who had "gone."

One who has written lovingly of John Crossley at this period informs us that the disasters of 1866 opened new avenues for the outgoing of his ever-ready and even extravagant bounty His benefactions had always been far beyon whatever came, or were meant to come, to th knowledge of the public; and from this tim they ran out in the direction of help to th strugglers with adverse fortune, whether friend or strangers, with a flow which only the wises discrimination in the selection of recipients an all but unfathomable wealth could have mad prudent. It seemed impossible for him to resis an appeal for assistance, and quite as impossibl not to stretch out a helping hand to those wh did not ask but whose pressing needs made at this period, but in the heavy commercial losse which erelong fell so crushingly upon him, s that for a season it seemed doubtful whether h would get the better of them, it must have bee a source of no ordinary satisfaction to him tha he had given so largely while he had the mean to give. To use a proverb that will be apprec ated in Yorkshire, he had not "cut wide thong out of other people's leather." What he gave wa his own; his losses too were his own, and wer borne with the resignation of a true Christian.

Five years ago he was worth more than 200 000*l*. ($970,000). But subsequently an unlimite liability company failed, and although he had r tired from being a shareholder in it, yet, owin to the accidental circumstance of a solicit having neglected to have his name taken off th registered list of shareholders, nearly all his fo tune became swallowed up in liquidating its li bilities. Two years ago he retired from Parli ment.

The Leeds Mercury makes the following touc ing reference to the clouds which settled ov the closing years of Mr. Crossley's life: " was in this time of his sorrow that testimoni of regard reached him which he treasured as t most precious of the many his life had broug him. His fellow-townsmen were eager to ma fest their sympathy by a public subscription, a their purpose was not the less grateful to hi because the self-respect of his family could n allow of its being carried out. But he could gi unhesitating welcome to the presentation, on t 8th of August, 1877, of an illuminated addr and album, with portraits, from the workpeo at Dean Clough, testifying of great perso affection for their old employer.

" More than five hundred of them had work for him without intermission for twenty yea and some of them even for fifty years. A yet more touching was a similar presentati made in the following spring from old pup of the Crossley Orphanage, and containing likenesses of one hundred and eighty repres tatives of homes which his own and his broth large benevolence had gladdened. Beyond these were the more private expressions of ho and of sympathy which came to him from far near without measure, telling of the multitu of lives he had influenced by his kindliness by his example, and constituting his noblest ward.

" If for success in life it be necessary to h not only amassed a large fortune but to have tained it, then the life of Mr. John Crossley not be called a successful one. But to have m istered, by the countless influences of a kin and gentle nature, to the peace and cont ent of friends, neighbors, and workpeople, to ve stimulated zeal on behalf of education, of e principles of freedom, and of Christian use- ness by unflagging effort and example, to ve made the rays of hope and comfort shine o the darkened homes of the widow and the phan and of many troubled ones, to have left hind thousands of memories which will long treasured with thankfulness—all these con- tute a claim to a better rank than that of any re pecuniary success. And because Mr. John ossley's life was largely made up of these ser- es to his kind, his memory will, we are sure, long held dear throughout the great country th which he was so closely connected."

He latterly suffered from heart disease, and April 16th, 1879, after being up all day, as ual, he remarked, upon reaching his bedroom night, that he had walked up too quickly. then lay down on the bed in his clothes, and ked for his tie to be loosened. He never spoke ain. In three or four minutes he breathed last, and his spirit was present with the rd.

This happened at Broomfield, Halifax, the idence of his late brother Joseph.

At his funeral, which took place April 20th, profound respect in which he had been held all classes was plainly manifest, and the sor- w over his death was obviously general. The yor of Halifax, the magistrates and the min- ers of the town attended, and signs of mourn- g were displayed throughout the town.

His life, his benefactions, his unostentatious vate charities, have won for him a place in the mories of his countrymen which will never le away.

THE MAY MEETINGS IN LONDON.

ravian Missionary Meeting—Conversion of the irst Greenlander, Kayarnak—Baptist Mission- ry Society—Lord Northbrook's Remarks—Marshman's Biographies—Carey and Ward—The Change in Eighty Years—A Bright Bengalee Christian—A Mission Service, Delhi.

At the annual meeting at Exeter Hall, Lon- n, on April 30th, of the United Brethren, mmonly called Moravians, interesting details re given. Their missions among the heathen ve recently attracted much attention, as afford- g proof of the rudest barbarians being civilized becoming Christians. Wherever the Brethren ve preached the Gospel among savages they ve introduced the arts of social life, and wher- er the Gospel has been truly received those vages have become new creatures, not only in art and in conduct, but in personal appearance d intellect. The Report gave the following ecdote :

CONVERSION OF THE FIRST GREENLANDER.

On June 2d, 1738, many Greenlanders visited other Beck, who was at that time copying a nslation of that portion of St. Luke's Gospel ich describes the Saviour's agony in the gar- n. After some conversation with them, and ing them an account of the creation of the rld, the fall of man, and his redemption by rist, he read a few sentences of that part of translation before him. The Spirit of God abled him to enlarge with more than usual ergy on the sufferings and death of our Sa- our, and to exhort his hearers seriously to con- er the vast expense at which Jesus had ran- med the souls of His people. Upon this, the rd opened the heart of one of the company, ose name was Kayarnak, who, stepping up to table, in an earnest manner exclaimed, How was that? Tell me that once more ; for too, desire to be saved."

These words, which were such as had never ore been uttered by a Greenlander, penetrated soul of Brother Beck, who, with great emo- n, gave a fuller account of the life and death our Saviour, and the method of salvation rough Him. Some of the pagans laid their nds on their mouths, which is their usual cus- n when struck with amazement. On Kayar- k an impression was made that was not transient but had taken deep root in his heart. By means of his conversation, his family (or those who lived in the same tent with him) were brought under conviction, and before the end of the month three large families came with all their property, and pitched their tents near the dwelling of the Brethren, "in order," as they said, "to hear the joyful news of man's redemption." Kayarnak became eminently serviceable to the missions as a teacher of his countrymen, and adorned his Christian profession till his death.

At present the Moravians occupy ninety-four stations throughout the world, and they have 328 missionaries, and 67,413 in the congregations. It is stated as a remarkable fact that nearly one in forty-five of their adult members becomes a missionary. Their supplies are of the most frugal description. Of a net annual expenditure, regulated by the most rigid economy, of about 18,000*l.* ($87,300) the Brethren can raise among their own body scarcely a third part.

THE BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY held its annual meeting at Exeter Hall on May 1st. The Earl of Northbrook, who presided, said, among other remarks, "Let me state the impressions I have gained, during my residence in India, of the work which has been done by this and other Missionary Societies. I look upon it as a duty to assist to the best of my ability in the furtherance of Christian missions, and particularly do I feel a keen interest in the Baptist Missionary Society. It is now twenty-five years since I made the friendship of Mr. J. Clark Marshman, and a few years afterwards he sent me the book which most of you know very well, his "Biography of Carey, Marshman, and Ward." I read it carefully, and I may say that no man who has read it but will retain for the rest of his life a vivid impression of the valuable work done in India by these three men. The name of William Carey has become a household word in the mouths of all those who fear God and who speak the Anglo-Saxon tongue. I will not detain you by referring to what these men did. It was mainly owing to them that the Word of God has been translated into the various languages, and carried over the British dominions of India. By their own exertions before they died they contributed some 60,000*l.* ($291,000) to the work of missions in India. They started the College at Serampore, which still exists.

"About fifteen miles from Calcutta there is a villa belonging to the Government, where the Governor generally resides in the hot weather, and where I have often spent some very pleasant Sundays. Sitting beneath one of the finest banyan trees, the Governor-General in the evening can see the white walls of Serampore. My interest in this work was increased by being so near the spot, and by the visits I paid to Serampore ; but, besides this, I feel an intense sympathy with the principles on which this Society pursues its missionary work. It desires to act on the broadest principles of unity and concord with other Christian missionary societies, and it has religiously maintained the traditions of its founders, for we all know David Brown, Claudius Buchanan, and Henry Martin were associated with Carey, Marshman, and Ward.

"I myself have often found it of the greatest advantage to obtain the opinions of sensible missionaries on various matters, such as Alexander Duff, and Dr. Wilson, of Bombay.

"It is hardly more than eighty years ago since the Word of God was translated into one of the languages of the East, and if we have seen that word printed and published at so small a cost that it is in the power of the poorest man in British India to buy, we are beyond even the dreams of Carey, Marshman, and Ward when they set their feet in Calcutta, and we may look with every confidence to the future."

Among remarks of other speakers were the following :

A BRIGHT BENGALEE CHRSTIAN.

Jacob Mundle, of Khari, who died January 13th, 1879, was one of the brightest and best Bengalee Christians, and labored for nearly forty years in connection with the Baptist mission as both pastor and evangelist. When a boy he was received into the Boys' Christian Boarding-School. The lad was quick, intelligent, and docile, and made good progress in Bengali subjects of study, and acquired a fair acquaintance with the English language. While yet a youth he gave his heart to the Lord, and was baptized. He soon began to preach in and about Calcutta, exhibiting great zeal and earnestness. When he was barely twenty years of age, he was taken down to Khari, nearly fifty miles south of Calcutta, and on the edge of the Soonderbunds, that he might be the teacher of the newly-gathered converts of that quarter. He was the kind of man needed at this time to teach and guide the young community just brought out of heathenism, who were unlettered peasants and fishermen.

He was content to live among them as a friend and brother, spending and being spent for their good. He carefully studied his sermons, and preached in the markets and fairs with great impressiveness. In the course of years he became a man of influence and power in the neighborhood. In times of distress and calamity all classes hurried to him, and he was ready to the utmost of his power to help. The last years of his ministry were the best. The estimation in which he was held by all was shown when he was carried to his burial, for the whole country turned out to do honor to him. Hindus, Mussulmans, and Christians were present, for all knew that a good man had gone from them.

A MISSION SERVICE AT DELHI.

A considerable part of the service is occupied in praying, which exercises the gifts and promotes the devotion of the native Christians. Some time is also occupied in singing. To make this effective is a difficult part of the missionary's work, as he has often to lead, and must always control it. A fine voice is a great help, and this service of song is not the least attractive and influential to outsiders. Sometimes it is accompanied by instrumental music—the cithara, and the tabret, and the cymbal. The tunes are native, but consecrated by this use—generally wild and weird, but often pathetic.

The hymns are thoroughly evangelical. In them the name of Jesus is the most familiar strain. Being simple, they are thoroughly understood ; being largely repeated in the chorus, even those who cannot read learn and remember them. Night after night the congregation sits in the moonlight or in the gloom, scarcely broken by one or two lighted wicks floating in oil, and the missionaries preach the Word of light and comfort to these poor despised and neglected ones.

John Knox's Daughter Before the King.—Among the interesting details recently published by the Royal Historical Society relating to the great Scotch reformer is one which shows how his spirit lived again in his descendants. "Elizabeth Knox married in 1594 John Welsh, a Presbyterian minister, who was exiled in 1606 for his opposition to episcopacy. When her husband was in ill health and desired to return to Scotland, she sought an interview with King James, who asked her whose daughter she was. She replied, 'My father was John Knox.' 'Knox and Welsh,' said the king ; 'the devil ne'er made sic a match as that.' 'Maybe,' replied Mrs. Welsh, 'for we never speired his leave.' She then begged that her husband might be permitted to revisit Scotland, and the king said, 'He shall if he submit himself to the bishops ;' upon which Mrs. Welsh, holding out her apron, said, 'Sooner than he should do so I would keep his head there.'"

The Marquis of Lorne's New Book.—Lord Lorne has not altogether abandoned literature since he went to Canada. On the contrary, he has utilized a portion of the leisure from official duties in composing both prose and poetical descriptions of his travels in the Dominion. The Princess Louise, who is an accomplished artist, is expected to enhance the value of the forthcoming volume with sketches.

THE CHRISTIAN'S VOYAGE.

The Farewell Sermon of Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Evening, May 25.

"And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way; and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed."—ACTS 21: 5.

PAUL was an old sailor; not so much from occupation as from frequency of travel. I think he could have taken a vessel across the Mediterranean Sea as well as any of the old sea-captains. The crew never scoffed at him, or caricatured him, as a land-lubber. The fact was if the crew had taken Paul's advice that corn-ship would never have crashed into the breakers of Melita.

When the vessel went scudding under bare pole Paul was the only self-possessed passenger, and looking into the faces of the affrighted crew and the affrighted passengers with a voice that sounded out over the thunder of the tempest and the wrath of the sea, he cried out, "Be of good cheer." Those who now go to sea with maps and charts and compass, and with the warnings of buoys and lighthouses, know nothing about the perils of ancient navigation.

Horace says that the first man that ventured out to sea must have had a heart bound with oak and triple brass. The vessels only ventured from headland to headland, and from island to island, and hugging the coast as far as possible, and many years passed along before a vessel dared the open sea. When a vessel was to sail the weather was carefully watched. Meanwhile the ship had been hauled up on the beach, for it was not a very large craft, and at the right signal the crew would put their shoulders against the ship and heave it off, at the last moment springing aboard themselves.

Nearly all the ships were vessels of burden. Hardly any of them carried passengers. That was the exception when they carried passengers, for the world then was not so migratory as it is now, and people then were not smitten with the idea, as nowadays, that as soon as we get into one place we must begin to plan how we shall get into another place.

Well, nearly all the vessels in ancient times carried a flag, as our vessels carry flags; a neat flag was adorned with the picture of a heathen deity; there was one vessel which had on its flag a picture of Castor and Pollux, heathen deities. Each vessel had two anchors, one anchor to drop into the sea if it were necessary, the other to throw up on the rocks to hold the ship fast. This latter was called the hook-anchor, and it was to that probably that the Apostle Paul refers when he says, "which hope we have as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast, and which reaches to that within the vail." The hook-anchor not something to be cast down into the sea, but something to be thrown up on the rock—the eternal Rock of Ages.

As the vessel went on they would drop the fathoming line. Now it is 50 fathoms deep. Voyaging on, it is now 40 fathoms deep. Voyaging on, 30 fathoms deep, all the time coming nearer the shore. In the spring and summer and autumn the Mediterranean Sea was white with the sails of ships; but at the first wintry blast all the ships hide into the harbor. Although now commerce may prosper as well in January as in June, and cross the wintry seas; and there are palaces of light floating on the trembling billows through all the wintry weather, the terrible furnaces showering their sparks on the wild wind

Now it is as safe for a vessel to travel in the winter time as in the summer time, and the passengers, tippeted and shawled, sit under the shadow of the smoke-stack and look off upon the phosphorescent deep, on which is written in foam and fire, "Thy way, O God, is in the sea, Thy path is in the great waters." Well, my text shows a group of men, women, and children on the beach at Tyre. It seemed that these families had accompanied Paul to the beach. He was about to leave his congregation to whom he had administered, and they came to see him off. There was some counsel given, a few hasty good-bys, then the ropes were hauled in, the sails were hoisted, the planks drawn in, and Paul the Apostle and pastor has left; he is gone.

"And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way; and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed." Oh, that was A CHRISTIAN DEPARTURE; and so it always ought to be. If God spares my life this week I will depart from your midst. You are here to see me off. Many of you on Wednesday will see me off. Yet I am not ready to leave you until I give you as pastor some cheering word, and try to say something that may be for your present and everlasting happiness. And while the absence perhaps is too short for a formal farewell, the absence perhaps is long enough to make it most appropriate that I should speak to you some earnest word; for you know that this is an uncertain world, and sometimes the rail-train rushes from the track, and sometimes a steamer that goes out of one harbor never comes into another harbor; and it is most appropriate that to-night I should speak to you in words which would not be inappropriate if we never met again.

I. Now before I embark on the sea I want to be very certain that you, my hearers, are all going to embark for heaven, and I am here to-night to see you off. The Church of Jesus Christ is a great dry-dock for fashioning ships for the celestial voyage. There are great multitudes of them so fitting out, and I want you to understand that the ships that are fitting out in the dry-dock of the Church of God are made of the solidest timber—timber cut from the forests of eternal truth. All other shipping will go down in the cyclone of the Judgment, and only that hope which is founded in God, and that Christian character built out of the principles of God's word, can endure the stress of our last hour on earth, and the stress of the Judgment.

I know it is popular in some quarters to deride the church and to caricature it as an obsolete institution; but, my brethren, I am here to-night to tell you it is the grandest institution in all the world. The Lord Jesus Christ established it.

For her my tears shall fall,
  For her my prayers ascend;
To her my songs and prayers are given,
  Till tears and prayers shall end.

I bless God that in infancy I was baptized at her altars, and it is my hope when my work is done that some of these strong men will come from these very altars to carry me out to my last resting-place. Oh, Church of God! blessed home for his dear people! Here we want our children educated for time and for eternity. Glorious institution! "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?" The Church of Jesus Christ is a dry-dock where these ships for heaven are to be fashioned before they are launched.

But now how are they to be constructed? I have to tell you that the only safe rudder for such a ship, the only safe helm, is divine love, love to God, and love to man. If you make a helm out of worldly ambition, if you make it out of avarice, if you make it out of pride, if you make it out of any unconsecrated passion of the soul, it will be a very poor helm, and will stand you in no stead at all.

I mean practical Christian love, love that not merely betrays itself in the voice, but the lo that flashes in the eye, the love that goes fort to serve Christ, and to help men out of the sufferings, love married to works, which som look upon as so homely a bride. love faithful in a the duties of this life—faithful to the last. O what a helm that makes, what a guide across t stormy ocean of this life, what a guide into t haven of eternal rest! Oh, that God by His gr cious spirit would give us this Christian love!

But this vessel fashioned in the dry-dock the Church must have a prow of Christian p severance that it may meet the sorrows to co and ride over the wave. We are to meet all stacles and go straight ahead. It is the broads wave that fills the hatches and sinks the sh Troubles met are troubles conquered. straight ahead in the Christian life, stand on brow, and wipe from your brow the spray of split surge as you cry out, "None of th things move me; neither count I my life d unto myself that I may finish my course w joy." Be not disturbed, have the prow of Ch tian perseverance, but ride on and ride throu Moses in the ark of bulrushes will run dou war steamer. Blessed is that man that puts trust in God.

But we must have an anchor, the ancho hope, "which hope we have as an anchor." be very careful that you do not get a a anchor. You remember there is an old hym the anchor laid remote from home. Well, that is a very poor place to drop an anchor-mote from home. A minister was reading hymn one Sabbath, and an old sailor in the dience, forgetting the proprieties of the occas said, Why don't you weigh anchor then, if are remote from home? Why do you ke drag anchor? Why not start for the har "Which hope we have as an anchor to the sure and steadfast."

But, my friends, you must have sails to ship. That would be a strange ship that h sails; and I want to tell you that the sails fo voyage heavenward are faith; the winds of truth strike that sail, and waft us on and w heavenward. Oh, blessed be God for faith! believe; Lord help our unbelief. All the ises of the Gospel to encourage us enco our faith. Hoist the sail to-night, and more speed than ever before voyage on t the harbor.

But every ship has a running rigging; are the rakers, the halyards, and the fluke A ship must have them; without them it breast the wind, cannot hoist sail, cannot age the canvas. And on this ship tha heavenward we have the running riggin that is prayer. We lay hold of that rop we pull it. "If any man sin, we have an cate with the Father." By that halyard lift the soul, by that halyard we can bring a blessing. Faith, hope in God, prayer, Blessed is the place of morning and e prayer. Blessed is the supplication whi man offers when he is in trouble. Bles place where he knelt in the days of infar said the evening supplication. Blessed ing pillow where the departing spirit pray what a scene it is! angels joining wing over a departing spirit, watching, lookin to report, and then starting heavenward a ing, "Behold, he prays." We must ha running rigging of prayer.

But there is one more thing before this ship fitted out for heaven, and th must have a compass; and that is th We must keep looking at that every every night as it keeps pointing to th Bethlehem. Through thick storm and it works faithfully. Keep your eye on t pass, search the Scriptures, for in them ye have eternal life. Box the compass; compass.

II. But now the ship having a place in dock of the Church, having love for the and having faith for the sail, and havi for the running rigging, and having ho anchor, and having the Bible for a com nched for God, launched for heaven. And I e you two or three counsels for the voyage.

n the first place, I want you to see to it that ur appetites and passions have only an under- k passage. Mortify your members which are on the earth. Make all the evil appetites of ur nature take steerage passage if they go at Let watchers walk the deck, and with great mptness shoot down anything like mutiny of l habit and passion. Keep all the passions d appetites of your lower nature in the under-k passage. Having given you that counsel, ave another counsel to give you. And that is, k out for icebergs. These are cold Christians ating down from the arctic through the rches, frigid-zoned professors, one of them e to wreck a half dozen ships, men who have at profession for godliness, but having no e, wandering around, no congeniality in their nners—look out for the icebergs.

Standing in the forecastle, in the lookout of ship, see now as you cast your eye across the izon, standing on the prow of the ship, see if re are any icebergs. Oh, young Christians, er clear of those old Christians who have at formality in their prayers, and who give the idea that religion is a mere matter of fession, a cold heartlessness. One such man that will destroy you for time and destroy you eternity. Steer clear of the icebergs.

hen keep a log-book. Every sea captain has on rd of his vessel a log-book ; he puts down every just how many furlongs he goes, and in your age for heaven you must watch right closely ry day to see whether you are gaining, to see ether you are going ahead—whether you are ning or not. Every merchant keeps a day-k as well as a ledger, and you ought in your ristian life to watch not only the months, or year, but watch the days, watch the hours, l you want a log-book on board of this vessel. ou are on board of an express train, and the in halts at the depot, you hear the click of the nmers on the wheels of the train until the nmer strikes every wheel. Why? The eels must be examined ; the train would not safe in passage without it ; and no man will r want to travel on a rail train without the eels being sounded.

o going on with more speed than ever a train velled, and toward the eternal world, we want examine all the matters of the soul, all the eels of our immortal nature. Examine, ex-ine—keep a log-book.

ut, my friends, there are many counsels I ght offer you, but I must come now to the sing counsel on this part of my subject, and you to ow you can tell when you see a vessel on the whether it is a Russian vessel, an American sel, a French, or a Spanish vessel ; you can by the ensign, the star, the lion, the crown, cross, whatever it may be, and you want the ld to know whither you are sailing, and un-what government. Let everybody know that have started from the city of destruction for celestial city, nobody having to cry out, ither bound? Everybody, by the words of r mouth, and by the behavior of your life, wing you are bound for the port of heaven.

h, keep your colors up! run them up on these yards, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of rist." "It is the power of God, and the wis-n of God, to every one that believeth." Do be ashamed of your religion. Young man, as soon as, in the factory, or the banking ise, or the store, you are ashamed of Christ, r religion is going away from you. Remember t Christ says if you are ashamed of Him on h He will be ashamed of you when he neth with the holy angels.

eep your colors up. Then sailing on after a le you smell the land breezes of heaven ; the Lord Jesus, the pilot, will come ard the ship, and as you go through the nar-s of death He will say to you, "When thou seth through the waters I will be with thee ; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." Oh, will you start on that voyage to-night? The gang-planks are being hauled in, the last bell is ringing ; all aboard for heaven.

III. Before I leave you to-night I want to say two or three familiar things. And first of all I want in this closing service to testify before you and before all the world the faithfulness of Christ to his promises. I want to tell you this, young man, there is a great joy in religion, that her ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are peace. I have seen trouble and trial in the world at different times, and I am here to testify that I never went to God in trouble but He healed it. The more I know of Christ the better I love Him. He is the chief among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely. Oh, that the people would take the testimony I give to-night of the faithfulness of Christ, and that they would all submit and accept Him as their personal Saviour. You want Him now, you want Him in the judgment.

It is now about ten years since I came to labor among you. God has given us great prosperity. I have to record His mercy. At different times our church has gone through trials, trials of flood and trials of fire, but the Lord has delivered us and we have to-night an enlarged place, with more prospects of happiness and usefulness than at any period of this church's history. Bless the Lord, oh, my soul! Oh, what a place for usefulness for you and for me! Standing here, and sitting there Sabbath after Sabbath amid the throngs of people who are accustomed to gather here, what an opportunity to bring the people to Christ and to heaven!

How many hundreds of thousands of people during the years that this Tabernacle has stood have here come in to worship! Thousands, tens of thousands of them, have gone never to return to this, or perhaps to any other Christian sanctuary on earth ; and a great multitude of them have already reached the skies, and I will bless God to my dying day that in this presence I have so often had the opportunity of preaching the glorious Gospel of the grace of God.

And while I record my gratitude to God, I record my gratitue to you. I have loved you with an ardent love. In this, the moment of my parting from you, I can only pray upon your souls the richest benediction. Some of you I leave in trouble and trial. You have had bereavement in your household. You have had financial losses in the store. You have been rushed upon by the persecutions and misfortunes of this life. I cannot part from you to-night until I commend you to God and the word of His grace, which is able to comfort and able to rescue.

Do not try to carry your burdens alone. If this summer you have trial and misfortune, and I cannot personally address you in regard to them, remember these closing words in which I tell you that Christ is ready to lift all your burdens, and to sympathize in all your sorrows, and put away all your tears ; and remember that though you may have it hard in this world, weeping endureth only for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." (Psa. 126 : 6.)

To the aged I have a parting word. You are spending the evening of your days on earth. I commend you to the Lord Jesus. Lean heavily upon His arm. He will not forsake you in the time of old age. I never come back from my summer recreation but I find that some of the aged have gone ; and if before I return you go to the good place which God has provided for his people, while I mourn at your departure I shall rejoice in your joy. Blessed is that man who can live a Christian life, and then lie down in the peace of the Gospel and awake in glory.

And I must have a parting word with the great multitude of young people who are here to-night, surprising me by the fact that you came out through the storm which suddenly dashed down at the hour when the people were about to gather for the evening service. Oh, young men, take Christ. He was a young man ; on earth He was never anything but a young man, save the days of His boyhood and childhood ; He died a young man, He knows all the young man's temptations, and a young man's sorrows. Go to Him in every perplexity. If you are worried about matters in the store, about homesickness, about the fact that you do not get higher wages, about sickness, or about anything, go to God : He is able, He is willing, He is sufficient.

I am glad to know that there are so many hundreds of young men in Brooklyn who are loving God and keeping His commandments. I prophesy for them great worldly success, and at the last a high place in heaven. And if during this summer a shaft from the other world should strike any one of us, may it only hasten on the raptures which God has provided for His people. I will not utter a formal farewell, but I take your hand in both my hands and give you a loving GOOD-BY!

Roman Catholic Opinion of the Religious Condition of Europe.—The Tablet, the English organ of the Roman Catholic Church, laments over the decadence in the influence of the church over European Governments. It regrets that whatever propriety there was in former times in designating France, Austria, Spain, Italy, Bavaria, Belgium, and Portugal as Catholic States "has almost entirely disappeared." In Spain alone is the Government influenced by the Church, and even in Spain "the Catholicism of the State is superficial and formal, and nothing like a warm support of Catholic interest at home or abroad is to be looked for from those in power." In France, "the eldest daughter of the Church," five of the Ministers of State are Protestants, and of the remaining four not one is a practical Catholic ; while since Austria became a constitutional State "the Government can no longer be considered Catholic."

Giving up for Christ.—A little while ago, in Calcutta, a native, a Christian merchant, was deeply interested in a community of "outcasts," and he made an offer of $300 a year to any native Christian who would go and live among these people, and teach them the word of life. The offer had no sooner been made than a candidate for the office appeared. Who was he? As humble and devoted and consistent a Christian as you ever met. He was a professor in a Missionary college, an M.A. and LL.B. of the Calcutta University, and drawing a salary of $1000 a year. Such was the candidate for this office of $300 a year!

"Please, Sir, Don't Step There."—On a cold Sabbath morning in February, a gentleman was walking along, somewhat hastily, through the snow. He noticed a bright-looking little lad standing upon the pavement, with his cap in his hand and his eyes fixed upon one spot on the sidewalk. As he approached him he looked up to him, and pointing to the place, said, "Please don't step there, sir. I slipped there and fell down." What a different world this would be if all Christians were as particular as this lad to warn others against dangers, whether temporal or spiritual.

The People of Ireland have Realized so much benefit from the prohibition of the sale of drink on Sunday that they wish to place still further restrictions on the trade. Mr. Sullivan, an Irish member of Parliament, has introduced a Saturday Closing Bill, which, if passed, will have the effect of closing the drink-shops at an early hour on Saturday evening. There is a strong body of opinion in favor of the measure, most enthusiastic meetings are being held, and influential petitions adopted in its support.

The Nihilists in Russia have adopted a new and to them profitable plan. The other day Mr. Eisseeff, a rich wine merchant, had a letter handed to him by a stranger, containing an order from the Revolutionary Committee, duly stamped with the arms of the Society, and demanding 30,000 rubles as a contribution to "the holy cause of revolution." A warning was added that if Mr. Eisseeff refused to comply with the request his days would be numbered.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

Mr. Gogharty's Covetous Heart suggests new Unrighteous Schemes—But Hope Disappears—His High-minded Resolve—He hopes Percival will Secede to Rome—"A Consummation Devoutly to be Wished"—Conscience makes a Coward of Mr. Gogharty—He Writes to the Roman Catholic Bishop—An Appointment Arranged—Mr. Gogharty Unfolds his Base Plot to the Roman Catholic Bishop—The Bishop contemptuously Rebukes Him.

WHEN repentance is the result of self-reproach and cowardly fear, and does not spring from a new-discovered excellence in righteousness and truth, it is never permanent; and thus it was with Mr. Gogharty. Some remorse for being a partaker, by collusion, in a supposed murder, and torturing dread lest this collusion had, or would, certainly come to light, had inspired a satisfaction, as we have seen, in the lawyer's mind that the Ribbonmen's purpose of assassination had miscarried, and that his suppression of the letter he had received was unknown. When he bade Percival good-by on the night lately recorded and returned to his private room, feeling that his character was still safe, a sigh of relief escaped him, and he slept that night more peacefully than he had done for some time.

But still his covetous heart hankered after the property which his son, in his opinion, had so ruefully missed, and which, even as things were, nothing but Percival Montaigne's existence kept his boy from being heir to. "Oh that sudden and rascally thought of Sir Christopher's!" he would say to himself a dozen times a day; "a plague on it. Was there ever a more fantastic freak of remembrance! What a fool I was, to be sure, to write him about the birth of that luckless and ill-starred Percival Montaigne. This, I suppose, is what one gets in this world for taking an interest in other people's business."

One day while thus pondering, and with impotent regrets vexing his soul, upon second thoughts another reflection came up before him. "After all it was not absolutely necessary," he meditated, "that Percival Montaigne should die in order that his Alick should inherit. Sir Christopher had stated in his will," he recollected, "another strict and important condition, namely, that neither Percival Montaigne nor his own son Alick was to succeed to the estate unless they remained stanch Protestants and true to the Reformed Faith. Sir Percival said, I remember, he was right glad he thought of the clause; and," said Mr. Gogharty to himself, gleefully, "on this point I'm just like him, for I'm blest if I'm not heart glad, too, for it gives me another chance of cutting out this troublesome youth, Montaigne." This idea took joyful possession of his mind for days. "It was just the proper expedient to work," he said, "since it would not involve bodily injury, and yet it would, in its result, be just as effectual for my purpose as if the Ribbonmen, three times over, had victimized Montaigne."

A little further consideration, however, moderated, if it did not altogether damp, his satisfaction. "What likelihood in the world is there," he asked, "that young Montaigne can ever be induced to prove recreant to his Protestant creed?" And Mr. Gogharty, though his wish would gladly be father to the thought, to his deep sorrow could see none. "His father," he reflected, "had been a zealous Evangelical clergyman, his mother had carefully trained up her son in the same strict principles, the school where he was educated was noted for its Protestantism, and Huguenot blood flowed in the youth's veins. Surely the notion that he could be moved from the faith of his fathers—a faith in which he has been so indoctrinated and ingrained—is utterly Quixotic. Why," soliloquized Mr. Gogharty, "it's nothing less than moonshine madness to entertain the hope."

It is very wonderful, and illustrates the perversity of human nature, that when sinful acts come to be looked at as either personally unprofitable, or utterly impossible to be brought about, some consciences, which before had quietly allowed them, are moved to condemn them as decidedly wrong. It was thus with Mr. Gogharty. So long as the idea of Percival Montaigne being tempted to apostasy was supposed at all feasible, the lawyer's conscience either calmly gave its assent to the crime or peacefully slept over the contemplation of it; but now, when the project came to be deemed utterly impracticable and hopeless—and not until then—Mr. Gogharty allowed himself to confess that to set such a movement on foot was "certainly not innocent. Why," he said within himself, "it would be to tamper with the interests of his never-dying soul, and egad, that would be, at all events, as bad as making an attempt on his body. I, lawyer Gogharty, call myself a virtuous man, and as such I'll abstain from this impossible deed, and will have nothing to say to it."

But that this high-minded resolve had not a very powerful hold upon Mr. Gogharty's conscience was proved very soon. A few days after his virtuous soliloquy he was quite ready again to enter upon his nefarious scheme, as prompted by the following paragraph, which he lighted upon in a Scotch newspaper:

"Lady Harris, a very beautiful young widow, only twenty-six years old, has become a pervert to Popery. She has given over to the Jesuits her beautiful estate of Seacliff, in East Lothian, her prospects of 10,000*l.* a year from an old uncle, and all the treasures collected in India by her late husband, Sir William Cornwallis Harris. An only child, she has forsaken an aged grandmother and her mother, and has retired to a strict convent in Grenoble, in France."

"Ah, what a remarkable and delightful piece of news!" said Mr. Gogharty to himself; and so gratified was he, that he spoke loud enough to be heard, had any one been present in his room. "Ah, but this is something to look at and think about. What! a Protestant lady of rank and education become so enamored with the Romish Church that she resigns her estate, her prospects of great wealth, her nearest friend, even her mother—in fact every thing, at the bidding of the priests. Then, 'pon my word, 'tis clear as the noonday sun there must be an ineffable charm to some people in the creed of the Pope. Why, here is proof positive—plain as two and two make four—that under its spell a pervert can be led to sacrifice any thing."

But then, again, he reflected, with regret, that "it was, after all, only a woman who was got to do all this. Some poor creature, in fact," he said, "in whom not reason, but mere weak, feminine sentiment, held sway. One of the weaker vessels, you know—and I dreadfully fear the priest would find the Huguenot Montaigne of rather tougher material than this." Under the paragraph we have given, however, Mr. Gogharty found another piece of intelligence, to this effect, more to his mind:

"Mr. ——, only seventeen years of age, and brought up a stanch Protestant, has left his family, and has given himself over, as well as his whole patrimony, to the Jesuits."

And yet again another statement beneath this met Mr. Gogharty's rejoicing eyes: "A nephew of —— has given up 80,000*l.* on the day he came of age, and has gone over to the Church of Rome. A governess, in breach of her solemn promise never to do so, lent him Popish books." *

"Egad!" said the lawyer, "but isn't this good news?" and he placed the newspaper on his knee, to think. Mr. Gogharty was a Protestant by profession, and had been even a blatant one, at least politically, yet the idolatrous sin of covetousness had taken such hold upon his heart that he could feel gladness over these melancholy defections from the ranks of the Protestant cause, since they gave him hope that perhaps the perversion of young Montaigne to the Romish creed was not, after all, an issue so visionary as he had once feared. "That's a consummation," he said to himself, "to be devoutly (!) wished—and I declare I feel quite thankful I have so providentially (!) come across this paper, containing the news of these great and wonderful conversions. They have taken a load from off my mind, and I seem to myself to have passed as from a cold, dark, and drizzly mist into sunshine."

For some days Mr. Gogharty as a sweet morsel rolled over and over again in his thoughts the possible perversion of Sir Christopher's heir to the Romish Church—he even at times saw him, in imagination, reading his recantation in some gorgeous Romish church, and surrendering, under the enchantments of priestism, in his son's favor all his great prospects in life.

"I know," said he within himself, "that Montaigne is an honest and candid youth, and very conscientious—just like my son Alick, the fool and quite unfit for this world—and if he ca only be got to believe in the Pope, he'd g through with it and would sacrifice any thin and every thing to his conviction. How in th world, however, shall I get him to do as I wis or how shall I bring him into contact with th charm of the Romish system? Aye—that's th rub. I can't myself, that's certain, be the charme for—I couldn't for the life of me stoop to cha ter Popish mummeries. I'd burst out into laugh if I attempted it. And even if I coul his mother, the fond mamma, keeps him t close to her apron-strings to give me the chanc Yet the thing must be done somehow, that's po 'Pon my word, I'll have a talk with Father C hili, our good parish priest, about it."

When Mr. Gogharty, however, came to car out this resolve, he saw considerable ground f hesitation. He was about to betray a solemn tru —wished to carry out a shameful act of treac ery against those for whom he had professed sincere friendship—was, in addition to th about to act the betrayer to his own creed. I ether Cahill was a townsman—he would often h to meet him in the street, on committees, a elsewhere, and though he proposed to bring ab an event that would serve the priest's chur could he, if he took counsel with him in matter, ever again without a blush look him the face? No, he would not, and could n broach the matter to him. It would be from expedient—he would consult a more tant, and yet a more eligible and likely co sellor—he would seek an interview with Roman Catholic Bishop himself.

This church dignitary soon received the lowing short epistle: "A lawyer, a Protest respectfully and anxiously solicits an interv with Bishop ——. He is aware that, bein a stranger, he has no claim upon him for the ho r and privilege which he seeks. But should Bis p —— grant the favor asked, he is satis d Bishop —— will admit that the request is warranted. The Protestant lawyer does not e his name, as Bishop —— does not know h. But a reply sent to —— will find him."

Bishop —— was naturally of an honorable d upright disposition, and had not received is consecration to the Roman Catholic episco te in the days of Ultramontane usurpation and d. He was a bishop of the old school in Irel d, and had ever championed the ancient liberti of the Irish Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Gogharty's letter was both a surprise a d a puzzle to the bishop. It was certainly ver indefinite, and even enigmatical, and he was ite at a loss to understand what it could lly mean. He handed it to the priest who act as his secretary, and asked him what he thoug of it, and what answer he should give.

Father Garrett, the secretary, was a ich younger man than the Bishop, and had a y ng man's sanguine temperament and zeal. once read Mr. Gogharty's letter as that o one who had in secret abandoned his Protestan sm and who wished to consult the Bishop, on some doubtful questions of conscience, a to arn from him the best method of openly de-aring his change of belief.

* All these extracts are taken from printed statements in the public press.

"Don't you see, my lord, it must be this?" e said; "otherwise he would not have put the ord Protestant after the statement of his pro-ssion of the law. Why it's as clear as daylight me that this is the interpretation of the letter."

"It may be so," replied the Bishop; "and t, though there have been of late some blessed d marvellous secessions of Protestants to Holy hurch, I have not full confidence that you e right. From a convert I should expect a ore confiding and detailed letter. However, I ink you had better write and tell this gentle-an, whoever he may be, that I will see him—d mention Wednesday, at two o'clock."

At the appointed hour Mr. Gogharty, in pur-ance of his scheme of entrapping Percival ontaigne into becoming a Roman Catholic, rived at the Bishop's residence, and was con-cted into his presence. The lawyer, seeing at another person, Father Garrett, was in the om, hesitated to make known the purport of s coming, and requested from the Bishop a ivate interview. All superior ecclesiastics in e Romish Church, and, indeed, the inferior ergy too, upon principle, are cautious, and shop —— had no idea of trusting himself one with a perfect stranger, so he said, "This, , is a private interview. We priests of the oly Catholic Church are trained, you are aware, secrecy and a wise reticence, so that you may gard my secretary, Father Garrett, as not esent."

Mr. Gogharty, feeling in his inmost soul the seness of the scheme he was meditating, rank from expressing it in the presence of a ird person. Upon the firm assertion, however, the Bishop that no interview more secret ould be granted, with bated breath and consid-able nervousness he opened up the task of con-rsion to his creed which he had come to ask e Bishop to undertake.

As he proceeded in the exposition of his shes and his aims the Bishop eyed him. full wonder and contempt. In the confessional, ring his parish priesthood, he had come across ean and perverse specimens of human nature, it he felt he never had had revealed to him a ore despicable man than the one who now stood fore him.

When Mr. Gogharty concluded his speech, hich he was permitted to deliver without the ghtest interruption, the Bishop thus addressed m: "Sir, you have not told me your name, d I am glad of it, and after your words, now oken, I do not wish—shall never wish—to ow it; but I must take the liberty of making own to you one or two of my thoughts. You ve candidly declared that you have no faith in e creed nor sympathy with the progress of the ly Catholic Church—that, in fact, you are a rotestant both in religion and politics, and at your whole desire for getting the ward of hancery you speak of into the blessed fold of e Church is that your son should, in this ent, succeed to the fortune which you envy e present heir. I am zealous for my Church," id the Bishop, "as alone the depository of the uth, but I must tell you plainly, sir, that I shall ever sanction such a method of serving her as u propose. Take my advice, sir, and never ain your conscience with a crime that would ake you as another Judas—selling and betray-g the cause of your religion for gold.

"So far your scheme is only a proposal, and hile wicked in intention, be thankful that as t it is not overt in act. I must also say it is e of the most visionary enterprises I ever ard of. This, however, takes nothing from its ilt. I exhort you, in the name of God," said the ishop, "to go no further with it, and, inviolably cret here, your having entertained it shall ever be known."

Mr. Gogharty was confounded. He stood as e dazed and stunned before the ecclesiastic, ho he fully expected would, con amore, enter to his scheme.

THE DEPARTURE OF DR. TALMAGE.

If any evidence of Dr. Talmage's immense popularity had been needed, the events of Wednesday morning, May 28th, when he commenced his voyage to Europe, would have furnished that evidence most abundantly. Had an ambassador of the republic been about to set sail on a mission of national importance, scarcely more enthusiasm could have been called forth.

The morning opened with a lowering sky which threatened to break up any moment in torrents of rain. But the apparent certainty of a thorough wetting did not prevent an eager crowd assembling, both in Brooklyn and New York, to say good-by to the eminent preacher whose projected excursion to Europe had been "common fame." By ten o'clock, however, the sun broke forth bright and warm, and it was under a cloudless sky that Dr. Talmage bade a temporary adieu to his native land. The Tabernacle congregation had resolved to see the last of their beloved pastor, and had, with their customary disregard for expense, chartered the steamer Grand Republic to accompany him down the bay.

At half past eight o'clock Jewell's dock, Brooklyn, was crowded with intending passengers who hurried on board and soon filled both upper and lower decks of the vessel. It seemed as if not only the Tabernacle congregation, but nearly all Brooklyn, had come down to wish the pastor a happy and prosperous trip. Judges, clergymen, professors, and aldermen mingled with throngs of well-dressed ladies, and the humbler classes in their working attire had snatched an hour to join in the ovation. The band of the 23rd Regiment were on board, and played appropriate airs; and shortly before nine, Arbuckle, with a black bag containing the famous silver cornet, wended his way to the deck. A little before nine the cheering announced that the Doctor was in sight, and by and by he was seen coming on board, accompanied by his wife and daughter and a few of his intimate friends.

The worry of the trial has left its mark on Doctor Talmage's countenance, and a weary, anxious look reigns there, which his friends hope the voyage and change of scene may effectually dissipate. Mrs. Talmage, bright and cheerful as usual, was by his side, as she has been during all the hours of his trouble, and it was easy to see, as the husband now and again glanced at her, that he has been accustomed to find her presence a solace to him in his afflictions. On his other side walked Miss Jessie Talmage, the Doctor's eldest daughter, who accompanies the pair to Europe, her beautiful and intelligent face expressing with what pleasure she anticipated the trip.

The Talmage party on board, the lines were thrown off, and the Grand Republic, with three thousand passengers on board, every rope alive with bunting, and on the mizzen-mast a large flag floating, emblazoned "Brooklyn Tabernacle," steamed down the river round the Battery to the new wharf of the Cunard Company in New York. There lay the splendid new vessel the Gallia, now about to start on her third Transatlantic trip.

It had not been clearly understood when Dr. Talmage would come on board, and the Gallia had for some time been crowded with Gothamite admirers of Dr. Talmage, looking everywhere for the eloquent preacher. Large bouquets and the customary "lucky horseshoes" composed of lilies of the valley, etc., were in great profusion in all parts of the vessel, and in the saloon the tables were covered with these sweet souvenirs with the bon voyage cards attached. When it was evident Dr. Talmage was not on the Gallia, expectant faces were turned riverwards, the visitors rightly judging he would come in the Tabernacle steamer. Soon she was seen approaching the pier, and cheers from the crowded dock and the deck of the Gallia announced that the Talmage party had been recognized among the thousands of passengers which thronged her decks.

Amid the waving of handkerchiefs and ringing shouts of the people Dr. Talmage stepped on to the pier, and for a few minutes it seemed as if he would be overwhelmed by the number of friends eager to get a parting shake of his hand. He was obviously deeply affected by the enthusiastic feeling manifested, and shook hands right and left with the utmost cordiality. But a warning signal from the Gallia showed the necessity for prompt measures, and as the Doctor seemed unable to rescue himself, his friends did it for him. One seized his right arm, and another his left, and with a guard in advance and in the rear, he was hurried on board like a deserter from the ship, or a disorderly militiaman, and was soon seen, with his wife and daughter by his side, at the Gallia's stern waving his hat in response to his friends on the pier, while the Grand Republic drew off to await the starting of the ocean steamer.

Soon the big Cunarder was seen slowly moving out of the dock, and three enthusiastic cheers for Dr. Talmage and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs sent the good-by from the shore to the distinguished voyager.

The Grand Republic, with band playing "The Sweet By and By," followed close in her wake, the pastor and his party with some Christian people on the Gallia responding. Then followed "My Country 'Tis of Thee." Then a verse of the "Old Hundredth" and "Home, Sweet Home." Then at 12.15, as the Gallia passed the Narrows, the Grand Republic dipped her colors, and with the band playing "Auld Lang Syne" and a parting cheer from three thousand voices, she turned her head for the Battery, and the Tabernacle congregation had seen the last of their friend and pastor till September, when, if many earnest prayers are answered, the goodness of God will bring him back to a welcome as hearty as the "send off" with which his departure was enlivened.

Heroic Irish Sergeant.—Napier records in his history of the Peninsular war that at the desperate battle of the Coa, in Spain, in 1810, Major M'Leod led four companies of his regiment, the Forty-third, against masses of the enemy, to save a wing of the Fifty-second, who would otherwise have been cut off from the bridge across which they were obliged to retreat. Through a gap in some rocks which must be won to command the ground and defend the passage, two muskets were pointed, whose contents awaited the first British soldier who should attempt to ascend by that way. An ensign of the regiment found himself in the position which made it his duty to tread this pathway of death. Nothing flinching, he went on, but just at the moment when the rush was to be made, a young Irish sergeant, Robert M'Quade, gently pulled the officer back, saying, "You are too young, sir, to be killed," and stepping forward received the contents of the two muskets, and fell dead pierced by both balls. That young officer, then sixteen, became General Sir George Brown, who commanded the Light Division of the English army in the Crimea. Sergeant Robert M'Quade was only twenty-four! No marble records this royal munificence of costliest devotion! But it reminds us of the text, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend" (John 15:13).

Missionaries Poisoned.—The "Sydney Advocate" announces a great disaster as having fallen on the New Guinea mission of the London Society. The disaster happened in New Guinea, on the South-east Cape. Six teachers, landed there by the mission steamer John Williams, have been poisoned, the natives placing upas wood in their drinking water. Of twenty men landed in this district only five now remain, the rest having died of poison and fever. These men were converted Polynesian teachers. Mr. Lawes, who settled the teachers, appears to have had confidence in the honesty and friendliness of the natives. New Guinea, is next to Australia, the largest island in the world; it is people with Papuans, and sailors tell horrible tales of the barbarities practised on unfortunate shipwrecked crews who have been cast away there.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the American public and readers of his sermons. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

DR. TALMAGE says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Legislative Appropriation Bill has Received a prompt veto from the President. As his message points out, the same principle which dictated his former vetoes requires this one. The aim of the clauses incorporated with the bill was to abridge, if not to annihilate, the power of the central government over the elections, and to confide their complete control to the respective States where they take place. President Hayes states his belief that the effect of such alterations would be prejudicial to the freedom of elections, and that there may occur cases in which the interference of United States authorities is absolutely necessary to a fair poll. He therefore declines to sanction a law by which the Marshalls and Supervisors would be stripped of their powers.

The message was received by the Republicans with enthusiastic cheers, and it is obvious the President's action has the hearty approval of his party. Voting on the bill resulted in a failure to pass it over the veto.

The Warner Silver Bill passed the House May 24th, after an all-night sitting, when members had to be hunted up at their homes and haunts through the city to get the bill through. It is generally expected that the Senate will reject the measure.

The Republican Nominations in the Pivotal State has resulted in the selection of ex-Congressman Charles Foster as the candidate of the party for the gubernatorial chair. His platform is of the ultra-Republican order, and he is strongly opposed to the present tactics of Congress on the Appropriation bills and the electoral questions. The majority last year was little over three thousand, so that the union of the Democratic and National vote would probably place the Republican candidate in a minority. It was therefore important that the nomination should be one acceptable to the whole party, and Mr. Foster modestly says he was chosen not for any special merits of his own, but because it was thought he would poll more votes than any one else. It is generally thought that the nomination of Mr. Foster points to Sherman rather than Grant as the Republican candidate for the Presidency; at any rate, the Grant "boom" does not appear to have reached Ohio as yet.

A Destructive Cyclone Passed Over Kansas City, Mo., and the neighborhood for a circuit of seventy-five miles, May 30th, doing great damage to life and property. It extended through nearly the whole northern tier of counties in the State, but was most violent between the Blue Rapids and Centennial Stations, on the Central Branch Railroad, and about thirty miles apart. The storm moved in a direction a little north of east, and passed into Nebraska through Richardson county. The town of Irving, ninety miles west of St. Louis, was nearly destroyed. At that point the storm took the character of a cyclone, and levelled everything in its path. It passed over several flourishing towns, literally wrecking them and leaving traces of its tremendous power in levelled habitations, destroyed public buildings, and uprooted trees. The cyclone then passed east and struck the town of Fulton, unroofing sixteen houses, tearing up immense trees, and killing nine more people. Among the buildings destroyed were the Presbyterian church, school buildings, post-office, and two elevators; also the ninety-foot span of the iron bridge across the Blue River, the iron rods and girders being twisted like willow stems.

Ten Children Have Been Poisoned at Island Pond, Vermont, by drinking water from a brook. Twenty-seven children drank the water; all are suffering more or less seriously, and it is feared that more deaths will occur. The bodies of a horse and two sheep had been thrown into the brook, and also the tops of plants on which Paris Green had been placed to destroy the bugs. The water has been analyzed and pronounced poisonous. It is expected that prosecutions will be initiated against the persons whose culpable carelessness has led to the fatal result.

A Smuggler was Lost in the Niagara Rapids on Sunday, May 25th. The deceased was well known in the neighborhood, being a skilful oarsman, and it is stated he had rescued several persons from destruction at the very place where he lost his own life. He started from Port Day to row to Goat Island while in a state of intoxication, and his boat drifted insensibly into the rapids. The man saw his danger, and worked hard to avoid it, but in his drunken state he missed his hold and fell backward into the boat, and was either stunned or too much under the influence of liquor to regain his seat. Even then he had another chance of life, for the boat grounded at some rocks where he might have got out and awaited assistance; but the poor drunkard was unable to take advantage of his opportunity, and the stream again seized the boat and carried it swiftly to destruction.

It is remarkable that a catastrophe at Niagara is an event of rare occurrence, although the rapids are so swift and powerful, but the demon of drink, which was responsible for this man's sad fate, is daily involving thousands in a destruction of which Niagara is the fit emblem.

Slanders on the South.—Governor Colquitt, of Georgia, who has been on a visit to New York, entered a vigorous protest against the slanders propagated against the Southern States, and especially against Georgia. Governor Colquitt said:

"There is not a more orderly or law-abiding, justice-loving people in America than the people of Georgia. The statistics will show that, population considered, there are fewer crimes in Georgia than in the most of the commonwealths of the Republic. We have a perfect administration of justice. No man can commit crime and escape the penalty of the law. Our justice i equal and protects all classes. In my administration, white men have been hung for the killing o negroes. I guarantee that no State, North o South, will show a people more thoroughl peaceable or peace-loving than ours—more en tirely devoted to the material recuperation c their State than the Georgian." There is n doubt Governor Colquitt is able to speak au thoritatively on the subject, for no man know more of the State than he. There is also goo reason to place reliance on his utterances, for h is a man whose fine Christian character and pu rity of motive and action have won for him th respect of all parties.

Archbishop Purcell's Banking Disaster h been made the subject of an appeal by the R man Catholic hierarchy of this country. It proposed to ask the adherents of that Church contribute sufficient funds to pay in full t claims of the depositors in the broken ban The amount required will be over two milli dollars, a large sum to pay for the costly blu ders of the priest-banker. In the interest of t depositors, the majority of whom are poor, a whose claims represent savings made with di culty, to provide for sickness and old age, it hoped the appeal will meet with a prompt a liberal response.

Color Blindness Among Railroad Emplo may have caused catastrophes which have b denominated accidents. Some important ob vations in Europe have been followed by in tigation here. The result has been to sh that the defect exists to an alarming extent. has been found that among the employés single railroad company in this country in tw per cent of the whole number the sense of ion is deficient in this particular. Not all affected alike. Some cannot distinguish co at all; others, while able to distinguish broader lines of color, are incapable of discr nating shades and related hues. When it i membered that danger is indicated by a di ence in the color of a signal, it is easy to see serious may be the consequences where th sponsibility for the safety of a train of pas gers is committed to a man to whose eye all ors are pretty much alike. In the interes the travelling public, no time should be lo guarding against this grave danger.

)rigin of the Foundry Church at Washing- ı.—Many years ago before the Declaration of lependence a young mechanic came over from gland, who, when in London, had been in habit of worshipping at the Old Foundry urch. He settled in Georgetown, and erected oundry, where some of the cannon used by American army in the war of 1812 were cast. ter the battle of Bladensburg the British burned Capitol, the President's house and public ildings, and retreated, leaving Foxall's foundry touched, whether by accident or design does t appear. But the circumstance touched the art of Mr. Foxall, and he resolved that as a d Providence had spared his property he uld make return by building a house unto the rd. Accordingly he went on the "other side the creek," purchased a site and erected a urch, and called it Foundry, after the old London Foundry, and in deference to the miraculous cape of his own foundry.

Cremation of an Indian.—The Rev. J. G. ady, a missionary in Alaska Territory, thus scribes the burning of the body of a woman at ka: "A few days ago I witnessed a sorry ectacle—viz., the cremation of a woman who d been drowned. When the burning began I ard a low, plaintive wail and the shrieks of e women. There were four dry logs placed le by side on the ground. The body was aced on these, and then side and end logs were ilt up covering the top. Light, dry kindling this pile all in a blaze. I noticed that one oman threw on several blankets. Eight men ng and beat time with long sticks, which they ruck upon the ground. A man and woman pt dealing out bottle after bottle of hoochenoo. is was given to but a few. I noticed that one d woman took glass after glass, and she must ve drunk over a quart while I was standing. ey kept this ceremony up for half a day, going rough all their superstitious rites. I went ay feeling sad, and prayed that such sights ight not be witnessed very often in the future."

The Learned Blacksmith, as the late Elihu urritt was designated, had acquired a store of owledge far more extensive than many men hose fortunes raised them above the necessity daily toil for daily bread. The following record of one day's work is extracted from his ary, and shows how full of occupation his days ere:

"Tuesday, sixty-five lines of Hebrew, thirty ages of French, ten pages of Cuvier's Theory, ght lines Syriac, ten ditto Danish, ten ditto ohemian, nine ditto Polish, fifteen names of ars, ten hours' forging."

Remarkable Fulfilment of a Dream.—Two oung men, both living at Norridgewock, in aine, met one morning years ago, and one said the other: "Charles, I dreamed last night at you were a Judge of the Supreme Court of aine, that I was a minister, and that you called n me to open your court with prayer." Just irty years after this the Rev. Dr. Charles F. llen, late President of the State College, happened to step into the Supreme Court room in ugusta. Judge Charles Danforth beckoned to im, and asked him to open his court with rayer; and the dream of thirty years before as verified.

Gough Memorial Coffee Tavern at Sandgate. —Fifty years ago on the 3d June next, Mr. ough left Sandgate in England, a soldier's son, start in life, and his name is now a household ord throughout the world in the temperance ause. It is proposed, in recognition of his laors and the success that has attended them, to rect a coffee tavern in his native village of Sandate. Suitable premises have been secured, at a ost of about $7680, and it is estimated that a urther sum of $6720 will be necessary to complete and establish it on a permanent basis. It much desired that all the arrangements conected with this memorial may be completed by he 3d of June, on which day Mr. Gough has romised to open it publicly.

Sandgate (near Folkestone, in the South of England), besides its ordinary population of 2300, is in immediate proximity to the large military camp at Shorncliffe. Besides the regular canteens on the camp, there are no less than thirteen public-houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks in the village, and which are largely frequented by soldiers and sailors. There is therefore the greatest need of a coffee tavern, as none at present exists. As this is intended to be a public memorial to Mr. Gough, it is proposed that all profits accruing shall be devoted to the furtherance of the temperance cause. The tavern is to be vested in the hands of trustees, and managed by a committee. It is intended to make it a national memorial to Mr. Gough.

A Pathetic Instance of a Child's Love and faith was shown recently after a school examination. The little one was the only child of her mother, "and she was a widow." To her great delight she was awarded a reward of merit, and she ran eagerly to her mother, saying: "I held it up to the sky all the way home, that papa might see what a good girl I had been."

An Old Enemy Conquering.—Last winter a miner went to a town in the Far West, and promptly joined a church there and engaged with great energy in Christian work. It was a struggling church, and help was much needed. The miner labored assiduously in the Sunday-school and other departments, and became a valuable and valued officer. But one morning while laboring in the mine he caught a severe cold and was persuaded by his fellow-miners to take a little liquor to cure him. It turned out that the man was a reformed drunkard; the liquor he took as medicine awoke the sleeping appetite within him, and he once more fell under its power. From drinking his orgie led to quarrelling and to fighting, and ended in his death. The last scene where he lay on his death-bed, penitent and filled with remorse, was most pathetic. He died praying for mercy on himself and comfort for his wife and children in their Eastern home.

Settling Accounts is a Very Proper and Commendable habit, but it is not proper employment for Sundays. A clergyman lately made a very pertinent rejoinder to an infidel who boasted that he spent his Sunday in that way. The infidel said sarcastically, "I always spend Sunday in settling my accounts." The reverend gentleman did not explode into invective, as his interlocutor anticipated, but simply replied, "And you will probably spend the day of judgment in the same way."

"My Mother, New York, America," was the address of a letter received at New York, and preparations were made to send it to the Dead Letter Office. The same day, however, a woman called at the general delivery window and asked for a letter from her son. The gentleman who has charge of the deciphering bureau was struck with the coincidence, and sent for the letter alluded to above. He asked the woman where her son lived, and when she gave the name of the town it was found to be the same as the postmark on the letter. Other inquiries justified the official in delivering the letter to the woman, but he insisted that she should open it there, and on examination it was discovered that it was from her son, and that she was the person for whom it was intended. Of course, if she had asked for a letter addressed to her name the answer would have been that there was no such letter. Among other curious letters received lately was one addressed to "J. H. Johnson, waggon and plough-maker; all kinds of work promptly attended to; America."

Presents with a Motive.—An Enterprising manufacturer has introduced a novel mode of advertising. To dwellers along the lines of the elevated roads he has given boxes of plants to place outside of their second-story windows. On each box is an advertisement of his goods, which is thus prominently displayed to the passengers in the cars.

FORTS DEMOLISHED AND PRISONERS TAKEN.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."—2 CORINTHIANS 10: 5.

A Remarkable Spectacle—Story of a Bishop taken Prisoner—A Warfare in our own Souls—I. Fortresses Demolished—The Fortresses Garrisoned —1. By Indifference—2. By the Idea that God is Already Known—3. That His Help is not Needed—4. By the Belief that something better than Revelation is Already Known—5. By a Despair of ever Knowing—All these Fortresses must be Demolished—II. Prisoners Taken—III. Prisoners Led Captive—The Thoughts Carried to another Region—Judgment and Understanding brought into Subjection—The Will Subdued—Hope Spellbound—All the Powers of the Man Restrained and Directed—Details of the Campaign—No Mortgage left for the Devil—The Conquest Complete.

THIS chapter presents the remarkable spectacle of a minister of the Gospel of peace going forth to war. At first sight we wonder how the meek and gentle Paul should speak about warring and talk of pulling down strongholds, and "having a readiness to revenge all disobedience." The surprise is all the greater because he is going to war in the church: a shepherd entering the fold with a sword. One would not so much marvel that he carried his weapons against the outside world, but on this occasion it is within the church at Corinth that he is about to commence a campaign.

Note, moreover, that his weapons are of a peculiar kind,—"The weapons of our warfare are not carnal." He is not about to assault his antagonists in the church with bitter words of railing such as they used against himself; he is not about to meet the philosophers with such philosophies and sophisms as those with which they assailed the Gospel; neither is he coming forth with any kind of temporal weapon to inflict aught of injury upon the leaders in error; his weapons are of a very different sort. They are not carnal, but spiritual. Trials under a Public Worship Act he knew nothing of, an appeal to Cæsar upon church matters never crossed his mind. For the Church of God ever to avail itself of force or compulsion in order to propagate its doctrines would be clean contrary to the spirit of Christianity: for the Christian bishop to become a soldier, or employ the secular arm, would seem to be the very climax of contradiction.

A warrior ambassador is a dream of folly. I remember a story which illustrates that absurdity. When a certain bishop-prince in the olden times went forth himself personally to battle, and was taken prisoner, the Pope sent word to the king who had captured him that he was to set him at liberty at once, for he was a son of the Church. The king, with considerable wit, sent back to the Pope the coat of armor which the bishop had worn on the field with this message, "This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no."

And so we might send back, I think, to the nominal Church the black and blood-stained gown of the Inquisition, the garb of the headsman and the hangman, the smoke-browned raiment of those who lighted the Smithfield fires, and even the parchments on which are written the Test and Corporation Acts, and the Act of Uniformity, and say, "Know now whether these be thy sons' coats or no." Is the raiment of a man of war the vestment of a servant of the Lord? Are robes of legal authority the adornments of heralds of peace? Jesus Christ did not thus array his apostles when he sent them forth to the war, and not with such weapons did Paul arm himself when he entered the conflict.

The passage, if I were to confine it to its immediate connection, would represent Paul as dealing with those lofty ones who had usurped authority in the church at Corinth, who denied his apostleship, and set themselves up as superior to him, while they themselves preached error, and led the people astray. Paul declared that when he came among them armed with the power with which God had clothed him he should overthrow every proud opposition, and convince them all of the truth to their conversion or to their confusion.

But I shall speak rather of a warfare carried on in individuals, a warfare in our own souls, for what is true of the triumphs of the Gospel in the mass is true because it gains the like conquest over individuals. While I am speaking of the war of the Gospel against sin within the heart of man, may you who have never felt its power be praying that it may conquer even you, and may those who have experienced its sacred omnipotence be pleading to be yet more completely subjugated to its sway!

"Great King of Grace, our hearts subdue,
May we be led in triumph too,
As willing captives to our Lord,
To sing the victories of His Word!"

There are three things in the text worthy of our observation. The first is fortresses demolished—"casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God;" then, secondly, prisoners seized—"bringing into captivity every thought;" and thirdly, prisoners led away captive—for such is the force of the Greek "bring into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ,"—as if the captured ones were taken away and put under new service to the anointed Prince.

I. First, let us look at

FORTRESSES DEMOLISHED.

When the Gospel endeavors to penetrate the human heart it meets with earthworks of prejudice, which men have cast up to screen their minds from the force of the truth. Many things are opposed to the knowledge of God. The object sought for is that men may be brought to know God, to know who He is and what He is, to know their relation to Him as fallen men, to know His plan of restoration, to know Him in Christ Jesus, and so to know as to love Him, to obey Him, and to become like Him. This is the great object for which the Gospel is sent into the world, that the knowledge of the glory of God may cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. But men desire not the knowledge of God's ways, and shut up their hearts against the entrance of divine light by many reasonings and imaginings.

1. Some are garrisoned against the knowledge of God by the feeling that they do not want to know God. The masses of our fellow-countrymen are not so much opposed to the Gospel as indifferent to it. They pass by our places of worship and they see their neighbors entering, and they sometimes say, "Who preaches there?" but "What is preached there?" is a question seldom asked.

Men nowadays pass by the cross as if a dying Saviour were nothing to them. Graceless zealots, as they call them, may fight about their creeds: as for them, they have something more practical to think of. "What shall we eat? what shall we drink? and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" are far more important questions to them than "what must we do to be saved?" This intrenchment has to be carried, and the Gospel does carry it by the power of the Holy Ghost, for it flashes conviction on the soul, creates alarm, arouses apprehension, and so storms the stronghold of indifference and utterly demolishes it.

2. Amongst the other "imaginations" with which man fortifies himself is the idea of many that they know already. Trained from their childhood in false doctrine, they hold fast to it, and defy the Gospel to reach them. They are Christians by birth, they say, forgetting the inspired declaration,—"that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit."

Others make up their minds as to what the knowledge of God ought to be, and of course they quarrel with God's view of things. They fashion a god and a gospel after their own fond notions, and then they dream that they have reached the sum of wisdom. They refuse to go to school to Christ, and when He says, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of God," they turn from Him with disdain. They know quite enough, and are resolved to learn no more. A large proportion of our fellow-men are in this condition, and are perfectly content and satisfied to remain as they are.

Nothing shuts the heart more completely against the knowledge of God than the conceit that we know already and need no teaching from above. There is no need of revelation, and the Bible is worthless; there is no need of an incarnate Deity, and Calvary is a superfluity, if men already know God apart from the Lord Jesus, and the Word by which He is pleased to reveal Himself. Let but the Holy Spirit bring this home to a man's heart and he begins to cry out against his own pride, he bemoans his own blindness, and he is quite willing to become a fool that he may be wise, a child that he may sit at Jesus' feet.

3. Another intrenchment, behind which many are hiding securely, is the idea that if they do not know God they can find Him out without His help. This is a very general notion nowadays. Scientific thought is supposed to be the way for finding out God Himself, and the old Scripture is out of date which says, "Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live."

Plain truth is in this wonderful century of small account; men crave to be mystified by their own cogitations. Many glory in being too intellectual to receive any thing as absolute certainty: they are not at all inclined to submit to the authority of a positive revelation. God's Word is not accepted by them as final, but they judge it and believe what they like of it.

THIS IS MADNESS.

I speak to those who believe in the Scriptures, and I say if, indeed, there be a revelation, it becomes us to be silent before it, and accept it without dispute. The Lord knows what He is better than we can ever know, and if He has been pleased to speak in His Word plainly and solemnly, it is ours to believe what He says, because He says it. It may be all very well to prove that such and such a revelation of God is consistent with reason, consistent with analogy, consistent with a thousand things; but the spirit which needs such argument is a spirit of rebellion against God. If there be a revelation, every part of it is of authority, and must be believed. Human thought is not the arbiter of truth, but the infallible Word is the end of all strife.

The Scriptures pressed home by the Holy Ghost are God's power unto salvation, and not men's cogitations and imaginations. There is the revealed Gospel—reject it at your peril; there is Jehovah's revelation of Himself to men—receive it or be lost; this is the ground to go upon if we would speak as the oracles of God. God grant that proud thinkers may come upon this ground and become believers.

4. Here we are boldly met by some who say, "We do not want this doctrine which you call the knowledge of God: we know of something better already. We tell you that your Gospel, about which you make such a fuss, is outworn and done with." Treat it so, sirs, and perish, if you will, but as for us, we will mourn day and night over your unbelief. You will surely destroy your souls in rejecting the Divine testimony, but in so doing you will prove that Word to be true, which saith that the Gospel is a savor of death unto death as well as of life unto life.

You know better, you say; but how can this be? Do you know God better than God knows Himself? Do you know more about His way of reconciling men to Himself than His own messenger, the Lord Jesus Christ, knows? Do you profess to know better than the Eternal Spirit who inspired the Scriptures? It is to those Scriptures that we crave your reverent attention, and not to any assertions of ours; we pray you do not reject them.

I heard one say the other day that he never felt any desire to pray, and never had prayed in all his life; and, though I looked at him with sorrow, I could only say to him, "Dead men never cry; you are dead in sin, and so have not the breath divine. You have not been born again, you have not a new nature or a right spirit: if you had, you could not help praying and believing." Find a sinner made conscious of sin and you have found a man who does not know better than his God; find a man with an awakened conscience, and you have found a man who does not know better than his God; find one who believes in Christ, and sits at Jesus' feet, and the more he learns the more surely have you found in him a man who does not know better than his God, but who still cries out to be taught more, that he may possess to the full the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

5. There is yet another intrenchment behind which some hide themselves from the knowledge of God, and that is "I never can know. I do not know, and I never can know. I despair of ever being able to know the Lord." In this despair the rebel intrenches himself as in a very Malakoff, and becomes desperate in his resistance to the Gospel. Yet even this rampart is cast down by mighty grace.

You see what my drift is. It is just this, that there are certain walls of reasonings, reckonings thinkings,—our version calls them "imaginations," which are to be cast down, and the Gospel does this when used by the Holy Ghost Nor is this all, for with the walls the battlement fall. Man having devised the fortress of reasoning, erects thereon towers of pride, which th apostle calls "high things," of which he say that the power of God casts down "every hig thing that exalteth itself against the knowledg of God."

II. After a breach has been made and the cit has been taken,

PRISONERS ARE MADE:

this is our second point. The text runs thu "Bringing into captivity every thought." Th word translated "thought" has a very broa meaning, but its best explanation is that whic is placed first in the lexicon, "every thing whi comes from the mind." The mind is like a cit and when it is captured the inhabitants whic swarm its streets are the thoughts, and these a taken prisoners. Look at the process, which will rapidly describe.

The Gospel comes with power to the heart of man, and he begins to fear the wrath of G and the judgment to come. See how he tre bles! Christ has captured his thoughts of se security. He no more says, "Though I a drunkenness to thirst, it shall surely be well wi me." On the contrary he cries, "I am guilt I have broken God's law, and I am condemned The Lord has captured his thoughts of self-rig eousness. His thoughts of rebellious despair a led captive in fetters of iron. Praise ye the Lor

Watch him still further. The Spirit of G encourages him, and he comes to believe Jesus: his self-trust is a prisoner. That Je died for sinners is a truth which he accepts, a he casts himself upon it; his proud intellect captive, and he gladly bows at the Redeeme feet. Hear him as he sings, "I am forgive God assures me of it. I am justified becaus have believed in Jesus. Oh, how I love His p cious name!" Thus the whole mind of the m yea, the whole man, has thrown down its re lious weapons and surrendered unconditiona to the conquering arm of the Lord Jesus.

I dwell very briefly upon this point, becau wish to enlarge upon the last.

III. These prisoners are to be

LED AWAY INTO CAPTIVITY:

"Bringing every thought into captivity to obedience of Christ." Monarchs of the ol times, such as the kings of Assyria and Baby when they subdued a country, removed the p ple to a distance away from their old haunts find new homes. Now, when the Lord ca vates the thoughts of our mind He leads the away, conducting them to another region gether. The offspring of the mind He guides nto the spiritual realm, wherein they delight in he Lord, and bow themselves before Him.

Let us see this procession of captives led away o grace the triumph of the conqueror and to settle down in another region under another King than they ever knew before. From the highest to the lowest all the faculties of the soul are made to pass under the yoke. I shall not attempt a list according to mental science, but mention them as they occur to me.

He who being made conscious of his sin beieves in Jesus Christ submits all the thoughts of his judgment and understanding to the obedience of Christ, and this is a great point gained. Before, he put bitter for sweet and sweet for biter, darkness for light and light for darkness : but now, when he is in difficulty about a moral question, he asks his Lord; now, if pleasure tempts him he judges whether it be sweet by he question whether it would be sweet to his Lord ; now, if a certain doctrine is stated he weighs it not in the balances of his own thoughts, much less in the scales of popular opinion, but he asks, "What did my Master say? How would the Lord Jesus think of this?" He suspends his own judgment upon his Master's judgment. He does not say "I am a law unto myelf," but he says, "Christ is the way, and in His steps I desire to follow." Thus his reason is led into captivity to the higher reason and understanding of his supreme Lord.

If there be a truth which he does not know he ries to learn it, if his Lord sets it before him as a lesson ; and if it be hidden from him, he is content not to know. His prayer is, "Lord, teach me, for else I shall never learn. I wish to have my understanding developed to the full, but let t be under thy sweet light. Let my mind blosom and open all its flowers beneath the sunight of Thy divine instruction."

I know it is not so with some professed Chrisians, for they too often invent their own docrines, and think out their opinions apart from heir Master. To think is admirable, but not if we mean thereby to supplement the teachings of Christ, or to improve upon them, or to accommodate them to popular theories in science and philosophy. For my part, true science may say what it will, and never lack for an attentive lisener while I live : the more loudly it shall speak he better, if it will speak facts and not theories, f it will tell me what God has done and not what man has dreamed.

All that true science ever can discover must ally with the word of revelation, for God speaks n nature no lie, but the self-same truth as He has written in the holy Scriptures.

When philosophy contradicts revelation, what ay I? So much the worse for philosophy. The Word of God is no lie ; the lie is on the other ide. In spite of the perpetual restlessness which I see in many who are forever mending hat which is perfect in itself, my understanding s happy to delight in the infallible testimonies of Jehovah. Let those fellows alter, we shall not! Let them come up to us ; verily, believers n God's revelation will never go down to them, or that would be to be disloyal to our Master Christ, whose teachings are too sacred for us knowingly to alter a letter of them.

The same power of truth and of the Holy Ghost leads captive the will. My Lord Will-be-will, as Bunyan describes him, is a very stout ellow. In some men he is exceedingly obstinate,—"I will, and I will, and I will,"—and by no means can they be made to yield. In truth he will has a wonderful power over all the faculties, and rules them like a despot. It is boasted that the will of man is free, yet was Luther quite correct when he called it a slave. Never is t so much a slave as when it brags of its own iberty.

Let the Spirit of God come into the heart and apply with power the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and he human will no longer glories in its freedom, but surrenders, and is subjugated. It remains a will still, but the will of God is supreme over it. Hear it describe itself · "Lord, this is my will, or what I want to be my will—'Not as I will, but as Thou wilt.'" See how the will wears its golden fetters, and kisses them with happy lips, so glad to find true freedom in being subdued to the obedience of Christ!

It is very beautiful also to see how human hopes are spellbound by grace. These winged things were wont to flutter no higher than the tainted atmosphere of this poor world ; but now they find stronger pinions and soar aloft to things not seen as yet, eternal in the heavens. The man's fears, too, all nestled in the ruins of his sinful joys, or were aroused by the voices of his fellow-man, but now, ennobled by grace, they ascend into another sphere, while the man fears to grieve the Holy Spirit, fears to offend against the Father's love, fears to do any thing which would dishonor the Saviour. His joys and sorrows are now found where they never went before ; he rejoices in the Lord, and he sorrows after a godly sort.

His memory also now retains the precious things of divine truth, which once it rejected for the trifles of time, and his powers of meditation and consideration keep within the circle of truth and holiness, finding green pastures there. This done, you shall see the same enthralment cast over the Christian man's desires and aspirations. He has flung away his old ambitions, and aspires to nobler things. He is not without his longings, but he longs for heavenly blessings. His wishes and desires fly to Christ as doves to their windows. His affection, which is no longer set upon things upon the earth, but on things above, draws upward his desires. He pines for holiness, for usefulness, for the glory of God.

The same blessed servitude binds the man's plots and designings. He plans still, but it is not for his own aggrandizement : his grandest design is to bring jewels to the crown of Christ. He arranges his life now with circumspection and with diligence, but not with cunning and craftiness, for holiness is his policy, and his scheme of life is sanctity.

Does not this talk of mine sound rather like sarcasm to some who profess to be Christians? If it does, stand convicted, for it is not I that am wrong in this, but you ; for every thought is to be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and even when we are thinking about common things, matters that have to do with business, we are to be serving our Lord, for "every thought," not some thought, is to be bowed unto the obedience of Christ.

It is a wicked error to conceive that so much of our life ought to be religious and so much to be secular. A Christian's whole life is to be his religion, and his religion is to saturate his whole life. You are as religiously to eat your meals as you eat at the sacred supper, as religiously to speak the truth in your parlor as you would in the pulpit. Whether you eat or drink, or whatsoever you do, it is all to be done to the glory of God.

When a man yields himself to Jesus he should comprehend his house, his money, his body, his time, his wife, his children,—every thing in the deed of surrender ; for He who bought us with His precious blood did not buy us with a reserve and LEAVE THE DEVIL A MORTGAGE upon us, but we are our Lord's unencumbered freehold forever. We are His own conquered portion, which He took out of the hand of the Amorite with his sword and with his bow, and therefore over the whole of our being He has an absolute and undivided right of property.

The renewed man's love and hate are both held captive by the power of grace. He loves Jesus truly and intensely ; he hates sin with his whole soul. Indignation is a hard thing to tame, but to my mind it is a grand thing to see a man's anger made the servitor of Christ, so that he only grows indignant when he wars with that which is mean, cruel, unjust, un-Christlike. Then he doth well to be angry, for his anger is but virtue on a blaze.

It is a fair sight to see Christ's sacred bands worn by our tastes, which are so volatile and hard to constrain. Concerning tastes it is never wise to dispute, but Jesus' love creates a delicacy of mind, a discernment of that which is tender and gentle, and pure and heavenly, an abhorrence of that which is evil, so that the Lord's redeemed become very connoisseurs in things moral and divine.

The fancy, too, that impalpable cloud, painted as by the setting sun, that will-o'-th'-wisp of the spirit, even this is impressed into royal service, and made to wear the livery of Christ, so that men even dream eternal life.

Do you not wish for this complete subjection, you to whom Jesus is God and Lord? I know you do, and what is more, I am sure you wish for the time when that which is wrought in yourselves shall be accomplished in all mankind. Christ's Gospel has not come into the world to be co-equal with other faiths and share a divided kingdom with differing creeds. False gods may stand face to face to each other in one Pantheon, and be at peace, for they are all false together ; but where Christ comes, Dagon must go down : not even the stump of him must stand.

Truth is of necessity intolerant of falsehood, love wars with hate, and justice battles with wrong. Christ Jesus will be all in all, and sit upon the throne alone. May the day come in which obedience to Christ shall be universal!

Great Captain of Salvation, Thou canst achieve the victory. We have compassed this Jericho these many days, but still the walls fall not. Up, Thou mighty man of war, for Thou art such, and come Thou to the battle and then the battlements of sin will fall.

Art Thou not it that hath cut Rahab and wounded the dragon? Because of truth and righteousness, ride forth in Thy majesty. For peace on earth and glory to God in the highest, come forth in the glory of Thy might with the everlasting Gospel, "Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

NO ANCHORAGE.

A GROUP of sorrowing friends surrounded the death-bed of a man who had been a prominent leader in an infidel circle. It was a dreary scene, for to the dying man his next step was emphatically a leap in the dark. The gloom and sadness pressed heavily on the sufferer, and it was a difficult task for his friends to say any thing to him of a cheering character. At length one of them, as an appeal to what passes in such society as manliness, urged the dying man "to hold on." "I have no objection," was the reply, "to holding on, but will you tell me what to hold on by?"

A more embarrassing question it was impossible to conceive. A life spent in an effort to destroy the foundations of hope had left for him in that hour of solemn crisis no anchorage. Before him was a boundless ocean on which he must set sail ; he had no chart, no compass, no rudder ; he must drift out into the gloom hopelessly, for he felt he had nothing "to hold on by."

What a contrast to the death-bed of the humble Christian who can say "I know in whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day"! With a firm grasp on the Rock of Ages he can look out on the waters of Jordan unfalteringly, knowing that One who has vanquished death has promised him that He will be with him in the valley of the shadow of death, will never leave him nor forsake him.

A PATTERN IRISH SOLDIER.

Recollections by Major Malan.

Enlistment of John, an Irish Youth, in the Fusiliers—His Sorrowing Mother asks Him to Return Home—He takes French Leave, and walks Forty Miles to see her—A Corporal and Two Soldiers follow and bring him back, after an amusing Interview—"Told off" for a District Court-martial—Officers sympathize with and release him.

> " Go seek through the world for a gem in creation
> More precious or pure than a warm, loving heart;
> Such jewels comprise the true wealth of a nation,
> When Honor and Virtue their lustre impart."

THE year 1846 was a time of trouble in Ireland. The Smith O'Brien riots distracted the country, and as post and telegraph communications did not then give as full intelligence of passing events as at present, the varied local disturbances were exaggerated to undue proportions, and greater alarm occasioned than there was any need for.

One of the old royal English regiments, " The Fusiliers," was then quartered in Cork.

Recruits being at that time required to make up the full strength, and there being some difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of men from England, orders were sent to the colonel to enlist any good Irish recruits who should offer themselves. The handsome bearskin, then worn by the regiment, and the scarlet coat, tempted more than one young Irishman to try his fortunes in the English regiment; and if they all did as well as the one whose story must now be told, they had not much cause for regret that they joined it.

John was 'listed—a stout, hardy, sharp Irish lad, " a broth of a boy intirely!" Accustomed to hard work and harder living, he took the few hours' drill every day " mighty aisy;" and as he wished to learn the mysteries of his profession as soon as possible, he paid great attention to them.

The English drill-sergeant took a liking to him, and told the sergeant-major and adjutant that he had the making of a good soldier. Thus encouraged he passed his time happily enough, until a letter arrived one day from home, which greatly troubled him.

If ever the words of the old song were true, " Oh! love is the soul of a nate Irishman," it was true of this worthy son of Erin. His heart was like a glowing furnace towards all those who were happy enough to come within the range of its affections.

This letter was from his sister, telling him that since he left home to enlist, his mother was broken-hearted. Tim and Pat were both well, they were good and kind, and she and her sister did all they could for mother, but John was her darling; and whenever Tim and Pat went off for a few days' work, she did nothing but cry about her boy John.

Father Ryan sent a message corroborating all this, and the letter wound up with an earnest entreaty that John would come home to see his mother for a few days. It was of course written in that delicious Irish-Saxon which conveys information much more forcibly than the vulgar English language can do, and Paddy's heart was sorely distressed.

For years afterwards, wherever he might be, he sent his old mother a part of his pay. Distance and time did not diminish the ardor of his filial affection. It was therefore hardly to be expected that he could resist such an appeal as this, and remain quietly in barracks while his mother was only " just a step" over the mountains, some forty miles away.

He had learnt more of his drill than of the Articles of War, and as he had no intention of ever being tried by a court-martial, he had never made any particular nquiries as to the powers and penalties of a military tribunal. What was he to do? His mother wanted to see him, and he must therefore go and see her.

Dressing himself in his best, with his forage-cap well set up, his belt clean, and a cane under his arm, he stepped outside the barrack-gate with a heart as light as if he had been going for half an hour's stroll. Well did he know his way, and his feet did not weary as through the whole night by the light of the stars he strode along to the old home.

He sat down for half an hour or so about midnight, and then continued until dawn, when in the distance he could see the cabin where his mother dwelt. How joyfully he anticipated her pleasure in beholding him once more! She would soon dry her tears, and be happy again.

He entered his home. A mother's eyes recognized her own son, however much the uniform might have changed him to others. It was a warm welcome, and the humble cabin resounded with exclamations of joy and surprise at John's return and his improved appearance in Her Majesty's uniform. Paddy was supremely happy. He took off his waistbelt, opened his coat, and rested himself after his long walk, thoroughly enjoying the affection and admiration of his mother and sisters. He began to think that the drill-sergeant had really made a man of him, but he forgot that he had never asked his colonel's leave.

When the roll had been called at tattoo the previous night, Paddy was, of course, absent; and when it was called at drill that morning, he was not there to give his usual cheery answer, " Here, surr!"

His absence might not have created surprise if his previous orderly conduct had not won for him the good opinion of the non-commissioned officers of his company as well as of the drill-instructor.

In consequence of the rebellion, the Article of War directing that any soldier who, without leave from his commanding officer, should proceed one mile from barracks, should be liable for trial as a deserter, had been put into force; and whenever an Irish recruit was absent, inquiry was at once made.

Paddy, not being able to read, had asked a corporal of his company to read to him his sister's letter. The corporal had noticed the effect which it had produced upon him, and at once expressed his opinion that the Irish lad had walked home. The news that their first Irish recruit had gone to see his mother, without asking for pass or furlough, created no little amusement in barracks.

On the evening of the fourth day since he had left his quarters, his mother had recovered her usual spirits, and was quite reconciled to her boy's returning " to live among the gintlemen," and Paddy proposed to start on his return journey next morning. As he sat in his uniform before the fire talking to his mother, he thought that he heard unusual sounds outside. Was it the word " Halt "? and—how like that was to the thud of muskets after " order arms!"

The door was gently opened, and the forage-cap, head, and " wings" of the corporal who had read to him his sister's letter appeared. All soldiers wore epaulettes in those days, and the shoulder ornaments of Fusilier and Light Infantry regiments were called " wings." It was hardly an angel's visit, but never angel entered a more innocent home than poor Paddy's.

" Come in surr," said he, springing to his feet with that boldness and heartiness which always characterized him.

The corporal entered, smiling, and first saluted the widow with true English politeness.

" Good-day, ma'am." Then, turning to her son, he said kindly, " Well, my boy, we've come for you. The colonel and officers wanted to know what had become of you. I told them how you had got the old lady's letter, and that I thought you had gone home; so they sent us for you."

" Sure, an' it is very kind of the gintlemen to think so much about my boy, sir. But he's a true lad, and it's him 'll make a good sojer by and by, sir," said the widow, looking in pride at her favorite son, as the glare of the fire lit up his red coat and his honest face.

" Yes, ma'am, I've no doubt of that," said the English corporal, adding, by way of introducing his escort without alarming her, " but the times are bad, and there's two more outside who have come here with me."

" Then, plase your honor, ask them to walk in, for sure it's a long walk they've had; an' though this is a puir place for gintlemen, like yerselves, ye're mighty welcome to the best a poor widow can give."

The corporal went to the door and bade the escort come in. The two soldiers entered with their own muskets and the corporal's. " Never fear, ma'am," said the kind corporal, " these are only our guns: we're obliged to carry them now, as the rebels are all over the country."

Paddy had come to the conclusion that this was an escort sent for him, and was now aware of the unpleasant fact that he had absented himself without leave from his commanding officer. But he was too brave to let his mother know that he had got into trouble, and with thorough Irish readiness made the best of the situation. His sisters helped their mother to prepare some food for the soldiers, and they did what they could to make their guests comfortable.

While they were thus engaged the corporal took the opportunity of telling the Paddy that he was his prisoner. Paddy replied that he knew it, but asked the corporal not to disturb the old lady, and promised to go back quietly in the morning.

The corporal was perfectly satisfied of the innocence of his prisoner, and that he would not attempt to give him the slip. He, however, very properly took all precautions against surprise or escape. He and his escort were tired enough after their long tramp; the men lay down at the door, he under the small window, and they were soon fast asleep.

Paddy sat with his mother and sisters by the fire. His heart was sad, for, added to his having once more to leave home, he had sore misgivings as to the consequences of his having come to see his mother without leave. But he was as brave and cheerful as ever, and talked of the time when he would return from " furren counthries," and stay with them for many a day—a hope which was fully realized after long years of danger by sea and land.

He slept soundly, and was up with the corporal and his party at break of day. The widow and her daughters prepared something warm fo her son and his fellow-soldiers, and merrimen and mirth made up for what was lacking of relish or abundance at the frugal meal. Non would have said that it was a mother partin with a son who was a prisoner for desertion.

The corporal thanked the widow and he daughters for their kindness, and Paddy sai good-by to his mother and sisters with as muc pluck as if he were about to rejoin his regimen upon promotion. He walked away from hi home laughing, and frequently turned to loo at those who yet stood at the door watching th party of soldiers as they marched in step t gether down the vale in which the cottag stood.

" Well, my lad," said the corporal, when th had done two hours' march, and sat dow awhile to rest, " I ought to tell you that yc have got into a pretty serious scrape. There no doubt you're not a deserter, as what's call desertion, for you never meant to run awa But that's the charge against you, and I'm su I don't know how it'll go with you. These re els make things very strict just now. Howeve you were found in uniform, that's a good job f you, and you're a young soldier."

" Bad luck to thim ribbels," said Paddy " bad luck to thim. And bad luck to myself to for sure I ought to have known better than walk away without axing lave from the Corn But it can't be hilped now."

" Yes, bad luck to the rebels," chorused t escort. " They keep us on the tramp forev There's no rest night or day. It's here to-d there to-morrow, and if a poor fellow's a f hours late he's tried for desertion." The s diers heartily cursed the leaders of the rebellion, but both they and Paddy excused the poorer people, who, as is generally the case, join a cause of which they know nothing, and are left to suffer when those who are most guilty escape.

They reached barracks, and Paddy was handed over to the sergeant of the guard, and lodged in the prisoners' room. There is hope in innocence, and this hope sustained him, even when next morning he stood before his commanding officer in the orderly-room charged with desertion.

When the evidence had been given, and he was asked what he had to say, he replied, bravely but respectfully,

"Sure, yer honor, an' I've done wrong, but I did not mane it. I wint home to see my mother. It's no deserthur I am, yer honor."

The old colonel, having heard of the matter from the adjutant, had enjoyed a hearty laugh at the ignorance of the poor Irish lad. He said, in a kind tone, "I'm very sorry for you, my poor lad, but the orders are very strict as to absence. I must only do my duty, and that is to send in a charge against you for desertion for a district court-martial. You will be able to plead anything in your defence, and the court may recommend you to the consideration of the General commanding."

The prisoner was marched out of the orderly-room. But the colonel, wishing to hear for himself what the corporal had seen at Paddy's home, sent for him, and questioned him. When he learned what we have described, he was much touched. The family affection in that humble cabin appealed to his compassion, and perhaps reminded him and the other officers of a mother for whom they would have suffered a good deal to assuage one moment's sorrow.

"'Pon my word, I'm sorry for the poor fellow! But what's to be done? Well, well, we'll see!" Expressions of sympathy were freely uttered by all the officers present.

Paddy went back to the guard room with a brave heart. His friend the corporal had impressed upon him that he must be "told off" for a district-court martial, as a matter of course, but that, for all that, he might be let off; and when the corporal came out of the orderly room, the smile on his face, as he looked meaningly at his poor Irish protégé, gave him increased hope.

It is the prerogative of the Almighty to preserve the poor and needy. He can devise ten thousand ways of escape for the innocent, and no innocent man need despair. At this time one of the aide-de-camps of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland belonged to the regiment. He bore a title, and was brother of one of the leading noblemen.

A letter received from regimental headquarters mentioned the case of the poor Irish recruit against whom a charge for desertion had been sent in, and stated the sympathy felt by the colonel and all the officers, and the hope that somehow he might get off. The honorable gentleman was worthy of his title, and did not hesitate to stretch military etiquette a little to save his unfortunate fellow-countryman.

He stated the case to the Lord-Lieutenant, and through the military secretary and the General commanding the district, by semi-official and official channels, there duly arrived a full pardon for Paddy. It matters not how mercy does her work, she is often most admired when she oversteps the barriers of form and ceremony.

The adjutant lost no time in sending for the prisoner, and briefly communicated to him the good news. Paddy did not say much, but his eyes filled with tears, and as he walked from the adjutant's office to his barrack-room, he expressed his thankfulness and joy by gestures and sounds which were as forcible as peculiar. His English comrades gathered round him, patted him on the back, and heartily congratulated him upon his happy escape, which was the talk of the barracks for several days. His further adventures were still more interesting

THE GOLDEN CITY, NEW JERUSALEM.

By the Rev. J. Denham Smith.

The Golden City, in the Air, not on the Earth—Ascension of the Saints—Premillennial Advent of Christ held by many Eminent Christians, Luther, Calvin, Knox, Bunyan, etc.—H. G. Bellett's Remarks—Future Intercourse of Heavenly Saints with Earthly Mortals.

In Revelation 21, from verse 9 to chapter 22, the Apostle describes the golden city, New Jerusalem, as coming down out of heaven from God, having the glory of God; but the scene of it there, I believe, is not in the new heavens and new earth, but over the millennial earth, with which it will have glorious connection during the thousand years of the earthly blessedness. It will belong thus first to this time-state, and not, as afterwards, exclusively to eternity. We know this from the fact that during the millennium the leaves of the tree of life in its midst will be for the healing of the nations. There are no nations, as such, in the eternal state; and if even there were, none of them would need healing.

To meet the Lord in the air, according to 1 Thess. 4, is our immediate hope. To be forever with Him in this city is our eternal portion. What a long reach of eternal blessedness! and how far back the first notices of it! "At the first," as has been said, "the garden was the limit of Adam's inheritance and enjoyments. Adam knew heaven only as he saw it above him, and by its lights dividing his day and his night. But he had no thought that linked him personally with it."

Since then, as through a long and ever-brightening vestibule of divine knowledge, redemption has been unfolded; heavenly glory opened to us, disclosing a far richer inheritance than the garden, or all else that Adam lost. Abel, in dying, is present with the Lord. Enoch and Elijah, without dying, are translated to heaven. "In the translation of Elijah," remarks Archbishop Trench, in the Hulsean Lectures, "the lineaments of the ascension of Christ appear—the ascension of Him who, not rapt in a chariot of fire, nor needing the cleansing of that fiery baptism, in the far sublimer calmness of His own indwelling power rose from the earth, and with His human body passed into heavenly places."

Since Elijah's day the Son of God has come, and has shown us the way to the Father. He died for us here, and has gone again into heaven to prepare mansions for us. The heavens have received Him, whence now we look for Him again. Ephesians 1, and 1 Peter 1 both tell us of our interest in His death and resurrection and ascension into heaven; how that we are "begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance" (not like that of Eden or Canaan, but) "incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us, who are kept by the power of God unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time."

Great will be the future glory of the earth, and of Israel as a nation,* and of the nations of the millennial earth. The day is coming when "in the dispensation of the fulness of times all things, both in heaven and in earth, shall be gathered together in Him who is the head of all things to the Church, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all;" and this will be not by the departure of the spirits of just men made perfect to heaven, as in the past, or by those who sleep in Jesus being "present with the Lord," as now, but by the descent in glorified form of all those from heaven who will come with Christ to or over the earth, as we shall now see in our contemplation of this holy city. Strange that the premillennial advent of Christ should be thought a doctrine of mere modern invention.

It was held by the early Christians, as testified to by Gibbon. Also by the reformers Luther, Calvin, and Knox, who believed that the Lord's coming would be personal when Israel would be saved, and Christ would reign over a restored earth. To show that he considered it "old," and not "new," Toplady says, "I am one of those old-fashioned people who believe in the doctrine of a millennium. . . . In a glorious interval of a thousand years, Christ, I apprehend, will reign in person over the kingdom of the just" ("Works," vol. 3, p. 470).

John Bunyan, too, speaking of the two resurrections, says, concerning those of the first, "They will have the glory and the sweetness, and will rise from the dead; that is, in their rising they leave the reprobate dead behind them. The saints will sit upon the throne with Christ as kings and princes, with Him to judge the world." I add a modern testimony.

Dr. Chalmers, writing to Dr Bonar, says, "It is not of your prophetical, but of your theological views that I now speak, though to the former also I approximate much nearer than I did in my younger days' ("Correspondence," p. 306). Again, on Psalm 1 he writes: "I am inclined more to the literal interpretation of this psalm than to that which would restrict it to the mere preaching of the Gospel in the days of the Apostles. It looks far more like the descent of the Son of Man on the mount of Olives, with all the accompaniments of a Jewish conversion, and a first resurrection, and a destruction of the assembled hosts of Antichrist" (vol. 3, p. 51). Also on Ps. 68: 18-35: "His people will see Him whom they pierced, perhaps when His feet shall stand on the mount of Olives, and Jerusalem will again become the great central sanctuary, by becoming the metropolis of the Christian world" (vol. 3, p. 69).

In an interesting book by an American writer, the author traces the post-millennial return of Christ to be the modern doctrine, and with good reason shows it was brought in largely through the means of Dr. Whitby, the Unitarian commentator.

It will be in that city, on its descent over the earth, that the glorified saints—all of them, I believe—will reign over the earth. This is important to know. For many who do not believe in the premillennial advent of the Lord with His redeemed say, "What! are you not carnal, earthly? After having been in heaven you want to bring us back to the earth again, for which our resurrection and glorified bodies will be totally unfitted!"

Moreover, they add, "the absurdity is obvious, inasmuch as the earth could never contain all who then would have to dwell upon it; and if it could, how incongruous that glorified beings could be happy where evil will again break out, as it will at the close of the earth's millennium."

Our answer to all this is, that it will not be on the earth at all. The glorified saints during the millennium will have their abode in THE HEAVENLY JERUSALEM ABOVE THE EARTH, distinct from it, yet connected with it, where they dwell and reign with Christ a thousand years. Yet they will visit and revisit this earth as angels now do, but who do not live here. They belong to a heavenly abode, and yet come down upon ministrations of mercy, as we sing—

"Angels elect are sent down
To serve the elect of mankind."

But "unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world," or age, "to come, whereof we speak." That will be the prerogative of the risen glorified saints. They will occupy themselves in milliennial work.

"What Gospel messengers," says the late Mr. Soltau, "we shall be as risen saints! What a Gospel we shall tell far and wide! Men upon the earth will see the Gospel in the risen saints; they do not see it now as they might in us.

---

*In Psalm 69: 4 we read: "I restored that which I took not away." Our nature of innocency was lost through sin; but we are through Christ partakers of a divine nature. Our Eden rank was taken away by the same; but through Christ we are heirs with Him, not of the earth only, which is bought back, never again in the glorious issue to be lost, but of the heavens also.

They will see it then, and say, 'Here is salvation; now we understand what salvation is.'" The risen saints will be in their glory, but the inhabitants of the earth will be still in their bodies of flesh. It is perfectly in accordance with what has occurred in the past human world, that there should be intercourse between the one and the other.

An eminent writer, F. G. Bellett, in his book on "The Heavens and the Earth." remarks: "While the earth was undefiled the Lord God walked in the garden; and afterwards, though He was in some sense estranged from the earth, yet He was ever ready to visit it—to visit it in the behalf of His elect, as in the histories of Abraham, Joshua, Gideon, and others. So that bright and memorable hour, when Jesus was transfigured in company with Moses and Elias, in the sight of Peter, James, and John; so the occasional appearances of Christ to His disciples after He had risen; and so the vision of the descending and ascending sheet (Acts 10). The heavenly things at such moments unfold themselves to the eye of man, and give sweet notice of their nearness to us.

"We do not as yet perceive their nearness; for the glory is not yet in its millennial place over the city of the Jews; but in the millennial kingdom all this will be to sight. The heavenly glory, or glory of the golden city, New Jerusalem, will shine over the Jerusalem of the land of Israel, for nothing can be plainer than that the Jerusalem now trodden down of men is to be rebuilt. 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord. It shall be holy unto the Lord; it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever.'"

The Earthly Jerusalem will be the metropolis of all the families of Israel; and Israel the means of blessing to the whole earth. How beautiful the promise: "He that (now) scattereth Israel will gather him, and keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock. They shall come and sing in the height of Zion, and shall flow together to the goodness of the Lord, . . . their soul shall be as a watered garden; and they shall not sorrow any more at all" (see the whole of Jeremiah 31; also Jeremiah 33 : 7-9; also Heb. 8).

Such will be, as it were, the foot of the ladder on earth, whose top will reach to heaven, telling of the glory above; yea, uniting Israel and the earth with the glory-bearing city in the heavens. On all her habitations the glory will be a covering. The ladder foreseen by Jacob (Genesis 28 : 12) will be erected with its head in the heavens and its foot on the earth. The same blessed Lord will be the centre of all things; and, as in the different parts of one temple, the services of praise and joy will be celebrated, "every tongue confessing that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Equally plain are the words that tell of the moral happiness which will be enjoyed in the millennium by reason of this intercourse between the glorified saints of heaven and the mortal inhabitants of the millennial earth. The following extract is interestng on this: "The pure moral happiness that will be enjoyed by reason of this intercourse is sweetly pictured in different types and prophecies. As at the meeting of Jethro and Moses of Solomon and the Queen of the South; as in Isaiah 60, or on the holy mount, or in the holy Jerusalem. What right affections do we find in all these intercourses! What pure social pleasures are pictured before us! All these shadowy expressions of the social delights of millennial days will be deeply prized by us, if we love the exercise of pure unselfish affections.

"But in this coming intercourse of the heavens with the earth thus, when the people of the heavens go up and down the millennial ladder, I have thought that Scripture leads us to judge that there will be a certain veiling of their proper glory when they come down and have communion with the earth beneath and under them.

"The expression of this we get in the Lord's appearance after He rose from the dead; for then He could assume any veil which suited the business He had to do, whether that of the gardener to Mary, that of a travelling companion to the two going to Emmaus, or that of a courteous stranger on the banks of the lake to the fishermen."

Blessed, favored inmates of such a scene! But not all who are redeemed will be in the heavenly city. The land and nation of Israel, both restored, will bask on earth beneath its glory, and the nations that are saved will walk in the light of it.

Moreover, those martyred under the coming Antichrist will doubtless live and reign with Christ over the earth in this city of the glory. Having death, they will have resurrection, and so reign. The saints of the Old Testament dispensation are waiting for the premillennial resurrection of the just; that then, with the saints of the present dispensation, they may be gathered from the graves, and enter into their glory (Hebrews 11 : 39, 40).

If so, when do they enter upon their inheritance? In Dan. 12 : 13 we read, "But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." I do not apprehend that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Daniel will each have a little plot of land in Palestine when raised from the dead. I believe that they will have a sphere in the heavenly glory of the resurrection; and my belief is that they will fully enjoy their blessing on earth also, and see the promises of God fulfilled, and, having a body capable of dwelling in heaven and earth, will be as the angels of God ascending and descending, as it was with the vision of Jacob's ladder; heaven will be opened, and a communication between heaven and earth established!

THE UNEQUAL MARRIAGE.

LIFE'S DREAM.

LADY ERSKINE and her maid were now speeding towards London.

A gentleman, whose features she could scarcely distinguish in the gloom, was their only fellow-traveller in the carriage. He made some commonplace observation on the weather, which Clara neither comprehended nor answered. Her thoughts were becoming a wild chaos: she could not collect them sufficiently even for prayer.

On, on through the darkness and gloom—surely never train moved on so slowly before!—surely never were so many vexatious delays! Clara wept no longer; her fount of tears appeared to be dried up. Her brow was throbbing with a burning pain; a band of iron seemed pressed across her temples. She was scarcely conscious of what was passing around her, when the weary journey ended at last.

Bewildered and confused, the hapless Lady Erskine found herself in the midst of the bustle of an arrival in London at night. Friends and servants were there waiting for travellers; but, either from neglect on the part of her own household, or from her having been expected by the earlier train, no one was in waiting for Clara. In vain she strained her eyes to find some familiar face, to see some one who could relieve her agony of suspense, by giving her tidings of her husband.

After some delay—and delay was a torture—conveyance was procured, in which the miserable wife was slowly jolted through narrow, gloomy streets, towards the home at which she yearned to arrive. The cab stopped at her own door; Clara sprang from it—herself rang the bell, gently, fearfully, for was not suffering within the dwelling? No answer? She rang the bell again, and, before the sound died away, the door was opened by a servant. He started at seeing his mistress; his face answered the question which she could not speak; he uttered but the sentence, "Too late!" and Clara sank senseless on the threshold.

The newspapers on the following day all dilated on one theme—the genius, the brilliant career, and the sudden death, of Sir Edwin Erskine. Each had its paragraph of praise, not in every case unmingled with censure, but censure tenderly, sparingly dealt forth; for the melancholy fate of the gifted young author had wrung compassion from literary critics and theological opponents.

In the gay saloons and haunts of fashion, of which he had but a few days since been the ornament and pride, his name was upon every tongue. In a brief space the news spread far and wide, like circles on a river when some large object has been suddenly plunged into its waters. But the current of society flowed on as ever; soon not the faintest ripple on its surface told that one of its proudest names had become a word of the past—that one of its loftiest spirits had gone to the "bourn from which no traveller returns."

But there was one weeping in her darkened chamber alone, in whose almost broken heart a void was made which nothing earthly could ever fill—one crushed beneath the weight of a grief for which only God can afford comfort. What mattered it to her that the voice of nations swelled the tribute to departed genius—that he whom she so passionately loved would occupy a niche in the temple of Fame!

Blessed mourners are they who weep for the dead translated to a more blissful existence; thrice blessed they who, when all the pride of this world shall have passed away like a fevered dream, shall hear the voice of the Saviour pronounce the sentence, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

But Clara sorrowed as one without hope. Oh! that those who, in defiance of the command—the merciful warning of their God—choose to twine the dearest affections of their hearts around an earthly pillar, on which "holiness to the Lord" has never been inscribed, would anticipate the anguish of that day when, beneath the stroke of the angel of death, that pillar shall lie shattered in the dust; and Despair, gazing on the broken relics of all that was dear, fair, talented, and brave, shall utter the mournful wail, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!"

Little was it to the bereaved young widow that, with the loss of her dearest treasure, wealt also took wings to itself and fled away. Sir Edwin's income had principally consisted of life rent. Careless in money concerns, little anticipating so sudden and speedy a close to his career, he had left a very scanty provision for hi survivor. There was, indeed, a new work of his almost completed, for which contending publishers were ready to offer sums which woul have materially enlarged the scanty resources c Lady Erskine.

The posthumous work of an author so renowned was certain to command the eager a tention of the public; and Clara received variou communications on the subject. She read th manuscript, wept over the lines which had bee last traced by the loved hand now cold in death she then folded up the papers, enclosed an sealed them, and, resolved that no eye but h own should ever peruse the unhallowed creatio of a mind which had made fatal progress error, she endorsed the packet with a comma that at her death other hands should burn, u read, that which she had not herself the heart destroy.

"These would be his orders, could he spe from the grave," said Clara to herself, as s locked up the papers in her cabinet's deepest cess. "Oh! would he not desire to obliter in all his writings every page which could inj others when he is himself no more—every pa which could witness against him! O God! God!" exclaimed the widow, suddenly raisi her clasped hands with a cry of anguish wru from the depths of her soul, "they cannot obliterated—they cannot be recalled—it is late!—oh! misery! it is too late!"

The first thing which served in any degree estore composure to the unhappy Clara was er return to her early home. Mrs. Arnot, who ad been too ill to hasten to her daughter when e tidings of her bereavement arrived, or even r some time to be permitted to know of her ss, was now convalescent, and welcomed her eloved child with a depth and intensity of lovng sympathy that poured balm into Clara's leeding heart. The latter had thought, in the rst transport of her anguish, that all had been nt from her at once; but she found that one earth's most priceless blessings was left to her et—the deep, unchanged, holy love of her moer.

Mrs. Arnot received back her Clara as a preious treasure restored; and it was a treasure puried, beautified, refined. The furnace of afflicon, seven times heated, had not been heated vain.

Gradually Clara resumed her daily round of ccupations, and passed a life closely resembling at which had been hers at the period when r story opened. She visited the sick and the oor, comforted the sorrowful, taught the ignont—neglected none of the duties of home. But how different a spirit were these duties perrmed! With what altered feelings did the astened mourner now repeat the confession of e sins of whose existence she had then scarcely nown!

Shrinking from the idea of resting on her own ghteousness, her own imperfect and polluted orks, Clara's only hope was in the merits of er Saviour—her greatest solace the rememance of His death—her aim and object in life show her humble gratitude to Him who had ved and given Himself for her. She was no ore as a sunbeam in the dwelling—her sparkng brightness was gone for ever; but rather ke the gentle moonbeam that illumines the ght, shining with a soft lustre, borrowed from e only true Source of happiness and of light.

We have seen how the seed of the Word had rung up in a shallow soil, made a fair show, d then withered away; how the plant of rthly love had succeeded, striking deep its ots, spreading wide its branches, obscuring the ght of heaven, darkening the earth with its fal shade. God in mercy had torn up that plant; d though the uprooting of it had appeared to rench asunder the very heartstrings that had rined so closely around it, to lay bare the epest recesses of the soil, it prepared that soil, rough the divine blessing, for the precious ed of truth.

The word of God, now received in humility d meekness, rested in the ground which the ord had rendered good, and brought forth undantly the fruit of holy living, to the praise d glory of the Giver of all grace.

THE END.

THE NEED OF GOD'S SPIRIT.

S. Lesson for June 15th.—Zech. 4, Golden Text, verse 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is no light matter to speak of the Holy host. He is present, hearing and seeing what e say and do. The Lord Jesus said, "I will ay the Father, and He shall give you another omforter, that He may abide with you forever; en the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot ceive, because it seeth Him not, neither noweth Him: but ye know Him; for He welleth with you, and shall be in you" (John : 16, 17). We are continually warned about e danger of sinning against the Holy Ghost. here is not only the blasphemy against the oly Ghost which cannot be forgiven, "neither this world (or age), neither in the world hich is to come" (Matt. 12 : 31, 32); but we e also warned, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of od" (Eph. 4 : 30); "Quench not the Spirit" Thess. 5 : 19); Ananias and Sapphira were ain because they lied unto the Holy Ghost cts 5 : 3); and Stephen's ground of accusation ainst the Jews as he stood before the council as this, "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost" cts 7 : 51).

Let us walk softly, for we are on holy ground. Our golden text declares, "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." When we learn to attribute all power, all life, all love to the Holy Ghost who lives and works in and through us, then and then only can we honor the Holy Ghost and become His willing ministers. But do we believe as fully in the working of the Holy Ghost in us as we believe in the work of Christ for us? We, who are God's children, believe most fully that God has given us His only-begotten Son, that they which believe in Him should not perish, but should have everlasting life. Do we believe as fully that God has "also given unto us His Holy Spirit?" (1 Thess. 4 : 8) and are we yielded up to Him that He may guide us into all truth, teach us all things, bring forth His fruits, and give us utterance that we may testify unto others? (John 14 : 26; 16 : 13; Gal. 5 : 22; Acts 2 : 4.)

God expects nothing from our might or power —nothing from our motives, resolutions, efforts, etc., but every thing from His Spirit, which He has given us. Oh, is it true that we possess dwelling within us the living Power which dwelt in the human life of Jesus, and by which He as man did His works of power? Is it true that we possess the very breath of God which waked into being three thousand souls on the day of Pentecost? Is it true that the very Spirit which shone through Stephen's transparent face, and made the council see heaven in it, and which made them unable to resist the power and the Spirit with which he spake, is it true that this Spirit dwells in us? Then why are we not exercising the same power, and why is it that God gains so few victories by us?

Can it be that we are grieving the Holy Spirit by our walk and conversation so that He cannot use us, or quenching the Spirit by despising prophecies, so that His sensitive nature shrinks back (for God the Holy Ghost never forces Himself); or can it be that we are expecting something from our own might and strength, or failing to expect because of our want of strength, and so disbelieving in the power of the Holy Ghost? The rule of God's Spirit is that when we are weak then are we strong.

In the vision of Zechariah, an angel who had been revealing Christ to the prophet in the preceding chapter came again to reveal to him the Spirit. He wakened him as a man out of sleep, and said, What seest thou? The prophet saw "a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof; and two olive trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof." And the angel explained the vision by the words of our golden text, clearly showing that the vision was concerning the Holy Spirit.

But the prophet seeks a further explanation in verses 11, 12: "What are these two olive trees upon the right side of the candlestick and upon the left side thereof? And I answered again, and said unto him, What be these two olive branches, which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves? And he answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord. Then said he, These are the two anointed ones" (sons of oil) "that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." If we are to take the "candlestick" as bearing the same interpretation as is given by Christ Himself (Rev. 1 : 20), then it means the Church as being the light of the world. But no lamp can burn without oil, and thus the olive trees, evergreen sources of oil, are represented as pouring the oil "out of themselves into the gold" (see margin). But these sons of oil, who are they? We read in Rom. 11 of the olive tree the Jewish people, and of the wild olive tree which was grafted in among the branches. Can the meaning be the remnant among the Jews and that among the Gentiles who live in and possess the power of the Spirit of God? We read of two witnesses in Rev. 11 : 3-12, who are declared to be "the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth." But if this Scripture is fulfilled as literally as is usually the case with God's predictions, these must be individual men, who are yet to live.

But the practical teaching for us is the same. No power, no light, no life without the Spirit of God. A dead Church, a prayerless soul, a faithless witness, all lack the power of the Spirit of God. "I am like a green olive tree in the house of God," David writes (Ps. 52 : 8). And why? He made God his strength, trusted in the mercy of God, and praised Him forever and ever. God calls us not only to receive the Spirit, but to be sources and ministers of the Spirit of God to others. Our Lord says, "He that believeth on Me.....out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. This spake He of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive" (John 7 : 38, 39). Thus we are called to be rivers, channels of the Holy Ghost to others. Paul says, "Who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter, but of the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3 : 6). Thus we are called to be ministers of the Spirit of God to others.

But what is the result of yielding up the guidance of our life into the hands of the Spirit of God? Power over all difficulties. "Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." "Verily I say unto you," said our blessed Lord, "if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17 : 20). Seeing with the eyes of the Spirit of God we can see no impossibilities. On three different occasions the Lord said nearly the same thing. Once in connection with the casting out of a devil (Matt. 17 : 19, 20); once with regard to unfruitfulness (Mark 11 : 23); and once in connection with forgiveness to the brethren (Luke 17 : 6). "Not by might, nor by power," can devils be cast out, fruit brought forth, or injuries forgiven, but "by My Spirit, saith the Lord."

Perhaps this latter, the forgiveness of injuries among the brethren, freely and from the heart, is one of the great mountains which stand in the way of the exercise of God's power. This grieves the Holy Spirit of God. I have been wronged, says a Christian, of whom Paul writes, that his old man is crucified with Christ (Rom. 6 : 6). How can it be that the I which is crucified with Christ has life enough to feel the wrong? Let us reckon ourselves to be dead with Him, and then we have no cause but His cause, no wrongs, no rights but His, and the great mountain of self shall be cast into the sea. Then and then only, when the I by which Satan could wound us is nailed to the cross, can we invade his kingdom and realize the promise, "I give unto you power ......over all the power of the enemy" (Luke 10 : 19).

Zerubbabel was called to the work of rebuilding the temple of the Lord, and the angel says, ver. 7, "He shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it." We also are called to build in the temple of the Lord, and to gather out living stones in the souls we win for Him; but whether we build much or little we can only say, "Grace, grace," for the Lord hath wrought all our works in us (Isa. 26 : 12). Probably Zerubbabel (the governor of Judah) was a very humble man, as is every man who does any real work for God; and the Lord said to him by Zechariah, "the hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it. For who hath despised the day of small things?" Not our God. He who looked with favor on the widow's mite, and chose the youngest of the house of Jesse to be king over Israel, a man after His own heart, who called the child Samuel to speak His words to priests and people, and later on the child Jeremiah to be as a brazen wall against his people Israel—this God despises not the day of small things. Then let us not despise them either, but become more than ever nothing, that He may be all in all.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The English War in Afghanistan.—A Dispatch from Simla announces officially that the Afghan war is ended, and Yakoob Khan signed the treaty of peace at Gundamuk, May 26th. The English Government has agreed to pay the Ameer an annual subsidy and to grant him protection from external foes. In return he cedes to the British certain territories, including the famous Khyber Pass.

The Anglo-Zulu War appears to be far from a conclusion. Sir Garnet Wolseley, who distinguished himself in the Ashantee campaign, has been appointed to the supreme command of the English forces in South Africa, and it is thought the subjugation of the Zulus will tax his abilities to the utmost.

A body of Zulu warriors under Dabulmanzi, the brother of Cetewayo, who had resolved to desert to the English camp, were cut off by Cetewayo, May 11th. A fierce battle ensued, in which Dabulmanzi was slain. Cetewayo has burned his principal Kraal to prevent its falling into English hands, and has encamped in a strong position at Mundi near the junction of two rivers. The position is flanked with swamps, and the Zulu King intends waiting for the English to come up, and avows his determination to fight it out to the last.

A Remarkable Meeting took Place at a Reception held by Lady Salisbury, the wife of the English Minister of Foreign Affairs, on May 10th. The Earl of Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone were both among the guests. They met in the reception room and had a few minutes' conversation. This is the first time for many years that the chiefs of the two great political parties have met, and the incident created quite a sensation in the crowded salons of the Foreign Secretary.

Egyptian Affairs are the Subject of Discussion between France and England. The French Government is framing proposals, to which the adhesion of England will be invited, for the establishment of a strict European control over Egypt. If the Khedive accepts them, France will consent to his continuing his reign. If he rejects them, France would accept the Sultan's offer to depose him. England is opposed to the latter course, having diplomatic reasons for not wishing to acknowledge that the Khedive is the vassal of Turkey.

The Discovery of the North-West Passage so long sought is announced. The honor of the discovery is due to Professor Nordenskjold, who sailed from Sothenburg on July 4th, 1878, in the Vega. On the 1st of August the Yugor Straits were passed, and by the 6th the Sea of Kara had been traversed and Dickson's Port at the mouth of the Yenisei reached. Here a stay of three days only was made, and then the two ships set out for the Lena River. On the 27th of August the mouth of the river was reached, Cheljuskin, the north cape of Asia, having been rounded without much trouble from ice, and on the 14th of October news was received in Europe of the Lena's arrival at Yakutsk. As from the mouth of the Lena to Behring's Straits the greater part of the Arctic Ocean had already been explored, it was thought certain the Professor would succeed in his task. The only severe opposition he met with was at the end of his journey when the Vega was caught in the ice and carried back with some probability that her gallant commander might become the Franklin of the Asian Arctic region. Happily he has escaped, and by way of Yokohama, Malacca, the Suez Canal and Gibraltar, will shortly conclude one of the most remarkable voyages, if not the most remarkable voyage, on record.

The War Between Chili and Peru has been marked by a naval battle, resulting in the loss of all the vessels engaged. The engagement took place at Iquique, Peru, between the Chilian wooden vessels Esmeralda and Cavadonga and the Peruvian ironclad Independencia, which carried Armstrong guns.

The Panama Canal Project, which has been debated in the Congress at Paris, has issued in the selection of the route known as the Wyse Route. The outlet is fifteen hundred miles farther from the United States than the route advocated by the American representatives. It is known as the tide-level project, and according to it the canal will run from the Gulf of Limon to the Bay of Panama.

"A Ruined Home."—Under this Title a Pathetic article appeared in a London daily paper recently about the family of Pace, a metal-worker, who murdered Cole, a fellow-workman, at Clerkenwell, London, and who escaped with the light sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment. Pace was depicted as a model father whose grief at his eldest daughter running awa with Cole led to his killing the latter in an uncontrollable fit of indignation. The result of th article was that contributions for Pace's famil to the amount of more than $3500 poured i within three days, from all classes of societ with numerous expressions of approval of hi murderous act. A letter from Cole's sister has however, been published, stating that Pace wa a godless, profane man, whose cruelty led to h daughter fleeing for protection to Cole, who wa taking care of her and was arranging to marr her on May 3d. The sympathy of the Britis public appears to have outrun its judgment this case, and to have rewarded a criminal f committing a crime which law-abiding peop must regard with abhorrence.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

His Mission—Family Troubles—Early Struggles—Literary Work—His Connection with Lundy—Involved in a Libel Suit—Release from Prison—His Marriage—Mobbed in Boston—His Work Consummated — Religious Principles — Last Hours.

THE death of this well-known citizen in New York on May 24th recalls to the mind the stormy days before the war, when his name was one of the most prominent of the time. Few men have been more vigorously denounced than he; and few names have had attached to them more opprobrious epithets than there have been attached to the name of William Lloyd Garrison. On the other hand he received the gratitude of a whole race, if not their adoration; he was hailed by them as their Moses, their deliverer from bondage, their champion and their friend. Garrison was emphatically a man of one idea. His whole life, all the energies of an energetic nature, he dedicated, he consecrated, to one grand object; and more fortunate than the majority of men whose lives have been similarly concentrated on one aim, he lived to see that aim fulfilled.

He saw a gigantic evil eating like a cancer into the vitals of his country, and he set himself to the task of amputation. He saw, as he believed, the fortress of the great Republic being sapped by an insidious foe, and he raised his voice single and alone to warn the garrison. He believed the institution of slavery to be a crime which would ultimately bring down upon the nation the terrible vengeance of Heaven, and, like the prophet of old, he took his life in his hand and preached repentance and the putting away of the corrupt thing from our midst.

Whatever may be said of his discretion—and it is possible that exception may be taken, and taken justly, to his methods of operation—there can be no question of his courage or of the indomitable resolution with which he waged war—one man against a nation, and he without friends, without money, without influence, without education. With odds like these, what other man has fought and triumphed? Putting aside the merits of his cause, what other battle has this world ever seen like it? Surely such a man deserves to be ranked among the world's heroes, and to have his name recorded high in the annals of fame. His nature was "of that mould that 'gainst the world in war had stood, and perished in the foremost rank, with joy" willing to sacrifice his life and all he held dear if by such sacrifice the cause he loved were advanced a single stage. His mind filled with his great mission, he labored like a skilful general rather than like a poor friendless mechanic, and he succeeded. Such a life teaches many lessons, and even those who were opposed to him and who disliked the man and his work may with advantage study a career so single-minded and so successful.

William Lloyd Garrison first saw the light at Newburyport, Mass., December 12th, 1804. It was a sad house, overcast with a heavy cloud, in which he drew his first breath. A vice which has wrecked more homes than the sword has desolated ruled its chief member, and held him like a child in its giant grasp. The curse of intemperance blighted that household, and eventually scattered it over the land. Garrison's father, a man of bright genius, intelligent and well educated, was a drunkard. The statement reads like the history of the great Syrian captain—he was a great man, but he was a leper. So this vice dominated the man, had poisoned his blood, and prostrated all his bright and valuable gifts in the dust

His mother was a remarkable woman, one of nature's heroines, whose heart grace had touched, and given her that brightest and best of all charms, true godliness. She was the daughter of worldly parents, who had taken great pride in the beauty and intelligence of their daughter, but who, when she had been brought to a knowledge of the truth under the preaching of some revivalist Baptists, and made a public profession of religion, discarded her and thrust her out homeless, into the world. What her fate might have been none can tell; but the God whom she had learned to know and love opened a way for her, and an uncle took the homeless girl into his household and became a second father to her, and at his home she remained until her ill-fated marriage.

Soon after William's birth the household at Newburyport was broken up through the intemperance of Mr. Garrison, and the husband and wife separated never to meet again in this life. Mrs. Garrison with her little ones removed to Lynn, Mass., where a precarious living was offered her as a professional nurse. Too poor to keep her son at school, she apprenticed him at the age of nine years to a shoemaker—one Gamaliel Oliver. But the little fellow was too young and weak for the business, and he described in after-life the trembling of his legs under the weight of the lapstone, and the torture he suffered as he beat the leather upon it.

Three or four months in Oliver's shop made it plain to the poor mother that perseverance in that business was hopeless, and having received the offer of an old neighbor, a deacon, at Newburyport, to receive the boy and send him to school, she let him go. At his native place he thrived and regained his strength, attending school, and learning with avidity in the daytime, and in the evening working diligently to repay for his board and lodging by helping the deacon to saw wood. This was the only regular education he ever received, but to such a man life was one long education, in which he was ever learning some fresh lesson.

LITERARY WORK.

The year 1818 saw him apprenticed to Ephraim Allen, the editor of the Newburyport Herald, from whom he was to learn the art of printing. After a year or two working as a compositor he forwarded secretly under an assumed name an article on a political subject to his employer, which to his great delight was inserted in the Herald. Other articles followed, and were all gladly received, praised, and published. It was with peculiar pleasure that on several occasions his own articles were handed to him by the foreman to "set up." Considerable curiosity was manifested as to the authorship of his contributions, and he was delighted on one occasion to receive through the post a letter from the editor thanking him for his papers and inviting him to continue them. It was some time before Mr. Allen found with amazement that his most valued contributor was his own apprentice.

At the conclusion of his apprenticeship he commenced the publication of the Free Press, a journal which through want of capital came to an untimely end. Following this was the National Philanthropist, the first journal published to advocate total-abstinence.

His next venture was the issue of the Journal of the Times at Bennington, Vt., a production of which Mr. Horace Greeley expressed his opinion—that of an expert—that it was "about the ablest, most interesting newspaper ever issued in that State."

While editing the Journal of the Times he got up a monster anti-slavery petition to Congress, signed by more names than had ever before been affixed to a petition to that body. On the 4th of July, 1829, he delivered in Park Street Church, Boston, by invitation, the annual address to the Colonization Society, a society formed to promote colored emigration to Liberia. The eloquence and power of the young orator brought him into considerable prominence, and amongst those who admired it was Benjamin Lundy, a courageous Quaker, who had constituted himself a preacher of liberty, and went about much as the disciples did, on foot, with pouch and staff, taking no thought for the morrow, but everywhere proclaiming the wrongs of the slave. One of his instrumentalities was a journal called the Genius of Universal Emancipation. For this he carried his type and rules with him, and published it wherever he encountered a printing press and had money to pay the printer. In 1828 this wandering publication was settled in Baltimore, and from that city he journeyed on foot all the way to Vermont to invite Mr. Garrison to come and aid in its management. Mr. Garrison went, but, as he said, "I wasn't much help to him, for he had been all for gradual emancipation, and as soon as I began to look into the matter I became convinced that immediate abolition was the doctrine to be preached, and I scattered his subscribers like pigeons."

Lundy expostulated, but in vain; and at length he insisted that Garrison's initials should be printed at the foot of his articles, in order to fix the responsibility for them on the writer. This combination could not continue, for while Lundy advocated the Colonization Society as the best settlement of the slavery question, Garrison denounced it in the columns of the same journal as a half-and-half measure, of no value against a radical evil. It was finally resolved to dissolve the partnership, but before the dissolution could take place Garrison was involved in

A LIBEL SUIT,

[illegible] to his killing [illegible] controllable fit of indignation. The result of th article was that contributions for Pace's famil [illegible] cargo of slaves; he denounced the act as one of "domestic piracy," and threatened to "cover with thick infamy all who were engaged in the transaction." He was promptly indicted for libel, tried, convicted, and sentenced to a fine of $50, and imprisonment until it was paid. In a civil action brought by the same parties Garrison was ordered to pay $1000. It is said that Mr. Clay was about to pay the fine, as Garrison was lying in jail unable to raise the money, when he was anticipated by Mr. Arthur Tappan, of this city, who released Mr. Garrison after seven weeks' imprisonment.

In a speech delivered thirty-five years afterwards he referred to his imprisonment, and in connection with it related the following characteristic incident of

PRESIDENT LINCOLN:

"The first time I saw President Lincoln, I said to him, Mr. President, it is thirty-five years since I first visited Baltimore, and when I went there recently to see if I could find the old prison, and, if possible, get into my old cell again, I found that all was gone." The President answered promptly: "Well, Garrison, the difference between 1830 and 1864 appears to be this—that in 1830 you could not get out, and in 186 you could not get in." This symbolizes th revolution which has been brought about i Maryland.

Released from prison he at once made preparations for the issue of a new journal, to be called the watchword of which was to be immediat emancipation. His first intention was to publis this paper in Washington, D. C., but on furthe consideration he came to the conclusion that hi wisest plan was to issue it in New England, an endeavor to win support for himself and form party from men whose pecuniary interest was no involved in the emancipation of the slaves. I was eventually issued in Boston, Mass., Januar 1st, 1831. Its motto was, "My country, the world my countrymen, all mankind."

His only associate was Mr. Isaac Knapp, lik himself, a printer. They were too poor to hir an office, or even to afford to do their own worl only. So they got the friendly foreman of th Christian Examiner to give them the use of hi type in payment for their labor at "the case," and then, after their day's task was over, the labored far into each night on the Liberator. I is easy to see that no feeble soul was to drive a enterprise thus begun. From that moment M Garrison and the Liberator were identified, an both shared in the curses deep and loud levelle at it. Accustomed to poverty, with wants sim ple and few, of hardy frame and a cheerful tem per, he made light of privation, while his cou age never flinched under disappointment danger.

During the year 1831 Mr. Garrison made an ort to start a NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY,
t at first his views as to immediate and uncon-ional emancipation were unacceptable. Later, the 1st of January, 1832, he succeeded, with ven others, in completing an organization of ich he was chosen President—a position he ld almost continuously for thirty years. The iety set to work in earnest. It plied every ner of the land with tracts and pamphlets. It ught expression in the newspapers. It estab-hed branches throughout the North. It held merous meetings, and its members frequently ivered public addresses.

VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Having appealed for aid to England, he was ited by the Abolitionists there to visit that untry and explain the nature of his society. is he did in 1833. His visit was a continual tri-uph. He made warm friends everywhere, among m some of the most distinguished philanthro-ts and statesmen of England—Wilberforce, rkson, Gurney, George Thompson, and many the Liberal peers.

arrison returned to the United States in Sep-nber, 1833. During his absence the antipathy himself and his cause had grown rapidly, es-ially in the North. On October 2d, a meeting the Anti-Slavery Society, which he was to ad-ss, was broken up by a mob. Luckily for him was not well known, and actually accom-ied the men who were looking for him to give n a coat of tar and feathers. The incident istrates the imperturbable courage of which he s afterward to give many proofs.

n the 4th of September, 1834—at the age of rty—Mr. Garrison was married to Helen Eliza nson, of Brooklyn, Conn., who was some six rs his junior. She was a remarkable woman many regards, beautiful in person, attractive manners, well fitted to make small means go in household administration, a kind hostess, a most ardent abolitionist. A more de-ed wife man never had, and the work she per-med in supporting and encouraging her hus-d, and in mollifying friends who had been nded by his violence, was by no means an mportant contribution to the ultimate suc-s of the movement. Her death, in 1876, Mr. rrison described as the hardest blow he had r received.

uring the years 1833–7 the holding of anti-very meetings almost anywhere in the Free tes was a signal for riotous demonstrations erilling property and life.

meeting of the Boston Female Anti-Slavery iety at their hall in Washington Street, Oc-er 21st, 1835, was broken up by a furious crowd men who were in search of Garrison, and lly seized him while he was endeavoring to re to his residence by a back passage. They a rope around him, knocked his hat off, and he scuffle his clothes were mostly torn from body. Dragged through Wilson's Lane into te Street, he was rescued by Mayor Lyman, posse and several respectable citizens, and en into the Mayor's room in the old State use; thence he was conveyed to Leverett eet Jail to save him. Upon the walls of his he wrote:

William Lloyd Garrison was put into this on Monday afternoon, October 21st, 1835, to e him from the violence of a respectable and uential mob, who sought to destroy him for aching the abominable and dangerous doc-e that all men are created equal, and that oppression is odious in the sight of God."

was discharged the next day as a "blame- citizen," but left the city for a few days at request of the authorities.

or the next fifteen years there is little to k the individual work of Mr. Garrison. He tinately maintained the ground which he had en, and, in season and out of season, he spoke message of criticism and denunciation which as profoundly believed was committed to "from on high" as did any of the prophets artyrs of religion.

LATER DAYS.

Mr. Garrison was, throughout his long life, a consistent believer in the principle of non-resistance. Of undaunted personal courage and a coolness and strength of nerve which a soldier might envy, he never would advise or consent to the use of force to promote the cause of emancipation, or even to defend others or himself against violence.

But a time was coming when events, shaped by a Power which, in human history, has brought many a moral cause to the dread arbitrament of arms, were to decide this greatest conflict of modern times on the battle-field. Mr. Garrison, though his soul was stirred with the spirit which brought a million of men to arms for his beloved cause, was true to his convictions, and labored to the last for a peaceful solution.

He recognized with devout thankfulness the hand of God in the course of events which made the Proclamation of Emancipation a war measure, and caused slavery to perish. And when on the 18th of December, 1865, the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution was proclaimed, wiping the stain of slavery forever from the law of the land, he accepted the situation frankly, and on the 1st of January following issued the last number of the Liberator.

The last editorial in the Liberator contains the following characteristic utterance: "The object for which the Liberator was commenced—the extermination of chattel slavery—having been gloriously consummated, it seems to me especially appropriate to let its existence cover the historic period of the great struggle, leaving what remains to be done to complete the work of emancipation to other instrumentalities (of which I hope to avail myself), under new auspices, with more abundant means, and with millions instead of hundreds for allies.

"Most happy am I to be no longer in conflict with the mass of my fellow-countrymen on the subject of slavery."

The Liberator, it was well known, had never been a paying paper, and Mr. Garrison was known to be poor; it was therefore an appropriate act on the part of his friends to raise a subscription in acknowledgment of his long and self-denying labors. This was done, and the sum of $30,000 was presented to him, and thus he was enabled to pass the remainder of his days in comfort and competence.

Throughout his life he had been a constant and diligent student of the Bible, and had exercised a sincere faith in Jesus as his Redeemer. He had said some bitter things of the church when he considered it lacking in support of the cause he advocated, but he had always discriminated between Christianity and the church, and in his bitterest speeches his complaint had been that Christians did not follow the example of their Divine Master. During his last illness he would ask those about him to join with him in prayer and in singing; and his last conscious hours, even after he became too feeble to speak, were cheered by their singing to him the hymns which his pious mother had sung to him in his childhood—"Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve;" "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings;" "All hail the power of Jesus' name," etc., his hands gently moving in time with the music.

The following eloquent tribute to his memory, uttered by one of the greatest of English statesmen—John Bright—may fitly conclude this sketch of a man whose heroism, self-denial, and untiring devotion to one cause has rarely been equalled in this or any other land.

Mr. Bright said of William Lloyd Garrison: "His name is venerated in his own country—venerated where not long ago it was a name of obloquy and reproach. His name is venerated in this country and in Europe, wheresoever Christianity softens the hearts and lessens the sorrows of men, and I venture to say that in time to come, near or remote, I know not, his name will become the herald and synonyme of good to millions of men who will dwell on the now almost unknown continent of Africa."

CONSOLATION.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached May 4, and Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

THIS is divine chemistry. It don't make any difference what style of profits they are; we put them in a caldron, and by this divine chemistry they come up in motion, working, working, until they work together for good to those that love God. I have felt on this stormy night like having with you a cosey talk about some matters concerning your personal happiness. I have noticed that there are a hundred people hunting for storms where there is one man hunting for sunshine.

You may be surprised to hear that in 1875 in India there were 19,000 people devoured by wild beasts, and in the year 1876 in India there were 20,000 people devoured by wild beasts; but there is a monster in the world that has made more devastation than all these wild beasts together. It is and I propose to-night to take Gospel weapons and hunt the monster back into his midnight cavern. I am going to show you how all things work together for good to those that love God. I am going, if the Lord will help me, to show you how you can make the best of every thing. A little child sat on the floor in the sunshine with a spoon and seemed to be dipping up something, and the mother said, "My darling, what are you doing there?" "Oh!" she says, "I am taking a spoonful of this sunshine;" and I would to God that now I might hand to you a brimming chalice of God's eternal sunshine.

I. In the first place, then, I would have you make the best of all your financial losses and embarrassments. You have all been losing money during these past few years; you may have carried on a very large business, but you have been losing money, and the question you used to ask, What shall I invest in? or What shall I do with the thousands of dollars surplus at the end of the year? has been exchanged for the question, How shall I meet the butcher's bill, the baker's bill, and pay the landlord? You have not studied much about this, for it is not politic to talk much about financial embarrassments, but your wife knows. There has been less variety of wardrobe, more severity of economy at the table, more self-denial in art and tapestry. Where you had large charities to give you have now put yourself on the severest possible economy, and I stand here to-night to tell you it is your duty to make the very best of that condition.

Do you know what a narrow escape you had? Suppose you had sailed right on and reached to the fortune toward which you were going. Suppose you had gained that fortune: I prophesy you would have been as proud as Lucifer. How many men do you know who have had great financial success and kept their Christian simplicity?

You can count them all on your eight fingers and two thumbs. How can that man offer the prayer, "Give me this day my daily bread!" when he has enough money in the bank to buy out all the bakeries of Brooklyn. How many men have had great success for this world, and yet kept their faith in God, and been consecrated to religious service?

There was an avaricious soul, a Cardinal, who in his dying hours used to order a basin of gold, a basin filled with pieces of gold, to be brought to him ; and then he would amuse himself in his last hours by running his inflamed hands through these pieces of gold, and turning them this way and turning them that way. And that is what the multitude of people are doing this day, doing this hour. Playing the fool for time, and playing the fool for eternity.

Oh ! how many men there are who have been destroyed by their financial successes. There are a thousand men who can stand trial, where there is only one man that can stand success. Ought not this consideration to induce you to make the most and to make the best of your financial trials ? "Oh !" you say, "I could get along very well with business troubles, but I am so disappointed in the fact that I cannot start my children in the world as well as I hoped to start them." My friend, the same financial misfortune which is going to save your soul will save your children.

How many young men who started with $40,000 capital have turned out well ?

I have not known a half dozen of them. When a young man expects a large fortune, he ceases his industrious habits, or never learns them. He says to himself, "What is the use of my working, what is the use of blistering my hand, what is the use of racking my brain ? Father has plenty of resources, and he will step out after a while, and I will step in and have every thing."

The lack of the necessity of toil results in no toil at all, and you know very well that young people who grow up without industrious habits grow up to their ruin ; so you have to congratulate yourself in your financial misfortune that you have not only saved yourself spiritually, but your children are to be saved after you.

A year or two ago, just above Tarrytown, I went into the historical cemetery called the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, where so many mighty men of our country are buried, and I said to the woman who kept the gate of the cemetery. How shall I find the grave of William Orton ? Well, she says, you go right on until you find a great display of flowers, and that is it. I went on, and without any trouble I found the grave. Flowers in anchors, in wreaths, in crowns, great banks of cala lilies and camelias. Who slept under that display of flowers ? William Orton. Starting life with no resources at all, he began to fight his own battles at thirteen years of age, struggling on, struggling on, until he became the first man in American telegraphy, adding to business genius faith in God; seven hours before the fatal sickness seized him, taking the holy communion at the church altar.

Show me the graves of those who started with large fortune—show me the flowers on their graves : how many of them are there ? Not many. They who start life with large resources are never anxious to accumulate any resources for heaven. It is rather an exception when those who have started life with plenty of money ever do any thing for God or for the betterment of the world's condition. How few of these persons ever get their inheritance ! They generally die before their fathers die. They expect a large inheritance, and they begin immediately to go down into dissipated habits. They are brought home from the gin-shops, and they begin that night in their delirium to pick off loathsome reptiles from the embroidered pillow, and fight back imaginary devils from the damask curtain. Then they are laid out in the high upholstery of the parlor, and weeping parents come and strew the place with flowers which are prophecies of a resurrection with no hope. You have seen that again and again.

Some of them live on until they get their fortune, and get through it. Some of them go down to a suicide's grave; but show me the graves of the men who started life with great fortune. How many of them are honored graves ? I tell you the best fortune for your boy will be a feeling that he is to fight his own battles, and that life is a struggle into which he must throw body, mind, and soul, or be disgracefully worsted, that is the fortune you want to give your boy. So that you are mistaken if this morning you sat at the breakfast table and looked around at your children and said, "Poor children ! I am so disappointed : I thought I should start them each with a large competency." Depend upon it, the misfortune which is going to save your soul will save their souls.

And then, besides that, in this Sabbath evening's talk I want to impress you, my brother, with the fact that you ought not to put too much stress upon worldly accumulation. How much will you take with you ? Well, what you take you won't take more than two or three miles ; you will have to leave it at Greenwood.

Aquila wanted to take his fortune with him. He was so fond of this world, that he decreed before his death that at his death he should be put into a golden coffin, and that should be enclosed in a silver coffin, and that should be inclosed in an iron coffin, and then these coffins should be lowered into the tomb, and then the tomb filled up with gold and silver ; and so it was done.

Oh ! you who want to take your fortunes with you, be especially guarded ; you will have to make a special provision ; have three coffins.

II. Again, my friend, I want to show you how to make the best of all your bereavements. It is a hard thing to do. The most difficult prayer a man ever made is standing by the form of a loved one lifeless, to say : "Thy will, O Lord ! not mine, be done." And yet there is a way, if the Bible is true, of making the best even of your bereavements.

The most fatal bereavement is the loss of a child. Now is there not a way of making the best of that ? Suppose you had the choice to-night and you could choose for your child sixty years of hard work, struggle, annoyance, and exasperation on earth, or sixty years of rapture in heaven ; would you take the responsibility of choosing for your child sixty years of earthless struggle, instead of sixty years of happiness before the throne of God ? Why, I don't think you would dare to take the chalice of life from your loved one. If your child had lived on to old age, is it not probable that he would have had just as many troubles as you have had, just as many contests in life, just as many exasperations and trials ? And are you not willing to be submissive to-night and make the best of that great trial, when you realize the fact that it has been such a mighty escape for your little ones ?

Besides that, I want you to look upon it as a self-denial for your child. You used to make self-denial for your child : the child wanted to go off with a May-day party, or to a musical entertainment. Well, you said, I will let the child go. It will be more pleasure to have the child home all day, but I must sacrifice myself for the child's good. Although it was gone for a week or a month, you were happy in its absence, for you were willing to make that self-denial for the child's gladness.

Now I want you to look at it in that way, and know that your children that are gone away from you are are in exhilaration and joy indescribable. They are on the hills of heaven, and they are waiting for you. Cannot you go through that self-denial, and let them be away where they are in a more ambrosial clime, and a better home than to keep them in this world ?

Besides that, I want you, my friend, to understand that the more of our loved ones there are in heaven the easier it will be for us to go. When you are going to take a voyage it all depends upon whether you have more friends on this wharf where you are leaving, or on the other wharf to which you are going. The more friends you have on this wharf, the more bitter the "good-by." The more friends you have on the other wharf, the more gladsome the welcome.

In other words, the more of our loved ones we keep here the harder it will be to us to go away from them, when your dying hour comes ; th more friends we have in heaven the easier it i for us to depart. Why, what is dying to tha Christian mother whose children are in heaven Why, it is no harder than it is to go into nursery full of aroma and laughter of littl children.

Some of you may remember when a foreig prince came to our port, and you remember whe the vessel came up the bay how all the shippin was filled with bunting, and how the men-of-wa thundered their broadsides as the prince cam through. And oh ! the greater gladness whe you at last shall come into the port of heave hailed and welcomed with salvos of victory u terly indescribable. All your friends in heave coming around to greet you.

The fewer friends you have on earth the easi to go ; the more friends you have in heaven, t easier for you to depart ; the fewer bitter far wells here, the more numerous the welcomes glory. Now are you not willing even to mal the best of your bereavements ?

III. I would have you also, my friend, make t best of your sicknesses. You see some man ste ping out with an elastic gait and with robu health, and you bemoan your lame foot. Y find some one describing an object a mile d tant, and you lament your own dim eyesight.

You say here is a man that is athletic-healthy man, toiling for God in the church, wh you are generally depressed with a nervous s tem and with exhausted health, and you say, I only had that man's health, I would serve G and how much good I would do ! But, friend, you are making the worst of it instead the best of it. I will tell you how you can m the worst of your sicknesses : brood over the that will make your dyspepsia more aggravat that will make your invalidism more appallin

Oh ! it is the devil's work to tell you how make the worst of it. It is Christ's work the work of His ministers to tell you how m the best of it.

Now I am going to show you how to make best of your sicknesses ; and there are but persons entirely well. There are hundreds people in this house who seem to be in rob health, but very often they are ill. Some them have chronic ailments that the w knows nothing about. Some of them hav nervousness which is very distressing ; and which they get no sympathy at all—the wors all diseases, yet no sympathy. Now let me you how you can make the best of every th even of sickness.

Which of the Bible characters are the most tractive to you ? Which of the Bible na most attract your attention ?—Moses ? Da Job ? Jeremiah ? Paul ? Well they are a names, yet you happen to name the persons were physically disordered. Moses ! I kno was nervous from the way he struck that E tian. Jeremiah ! I know he had an enla ment of the spleen, or he never would written the Lamentations just as he did.

Paul ! he had a thorn in the flesh. Com tators are guessing what that thorn in the was. I don't know, but it was some phy disturbance ; it was something sharp, s thing that struck him ; it was a thorn in flesh. How was it with David ? He say had a running sore : "My sore ran in the n and ceased not." All these good men, so far for God, doing such glorious work for the k dom, were invalids to a certain extent.

Edward Payson never saw a well day i life, and yet, lying upon his suffering pi he cried out, "I float in a sea of glory." R Hall, of whom I spoke this morning, thr four times in every sermon lying down upo sofa in the pulpit, then getting up and goin and sometimes preaching about heaven unti could hear the clap of the wings of the ser Richard Baxter writing, I think it was 120 b and somebody said he had as many diseas he wrote books, yet writing the story o Saints' Everlasting Rest, giving the Call t Unconverted, doing immense work for Go

Oh ! because you may be invalids do not put own the armor of the Christian fight, do not onclude there is nothing to be done for Christ. ere is a work for you to do ; and remember that the Delectable Mountains never appear so ight as when they are seen through the lattice a sick-room, and remember that the promises God's grace are never so easily read as by the ht of the furnace, and remember that you are t always going to be sick. Even heaven is an d city, but it has not had a single bill of mortality—no ophthalmia, no miasma, no pleurisy, sickness. The inhabitants never say "I am sick," there shall be no more pain.

V. Once more, my friends, I want you to ke the best of life's finality. Now you think I have a tough subject, and you do not understand how I can strike a spark of light out of a tombstone. There are those who seem to think that eath is submergence, with nothing pleasant and every thing doleful. That is a heathen idea ; Christian idea, I tell you. From whom can you the best ideas of a man's features? From those that stand close up to him or those who far away from him? Why, your common-sense says, those who stand close up to him can the best idea of his features. Well now, how ill you tell us what the features of death are? ou can't. I will not take your testimony. I ill not take what you say about the features of death. You may be far off from him ; I prefer to e the testimony of those who are close up to features of death—within a month of them, or week of them, or a day of them, or an hour of them, or a minute of them—close up to the features of death. Ask of these Christian people at they think of the features of death, and they l say that the face of death, instead of being moniac, is cherubic, cherubic.

Why, how often it is that the dying Christian been surrounded by friends singing some iliar hymn, and the dying Christian has ned in the hymn, the middle of the second rse, breaking open to let up the ransomed it. Nearly all the dying expressions of istians border on the jubilante. Why, some ple talk as though God had exhausted Him- when He made this world ; as though all the presents He ever made he hung around this net, as though all the beautiful flowers that r grew He planted in a single primrose adow. Oh no ! this world is not the best ng God can do, nor the best thing God has e.

is, I think, near blossom week. Those of us o are brought up in the country remember week we called blossom week, because all the chards were in full bloom that week. It is week of the year most redolent ; I think it come now in five or six or ten days. Well, I t to tell you there is a land to which we ill go when we leave this troublesome walk ver, yet here we stand shivering on this bank want to stay on the dry sands, amid the m and the tempest. When God invites us go in among the arbors of jasmine and amid birds of Paradise, we want to stay here.

ast year I had two spring-times : I went to Orleans in March, I think it was, and as I t on down South, while I left the snow-banks e in our fields, I began after a while to see leaves, and then I went on further and fur- r until I saw the thick foliage, and when I to New Orleans on Sabbath morning I went in the front yard of the beautiful home re I was entertained, and the oranges during night, fully ripened, had fallen all around r the path. It seemed like full summer. n I took the rail train and came North, and ing North there was less and less until I got e, and it was a sharp stinging cold. You see, friend, it depends on the direction in which travel whether it gets pleasanter or whether ets barren.

ow if the spirits of heaven were told to e out towards this world I should not be rised if they did not like to come. It would oming from June to December, but when we from this world toward heaven it is going from December to June : it is going from the snows of an earthly storm to the summer of Edenic bloom. It is going from the arctic of earthly trouble to the tropic of eternal joy ; and yet we do not want to go : we hold back ; we are alarmed because vacation is coming. We have got so used to living down in the malarial marshes of the earth, that we are afraid to go up and live on the hilltop, and we seem to say practically, "O Lord ! keep me down here ; don't emancipate me ; keep me down on the sharp cobble-stone : give me no shelter under the burdens of life ; give me no light under the gloom of misfortune ; give me no help under all the annoyances of earth. Don't emancipate me ; let the storm of earth burst upon me ; don't let me get back to my lost friends ; keep me here, keep me down."

Oh ! what a future for you and for me ! One would think that a man would be afraid to stay, and be fretting to go where such glorious things are provided for us. "What did they do with Lillie?" said one little girl to another, speaking of the burial of a playmate. "What did they do with Lillie?" "Oh !" says the little girl, "they buried her in the ground." "What !" said the other child, "in the cold ground?" "Oh no !" she said, "in the warm ground ; in the warm ground, where the ugly seeds become beautiful flowers."

"Oh !" says some one, "that is all right ; but I have such an antipathy to parting with the body with which I have so long companioned." You will not part with it forever, you will not lose your body. I got a letter this week from Texas, in which some one inquired about something that I had preached about on Easter morning in regard to the resurrection, asking me a great many questions that I cannot answer. There are a thousand questions about the resurrection that I do not pretend to answer. It is not my business to answer. "All that are in their graves shall come forth ;" that is enough for us. You will not lose your body—you will not lose any thing of your body except the weaknesses and sins of it. But your body will come up radiant and glorified ; you will no more lose your body than your watch when you send it to be repaired ; you will no more lose it than you will lose your faded picture when you send to have it retouched ; you will no more lose it than you will lose your jewel when you have it reset, or the photograph when you put it into a locket.

You will not lose your body. Paul will go to Rome to get his. Edward Payson will go to Portland to get his ; President Edward will go to Princeton to get his ; George Cookman—magnificent George Cookman—will go to the depths of the Atlantic to get his. You and I will go to the city cemetery or to the country graveyard to get ours ; and when you have a perfect spirit, united with the perfect body, then you will be such men and women as the resurrection morning makes possible.

Why, you see, you cannot make any thing doleful out of this story. It is emancipation and irradiation. Now I want you to correct your theology. When you see another gray hair thank God, and when you see another wrinkle in your cheek thank God, and when you feel another physical infirmity thank God, and when another year goes past thank God. What does it all mean? Why it means that that you are going to move out of cramped rooms and be mansioned forever : that is what it means. The horse at the gate will not be the one lathered and bespattered carrying bad news ; but the horse at the gate will be the one spoken of in the Apocalyptic vision—the white horse that brought the king to the banquet. The grounds around the palace will quake with the tires and hoofs of the celestial equipage ; and all those people who in this world lost their property, and lost their families, and lost their health, and lost every thing, will find out that all things work together for their good, and that those are the wisest people who make the best of every thing.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE ;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Father Garrett makes a Suggestion—The Jesuits' Rule of Obedience—Lord Macaulay's Opinion of the Jesuits—Mr. Gogharty interviews the Jesuit Superior—The Money Bargain—Mrs. Montaigne becomes an unwitting Instrument in the Plot.

MR. GOGHARTY could scarcely believe his senses as he listened to the Bishop's words. Not only had his proposal not been received with open arms : it had been rejected with scorn, and moreover he had been rebuked by a man whom—as, in his estimate, the bishop of a superstitious church—he was free to despise, and he felt dreadfully humbled and chagrined. He had had it in his purpose to offer a bribe to Bishop —— in order to furnish a spur to his zeal in seeking the perversion of Percival Montaigne ; but such an offer, as he looked into the Bishop's face, he now saw would be utterly futile, and would be even deemed an insult. So making a bow, he turned in silence from the Bishop's presence, and left the apartment. Father Garrett followed him to the outer door.

We have said he was comparatively a young man, and of fiery zeal, and had drunk in the new-born Ultramontane spirit of his church. He was, therefore, surprised, as well as Mr. Gogharty, at the Bishop's rebuff. He knew he was an honorable man and scrupulous ; but still he thought that in the present instance he had carried his niceness a little too far. Mr. Gogharty's motives were certainly not pure ; but that was his affair, and not the Bishop's. In his view, when the Church might be advanced, it was neither wise nor well to stand upon doubtful matters of conscience.

If Mr. Gogharty's scheme could be effected, it would serve the faith, and that was all he had to look to. Therefore, when he reached Mr. Gogharty, and was on the point of parting with him at the hall-door, he said, "Our good bishop is a fine and excellent man, sir, but perhaps is over nice. Try what the Superior of the Society of Jesus, whose establishment is in —— Street, will do for you. It is likely, I think, they will meet your case."

The Order of the Society of Jesus, or the Jesuits.—who is there that has not heard of them, their doings, and their vow? Founded by Ignatius Loyola, a Spaniard, in 1540, and numbering at first only ten members, in 1710 so prolific had their propagandism proved that there were nineteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight Jesuits doing the work of the Pope with a self-consuming zeal in every part of the known world, and their number has since increased. The following is a short extract from their rule of obedience—one of the most destructive of all mental freedom and true manhood ever proposed : "That man's obedience is not worthy to be called by the name of virtue," says this document, "who does not make the will of the Superior his own, and so agree with it that what one wills both will, and what one does not will neither does the other." And again, "Let every man (Jesuit) be well persuaded that he who lives under obedience ought sincerely to be governed and behave exactly as if he were a corpse, which suffers itself to be turned in all directions and dragged anywhere ; or as if he were an old man's staff, to be used wheresoever and in whatsoever he wishes who holds it in his hand." And right well—or rather, so far as society is concerned, right pestilently—have these bondsmen in soul and spirit carried out their vow of implicit and abject obedience.

Every one knows Lord Macaulay's masterly sketch of the Jesuits' career. We can only give here a single sentence from it : "Jesuits were to be found under any disguise and in any country, as scholars, physicians, or even serving men ; in the courts of kings, in the old manor-houses of Cheshire, among the hovels of Connaught—in morals severe or lax, as suited their purpose. Inflexible in nothing but in fidelity to their Church."

And it was to "the religious house" of the Jesuits that, as advised, Mr. Gogharty wended his way after he descended the steps of Bishop ——'s abode. He found no difficulty in obtaining an interview with the Jesuit Superior, nor, as our readers will anticipate, to get that individual to consider his cheme. Mr. Gogharty felt as he opened up his proposal that he was in the presence of a man that perfectly took his measure and read him through and through, but he did not flinch before him, as he did before Bishop ——. He had found one, he felt, who, to gain his ends, could be as unscrupulous as himself.

"You promise, Mr. Gogharty, in case of our success in this matter, a large consideration to our order," said the Superior; "but how, sir, can the fulfilment of that engagement be secured? This affair on your side is altogether, you see, a business affair, and therefore, as a lawyer, you know it should be done in a business way. Of course, as an unworthy and humble servant of the Church, I should be glad, without any pecuniarv reward, to succeed in bringing into the true fold the dear young man you speak of; but still, as you offer a money equivalent, I feel I have a right to be made sure that it shall be paid."

Mr. Gogharty had not contemplated such a financial bond being imposed upon him—had been conceited enough to imagine, notwithstanding the self-revelation he was giving, that his bare word of promise would be deemed a sufficient guarantee. When he found, however, that he was mistaken, and that he was dealing with a man who was resolved to put it in no man's power to befool him, he agreed to lodge in the Superior's hands certain deeds, equal in value to the sum he offered to pay to the Jesuit brotherhood for their bringing about the success of his plot.

These deeds, it is true, were not of his own property, but of the property of some of his clients; his depositing them in other hands was thus a breach of trust; but he was so eager and reckless to attain his end, he would venture upon it.

"They can easily be redeemed," he said within himself, "when the Percival property comes into my son Alick's hands, and no one will be a penny the wiser." He required, however, an acknowledgment for them, and a statement also of the conditions under which they were pledged.

"I'll give it to you," said the Superior, "for I know that for your own sake you will keep it secret; and moreover, I will engage in the same document to surrender these deeds in three years without fee if the object we have in view is not by that time realized. And now, Mr. Gogharty, this matter settled, mind what I am about to add," said the Superior. "You are personally not to take one other single step from this day forth in this affair. You must now leave the whole business completely in my hands. Nor must you murmur, or make complaint to me, or any one else to reach me, of seeming delay. If you stir a jot in the matter yourself, or write me a single line about it, I'll give up the whole enterprise at once, and that though it be on the very eve of accomplishment. You must, however, promise to obey me in what I may require from you, and I engage that what I ask shall not be much." With this understanding, and all preliminaries settled, Mr. Gogharty bade farewell to his friend, and soon reached his home.

A few months passed over, and Mrs. Montaigne one day drove over some miles in her carriage to dine and spend an evening with Mrs. Gogharty; her son Percival, engaged with his studies, could not accompany her, so that she went alone. Mrs. Montaigne had a liking for the wife of her lawyer, and they were very good friends. In the drawing-room, after dinner, Mr. Gogharty and Mrs. Montaigne got to sit near each other, and she opened up to him a matter which she had of late on her mind. "I believe your son Alick, Mr. Gogharty," she said, "is about next term to enter Trinity" (that is, the Dublin University), "at least Percival tells me so." "Quite right, madam," answered the lawyer; "Alick says he is quite ready and hopes to take a good place in the entrance list; he has been a hard worker of late."

"I had thought one time," rejoined Mrs. Montaigne, "that my Percival and your Alick should enter the University together, but lately I have somewhat changed my mind. You see, Mr. Gogharty," she added, "Percival will not enter upon Sir Christopher's estate until he is five-and-twenty, so that there is no need of hurrying his university career. And it has struck me that it would not be an unwise thing to get a first-rate tutor for him for a couple of years, to thoroughly coach him up, you know, so that upon 'entering' then he would likely come off with flying colors. What do you think of it.

"I think well of it," said Mr. Gogharty; and he really did so. "It's a capital idea, madam, and, if carried out, I have no doubt will be a life-long benefit to your son."

After a little more conversation upon the subject, Mrs. Montaigne asked her lawyer friend to negotiate the matter for her, which he did next day, by inserting in one of the leading Dublin newspapers an advertisement for "a first-class university-trained resident tutor, to whom a handsome remuneration would be given."

It would be a fatiguing task to record the shoals of letters which next post, and for days after, poured in upon Mr. Gogharty in answer to his published requirement. All the professions at that time in Ireland were overstocked, and hundreds of university graduates were hungry for employment, many of them, poor fellows, in terrible need.

One reply to his advertisement caught his special attention. It was from an Oxford graduate, who was also a clergyman—a Rev. Jerome Grant; and his application was accompanied with the strongest testimonials of his ability, founded upon a brilliant university career.

Some Englishmen have a prejudice against Irishmen, but it is seldom that the converse holds true. It did not, at all events, with Mr. Gogharty; he liked what was English, so that the nationality of this clergyman was a recommendation in his eyes, and he put Mr. Grant's letter on one side, as a thing to be looked at again.

His attention was called to it, however, with tenfold more force and interest after he perused another letter, taken shortly afterwards from his post-bag, and marked strictly private. It was from the Superior of the Jesuit establishment in Dublin, his quondam friend, and it called his notice to the Rev. Jerome Grant's application, and enjoined him to procure for that gentleman the post of tutor to Mrs. Montaigne's son. "And this," said the Superior, "is the only obedience I shall ask from you in fulfilment of your promise to meet my demand."

It will at once flash upon the perception of the reader who the Rev. Jerome Grant is. Yes, though ostensibly a clergyman of the Anglican Church, he is a secret Jesuit. He entered Oxford University a Protestant, even holding Evangelical views; but the new school of religious thought inaugurated shortly before by the so-called "Tracts for the Times," and which were learned and subtle, slowly but surely sapped his Scriptural faith. Yielding his heart and mind to the advocates of sacerdotalism and sacramental efficacy, and to the pleaders for a return to what was declared to be the opinion and practice of the third and fourth century Church, Jerome Grant, unable to halt upon such an inclined plane as that which was advocated, went far beyond the ideas of its proposers. He felt himself bound, indeed, to repudiate any half-way stopping-place, and to go the whole road to the Church of Rome. He did not, however, advance in his perverted views thus far until he had taken orders in the Anglican Church. Shortly afterwards, seeking an interview with a Jesuit priest, he made known to him his desire for reconciliation with "the Holy See," and his wish even to enter its priesthood, and as he was an unmarried man there seemed no obstacle.

The Jesuit Father Garrett, from interviews with Jerome Grant, saw that he was of menta and moral material likely to serve the dark schemes and deep designs of an order with whom "the end sanctifies the means," and this suggested another line of conduct to the Jesuit. H said to him, "By all means, Mr. Grant, enter ou order, and take our vow, and receive our consecration, but still remain ostensibly an Anglica clergyman; by doing this you will be in a fa better position, my brother (and this was sai with a gracious smile), to further the Catholi movement in England than if you openly de clared your conversion to 'the Church.' Yo can," he added, "without spiritual hurt do this for a dispensation, holding you harmless, can b secured."

THE STRAIT GATE AND THE NARROW WAY.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken.

"Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for man I say unto you, shall seek to enter in, and shall n be able."—LUKE 13 : 24.

Christ Died to make the Way of Salvation Easy The Obstacles in the Way are of our ow Manufacturing—1. Undecided Persons are n in Earnest—2. Decision is a Great Element Success—3. We want to Pass the Strait Ga with Dignity—4. All that we Esteem of Val must be left Outside—The Young Lady in D tress—Her Struggle—The Engaged Ring in t Offertory—The two Explanations of the Tex

It cannot be too emphatically stated, de friends, that the object of our Blessed Lord becoming incarnate and in suffering the dea upon the cross, and thus completing the ato ment for us, was to render the way of salvati plain and easy. Christ died to open the do of salvation to mankind; Christ died to remo the barrier which had walled off mankind fr participation in the mercy of God; and th who complain that they find the way of salvat difficult have to meet this consideration, t Christ died to make it easy.

Whilst it is perfectly true, and it cannot denied, that there are difficulties in accepting salvation brought within our reach, yet th difficulties are not inherent in the plan of sa tion, but lie in our own reluctance to acc God's proposals and submit ourselves to Go way of thinking.

The obstacles and difficulties are of our manufacturing, and are not inherent in Go revelation of the plan.

To begin with, it is perfectly clear, and o ously most necessary, that the door of salva should only stand open to

to enter. Our Lord Himself knew too well w the plan cost Him; and as he Himself tells us to cast pearls before swine, it would be too reasonable to suppose that He Himself c make the mistake of admitting those who not in earnest.

If our hearts are not in earnest about sa tion, even if Christ were to give it to us it w be no salvation to us at all. The old prove saying, which our Lord quotes, must alway remembered,—"They that be whole hav need of a physician, but they that are sick." long as we do not trouble ourselves and ourselves to obtain the salvation which is fered to us, that salvation can never be ours

Wherever I go I meet a great many pe who are in a sort of undecided state; particu disposed to spiritual things, more or less i ested in religion, who will come to our mi services, will be much affected by the ser whilst their fears are aroused and excited, understanding to some extent enlightened yet, after the services are over and the pre gone, back they go into their old courses! chains of worldliness are wound around more securely than ever. And why is it so

1. The first and chief thing is that such pe are not in earnest. You know what it is to earnest about some commonplace matter, some trivial affair. Many a man knows what it is to be in earnest to win wealth; many a Member of Parliament knows what it is to be in earnest to win applause; and many a woman in the West-End knows what it is to be in earnest to be in he whirl of fashion! We all understand what t is to be in earnest about these things.

Now, if our souls are really of the value which he Bible represents them to be, and if they be worth the price put upon them by that book, surely reason would urge that we should be in earnest about their salvation. And if we are not in earnest we are so untrue to ourselves that we cannot be true to Christ; nor can the salvaion, brought so near that it is within the reach of the vilest of the vile, be of the slightest service o us unless we are desirous of getting it for ourselves.

2. Then another great element in success is decision. If the thing is obtainable we must say and feel, Then it shall be obtained.

WE PLAY TRICKS WITH OUR SOULS.

We run up to the gate of mercy, take hold of the knocker, and knock very gently; then a week after we do the same thing again, but without being any nearer the attainment of salvation. Then you say, "Oh, I have sought it, but I did not get it. It did us no good. We went to the mission, and asked God for salvation, but He did not answer me."

Now, dear friends, is not this simply a mockery? If we were in earnest in trying to escape rom a burning house should we act after that ashion? Should we quietly throw up our windows, call feebly "Fire!" or "Policeman!" and then go to our beds again? If we were in earnest to escape from drowning should we be content with just raising our head and our voice in hope that the lifeboat would reach us, and then take no more pains in the matter?

Ah, we know what it is to be in earnest in worldly matters, but in spiritual matters we play tricks with God. We go up to the gate now and then, and we knock so gently as to mock he majesty of God and to trifle with our own souls!

He whose whole life is full of mercy to men, who has died that the barrier might be broken down and the way made clear and open, has given this word of advice, "Strive (agonize) to enter in at the strait gate." Be in downright earnest; it is worth being in earnest. Just as he wrestler is in earnest, though the prize for which he strives may be only a laurel wreath, make up your minds that the thing shall be done.

"Oh," say some, "we thought that your eaching was that it would never be done by our own energies or efforts." Just so; but you won't be saved without your own efforts, without earnestness. You can never save yourselves, and you can never be saved except by leaving your case in the hands of God. But until we are in earnest we are not in a position to do even his. So says our Blessed Lord; and we are always safe in following His advice: "Agonize o enter in at the strait gate."

3. The figure used suggests to our mind that he gate is so strait that to pass through it, or the advice would not be "Agonize!" And a further thought is that there is difficulty in passing through it, and that the difficulty lies not so much in the gate as n our wanting to pass through as we please. We want to take in with us our own virtues, our own good character. We would go in if we might do so with becoming dignity. But be assured you will never get through in this way; you will never get through if the object is not simply to get through, but to get through in an easy and dignified way. You will never get in thus; but the strait gate will become even straiter than ever.

Now many are kept from entering on this very account. If the Lord would admit you in the easy and dignified manner which you desire to assume, it would not be difficult for you to accept salvation; but to come right down in the place of the sinner, to know and own yourself unclean, to confess your utter inability to do even so much as to raise your hand to save yourself, why, it is a very humbling process indeed. It is the very negation of dignity; and so you shrink back from it, and you do not find yourself because you will not lose yourself!

Dear friends, is it so with any of you? Away with your dignity! Trample it in the dust! You are simply a poor sinner, and as such you had better just accept the pardon of a ransomed felon. Come and accept the salvation which He offers on His own terms; for if we do not humble ourselves to this we shall never get inside the strait gate.

4. Another thought—we must not only be content to lay all our dignity aside, but we must also part company with all that we would take through the gate with us. If the gate is very narrow on our back with us. Many would be content to be saved if they could take in the sins which have become part and parcel of their nature. It is not that you do not want to get at last to heaven, or that you do not intend to make your peace with God; but you want to keep something which God does not mean you to keep, something which He hates—some secret sin.

You often feel a wish to enter; but you think, "If I do so I shall have to give up this sin which I love." Or perhaps it may be some worldly relationship; and how many a man and woman is kept back from the love of Christ because there is another love in possession, a stronger love!

Some years ago I met

of mind. I asked her to come in the vestry and see me; and all I could say about the love of God seemed to bring her no nearer to peace. I did not then know her story, but I heard it from friends afterwards. She was the daughter of a respectable man, but a merely nominal Christian, who sent her to a Unitarian school, where she made the acquaintance of, and became attached to, a gentleman of large property, an avowed atheist.

She was not herself possessed of much worldly goods. She soon became imbued with his opinions and they became engaged. Just after this a Christian uncle pressed her father to allow her to come to his house; and when she saw the holy and happy life of this man she was much impressed with it, and saw that religion was a reality as well as a source of deep joy.

Just at this time the evangelistic services of Mr. Moody began in Liverpool, and she was induced to attend. The Word came home with power to her heart, and her infidel opinions became dissipated. She was convinced of the truth of God's revelation, but she became in consequence very wretched, for she felt she would have to give up this attachment; that she could not bind herself for life to a man who denied God. The connection was broken off; but when, a few months after, the father became aware of it, he was immensely incensed against it, and determined to cast her off for thus throwing away her prospects. Strange to say, she was as far from peace as ever.

I stood the last Sunday morning of one of my missions in the same town at the communion table to receive the offertory, and in one of the plates I noticed

A LITTLE TURQUOISE RING.

We wondered in the vestry whether it had slipped from some one's finger by accident, or whether it had been placed in the plate intentionally. At night, however, I received an intimation after the service in another part of the town that a lady desired to speak with me, and when she was brought into the vestry I found it was the same lady; but she now seemed bright and cheerful.

I told her how glad I was to see her so much more happy, and she told me she had now found perfect peace. I asked her how the change came about, and she said, "You saw that ring in the plate this morning? Thank God, I have been able to give it up! It was connected with all my past life. I used often to take it out and look at it, and then rebellious thoughts against God would fill my heart, and then I was vexed at the thought of how much I had given up, and I doubted if I had taken the right step in accepting the unseen instead of the seen. That little ring stood between me and the Cross of Christ; and I thought on Sunday morning that that should no longer separate me from peace, and when the plate came round I took it off my finger and cast it in the plate."

Dear friends, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate." It may be hard to flesh and blood; Nature may shrink from the task; but if there is any thing secret that stands between you and the Cross of Christ, believe me you stand in the way of your truest happiness; though you may shrink from it, let there be a complete surrender of the soul to the hand of God.

Do you say it is too much to ask?

IS IT TOO MUCH TO ASK?

Take that very illustration I have just given. Suppose that person had adopted an opposite course; suppose she had tried to cling to the Cross with one hand only and to that attachment with the other, could she then have expected peace? A household without happiness, though surrounded by all that wealth and position and social distinction can give, would be a miserable life indeed! If she had made that mistake how miserable she would have been! Now she has God for her portion, God for her friend!

Our Blessed Lord points out that "many shall strive to enter in, and shall not be able." There are two explanations of this verse, standing as it does. There are some who explain it by the light of the following verses, and there are some who explain it in the light of the figure itself; the former suggesting the solemn consideration that the time will come when the only door to the path of life will not be open—"many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able;" the other explanation pointing to the fact that many seek, but not at the strait gate, avoiding all the time the gate which God has appointed.

Now there has been a great deal of discussion as to which view is the correct one. It is clear, however, that both views are confirmed in God's Word in diverse places. Many strive, but they do not seek to enter through the strait gate. It is a very commonplace error. We are constantly meeting with illustrations of it. People do not like the humiliation of coming right down to the sinner's place and accepting salvation on God's own terms.

People will say, "I don't know why there should be all this fuss. Here is for the strait gate. Instead of entering as a lost sinner, begin to be very much in earnest; begin to read your Bible. You only go to church once a week! I'm astonished at you; go twice every Sunday. Can't you go and take a class in the Sunday-school? And then, by and by, when you become better acquainted with your clergyman, you can take a district; and people will say you are the very soul of devotion; and when that is true of you you will have nothing to fear."

Now, what does all that mean?

It just means this--that the Lord Jesus Christ stands before you and points to that strait gate, and says, "My child, strive to enter in at the strait gate." But Satan steps in and says, "I would not do any thing of the kind; I will show you a way round there which will bring you just exactly to the same place. I have got any number of side gates into heaven. I have invented ever so many means and ways of getting over this fence! Would you like to enter by the gate of Speculative Theology? Well, you have been baptized, of course, and being baptized you are regenerated; and being regenerated you do not need any conversion. It is quite absurd to suppose that you need that." Debate not with Satan, nor listen to his wiles. "To obey is better than sacrifice." The Master says, "Strait is the gate," and though few there be that find it, "strive to enter in."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the American public and readers of his sermons. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

DR. TALMAGE says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress, it is thought may Adjourn by June 20th. The appropriation bills have yet to be passed, but there is a probability that Democrats having made their stand for principle will allow them to be passed in such a form as will meet the approval of the President.

The Finance Committee agreed by a majority of one to defer consideration of the Warner Silver Bill until December.

The Democratic Nomination for Governor of Ohio is General Thomas Ewing, of Fairfield, who will, it is thought, unite both the Democratic and Greenback parties. He is undoubtedly a soft-money man, and holds other views with which the Nationals are in sympathy. Considerable interest is centred on this election, for the tide of opinion which has decided the Presidential election has usually found expression in the gubernatorial contest in Ohio. Ewing is a formidable rival to Foster, carrying as he does the support of both Democratic and National politicians.

Anti-Chinese Legislation is again being pressed upon Congress. Senator J. H. Slater, of Oregon, has introduced a bill in the Senate to prevent Chinamen resident in the United States engaging in business as manufacturers or miners; or to have any farm or garden; or to own cattle, horses, or sheep; or to keep any restaurant or hotel, except for the use of the Chinese themselves. In fact the Chinaman is allowed by the bill to breathe, but it is difficult to think of anything else he would be able to do if the measure became law.

The International Copyright Law has long needed revision, and has been for many years the subject of complaint on both sides the Atlantic. Messrs. Harper Brothers, the New York publishers, have made a suggestion which will probably receive the attention of the commission. They recommend that an author be allowed to copyright his work in England and America providing the publisher in each case be a citizen of the country in which the book is issued.

Tenement-House Reform.—The Committee appointed at a public meeting about three months ago to carry out some practical plan of tenement house reform has dissolved, considering that its labors cannot be productive of any more good, now that the law regulating such buildings in New York and Brooklyn has been amended in accordance with its suggestions. The bill in question has not yet been acted upon by the Governor, but as there cannot be a doubt of its approval the committee claims that its work has been accomplished.

The new law will certainly be a most valuable protection to the hundreds of thousands who now live in tenement-houses in the two cities.

Letters Imperfectly Addressed are a fruitful source of trouble to correspondents and post-office officials. The extent to which this carelessness prevails is not generally known. The postmaster of New York says that it is not an uncommon thing to have 50,000 letters deposited in the office in a single day so incomplete in their directions that it is difficult to tell where they should be sent. There are 18 Brooklyns, 20 Williamsburgs, 12 Bostons, 17 Charlestons, 25 Daytons, and 30 Washingtons, and so on, in the United States. If the writer of a letter addresses it to John Smith, and names the post-office, but not the State, or names the State, but not the county, there is no certainty that the letter will go to the office he intends. All letter-writers would do well to take the hint, and thus save themselves, as well as the post-office, no little trouble.

The Death of General James Shields occurred on June 1st. He was seventy years of age, having been born in Ireland in 1809. He came to America in 1826 and speedily attracted notice by his intelligence and courage. He served in the Mexican War and took a prominent part in the Civil War. At the battle of Cerro Gordo he was severely wounded, it was thought fatally. Some of his men were about to remove him from the field, but General Shields said: "I am of no further use to my country. You are. Lay me down and let me die; I might as well die here as be taken off to die. You are all strong, able-bodied men—able to do your country some service. For God's sake lay me down and go to your duty." Fortunately his fears were not verified, for by the aid of a captured Mexican surgeon the General eventually recovered.

He commanded a division of General Banks' army in the Shenandoah Valley, and defeate General "Stonewall" Jackson at Winchester, where he was wounded, but remained on the field, issuing his commands from a litter. He also commanded at Fort Republic in 1865. In 1863, having suffered severely from his wounds, he resigned his commission and removed to Wisconsin.

The Midnight Mission is a Christian Work carried on so quietly and unostentatiously that comparatively few people even among Christian workers know any thing about it, yet it is doing an amount of good, the full extent of which will be known only in eternity.

Some twelve years ago a gentleman who had taken a prominent part in the mission to Fallen Women in London, came to New York and endeavored to interest the Christian philanthropists of the city in the subject. Eventually the City Mission and Tract Society undertook the work, and the Home in Greene Street was established. The result of the effort was for some time somewhat discouraging, but patience, perseverance, and unceasing prayer have with the blessing of God brought about signal success.

The last report of the Mission shows that 28 girls were received into the home during th year, of whom 193 were rescued from thei life of shame. Of these some returned t their friends, others were married, others be came domestic servants, and some are engage as nurses in other institutions.

The Method of Operation in an Attempt

Mission deserves notice on account of the sign success which has attended it. The ruling pri should not be a mission, but a home, and eve effort is made to make the inmates feel then no penalties, and there is perfect freedom, bo sewing, fancy-work, domestic duties, or laund that a hearty welcome will be found there shou

It is an unusual circumstance for one who h sinful life. If a testimony were needed to t value of the mission, none stronger could

Colonel Robert Ingersoll, the notorious infidel, delivered a funeral oration over the remains of his deceased brother, Ex-Congressman E. C. Ingersoll, at Washington on June 2d. He said : " Life is a narrow vale ; we strive in vain to ook beyond the heights ; we cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead here comes no word, but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing." How contrary this is to facts within the knowledge of a great cloud of witnesses, who have tended their loved ones to the very brink of Jordan, and have with their mortal ears heard the shouts of victory as the released spirits entered the gates of glory !

There has seldom been a funeral lament more tender and more pitiful than that uttered by Colonel Ingersoll over his dead brother, whom he seems to have loved with all his heart, and rom whom he evidently felt he had parted forever. God grant that the blasphemer may be humbled in his affliction, and may realize that he Author of love never created the social and domestic affections to be hopelessly blighted ; but that there is " a continuing city " to come, he way to which has been opened by the Lord esus, where friendships will be everlastingly revived and joys eternally cemented.

The Theatre Losing its Charm.—Mr. Moody in a late address told a striking incident of a lady who hesitated to come out as a convert lest she hould be debarred from going to the theatre. But Mr. Moody assured her that she might do any thing that did not interfere with giving her upreme love to Christ ; and she came out finally on the Lord's side. Soon after she went to he theatre, but instead of any enjoyment in it he found herself so troubled that she could not stay through, and she afterwards declared that he whole thing was so changed, and looked so different from what it had formerly, that she had no relish for it whatever. And this is but a common experience of theatre-goers who become hearty and earnest Christians.

Trains Stopped by Insects.—A Western-bound emigrant train was recently delayed two hours and a half near Clarke's Station, Nevada, by an army of crickets that had taken possession of hree miles of the railroad. The driving-wheels of the engine, on striking the insects, would whirl around without going forward an inch. The train men were finally compelled to take brooms and sweep the insects off the rails. So do " the weak things of the world confound the mighty."

A Bridal Gift.—A Good Example set by a Boston bride has had at least one following. The Boston lady, a daughter of one of the wealthiest men there, being about to marry, asked her father to let the wedding be as quiet as possible, and to give her the money which would have been spent in flowers, wines, etc. With his money she gave a certain sum to the poor of each city which she visited on her wedding ourney. A short time since the wedding of one of the great capitalists of New York City was marked by as beautiful and touching an incident. One of the gifts of the bride was the ending of one hundred orphan boys to homes in the West. Can there be imagined a better way for a bride to begin her new life ?

Mr. Moody's Farewell to Baltimore.—After he usual converts' experience meeting, conducted by Mr. Bliss in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, May 26th, a proposition was made by a gentleman present that the whole congregation adjourn to march to Mr. Moody's dwelling, on Lanvale Street, and bid im "good-by" before he left Baltimore for his ome in Massachusetts. The proposal met with eneral acceptance, and about four hundred persons, most of them men, marched in procession, bearing lanterns, to the house. Arrived there, hey began to sing some of the hymns which are Mr. Moody's favorites, and as the many manly oices in fine unison broke upon the still night he windows of houses in the neighborhood be-an to be raised, and persons who had not yet retired clustered on their door-steps. Professor Harry Sanders, holding a lantern to see the score, and surrounded by ladies who have taken part in the singing and inquiry meetings since the meetings first began, directed the massive chorus of voices which sang with a tremor of feeling peculiar to the occasion.

Directly Mr. Moody, looking unusually ministerial in the shade, appeared on the little balcony fronting one of the windows, and amid the hush of the crowd began to speak. He was greatly overcome with emotion, and stopped several times, choking with sobs. He concluded with a hearty " God bless Baltimore ; God bless you all, and may we meet in Heaven. Good-by."

A Juvenile Monster lives at Paterson, N. J. He is a boy seven years old, who is preternaturally quick-witted, and is able to repeat long extracts from any lecture or oration after having listened to it, with all the actions and mannerisms of the speaker. If he were to stop here all might be well ; but these oratorical displays are generally made in bar-rooms, and, as a reward for them, the youth demands liquor, and has become a confirmed drunkard, often being carried home in a state of hopeless intoxication on a shutter.

Messrs. Pentecost & Stebbins have concluded their work at Minneapolis, Minn. More than a hundred persons have come forward to profess their conversion as the result of their labors. The pastors of the city have unanimously requested them to return in November to commence another series of special services.

The Cyclone in Kansas and Missouri has produced a serious amount of distress as well as inflicted great loss of life. At Irving and Frankfort there were twenty persons killed and forty-eight wounded. Hundreds of people in Irving, Sabatha, and Frankfort, and in the intervening country along the track of the cyclone, are left in destitution. Contributions for their aid should be sent to J. S. Walker, Treasurer of the Irving Relief Committee, Irving, Kansas.

Missionaries to Africa Must be Total Abstainers. Mr. Mackey, of the Nyanza mission, writes : " Drink is the curse of Africa." Wherever grain is plentiful he has found drunkenness. " Every night every man, woman, and child, even to the suckling infant," may be seen " reeling with the effects of alcohol." " On this account chiefly," he adds, " I have become a teetotaler on leaving the Coast, and have continued so ever since. Whoever would introduce civilization into Africa must be total abstainers."

A Methodist Patriarch.—Dr. Lovick Pierce, who was ordained by Bishop Asbury, and who began his service as preacher in 1804, on his ninety-fourth birthday anniversary, March 24th, baptized five of his great-grandchildren and one great-great-grandchild at his home in Sparta, Ga., where he resides with his son, Bishop Pierce, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

At the Foreign Missionary Meeting at Saratoga, May 22d, Miss Sarah Smiley struck a true note when she said : " We shall have light to shed upon others when we have been filled ourselves. It is largely through the power of prayer that the heathen women are brought to our side. The time is fast hastening away for our work, and the question will be asked us : ' Where hast thou gleaned to-day.' "

A Hero's Death.—Engineer Benjamin Pritchard, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, died like a hero a few days since, with his hand on the air-brake of his engine. He saw a fallen rock on the track, and instead of saving his own life by jumping, saved the lives of the passengers by holding on. His name ought to find a place in the annals of fame.

Dr. Guthrie, the eminent Scotch Divine, said he had four excellent reasons for being a total abstainer ; viz., His head was clearer ; his health was better ; his heart was lighter, and his purse was heavier. These results flowed from total abstinence.

ADDRESS AT THE PASTORS' COLLEGE,

By C. H. Spurgeon, on May 6, 1879.

The Dutchman's Greeting—A Road Spoiled by Mending—Superhuman or Infrahuman Ministers—A Great Painter—The Wounded Irish Soldier—A Diver's Illustration—Dr. Bennett's Tank at Mentone—Palm Trees at Mentone—The Port of Mentone—The Carman's Prayers Answered—Consequential Ministers — Three Men in the Arctic Regions—Good Dreams.

Upon rising to deliver his inaugural address, Mr. Spurgeon was greeted with hearty rounds of applause, every member of the conference rising. When this demonstrative greeting had subsided, Mr. Spurgeon said :

" I am reminded upon the present occasion of an incident which happened to me at Mentone. Nearly every morning I met a Dutchman upon the stairs of the hotel in which I was staying. His universal greeting was, ' We're bruderes.' Any further development of the conversation had to be sustained through the medium of a Roman Catholic priest.

" I feel that ' We are brothers ' is an expression which becomes a fitting introduction to my address. The indications of real brotherhood which exists among the students of the Pastor's College gives me heartfelt joy at all times. If any ungenerous or unkind criticism has passed between any of the brethren, let this conference time be the opportunity for setting it right. Hitherto the blessing of God has rested upon them, and produced love and kindness. Some discourses are discursive ; such, I feel, mine must be on this occasion. A word about

THE PRESENT OUTLOOK.

" Although we can see but a portion of the Christian field, and draw our conclusions from but limited observation, I do not feel at all depressed at the prospect. Things are not so very bad, after all.

" We are told there is a lack of zeal and enthusiasm. Well, that depends upon the person observing. It is generally those who are deficient of zeal and love in themselves who are the first to discover the lack of those virtues in others.

" The general outlook certainly is not bright. A few years ago unbelievers made their attack from all quarters with the utmost courage. They had not much to lose ; they were attired in their own natural beauty, as were our Zulu friends at the Cape. I give them credit. They came on at a very dashing rate and tremendous speed, and certainly did appear to win some victories, so that the hearts of some failed them.

" At the present moment, however, under very steady fire of the orthodox, they appear to be meditating rather some fresh attack than to be carrying on one that seems to me to be extremely disorganized. Their precious schemes, plans, and doxies seem to have been blown into thin air.

" While I do not attach so much importance to the discussions among the Congregational brethren, yet I cannot but note it as a wonderful sign of the times. It shows that unbelief and free-thinking have not yet secured the victory. The public mind seems to be in very much the same condition as that of the prodigal—spending its substance in riotous living, and in sheer hunger saying, what it will utter still more loudly before long, ' I will arise and go to my father.'

" I am reminded here of a road along which I some time since travelled, but was unable to proceed far on it because the road-makers had mended it with such effectiveness, though it was a very fair road indeed before they had touched it. So many ministers keep on mending the road that sinners are unable to find the way to Christ, because of the efforts that are made to fill up the holes made by sceptical thinkers. Let us run the steam roller of tremendous faith over the whole concern, and expect to see happier and increased traffic.

" I have been ever since the last conference thinking what should be my theme upon this occasion, and I have decided, though reluctantly, to address myself to

THE DISCOURAGED ONES.

To some it is not given to achieve a rapid success. This want of conversion tells terribly upon the right kind of men for ministers, while with others this non-success must be perpetual unless their own hearts are first broken. I have known ministers of equable temperament, but as dry as an old piece of leather—juiceless, sapless, unhuman; either superhuman or infrahuman, you could scarcely tell which. Some managed to find troubles in their churches, no doubt through the extreme amiability of their tempers coming into contact with those of an opposite character; sometimes, perhaps, through the natural acidity of temper which they had not always been able to keep under proper check.

"But some brethren, wherever they went, found the waters troubled. They are a sort of broom to sweep the house; sometimes they make a wonderful clear sweep of it, and then it comes to pass that they are themselves swept away. Now, this was discouraging enough for anybody. To think that, notwithstanding all the combination of goodness displayed in their daily lives, yet some people would be so wicked as to take objection to them! To some there seemed discouragement that they had a very poor congregation as to numbers, although they tried to feel that those were very select and had sufficient judgment and comprehension to know what was good for them. Those empty benches, those unlet sittings, those great vacancies, as if the mouth of the church had lost its teeth, all tend to make their hearts go down below zero. Occasionally it was important that they should not encourage those brethren at all, but as a matter of fidelity before God ask them whether they were sure of their qualification for the work; whether they were quite satisfied that the verdict of the Church of God and of many good men was certainly mistaken in regard to them; and whether there was not a suspicion in their own hearts that when they left the counting-house, the cobbler's bench, the plough, or any other honorable form of toil, they had not made a mistake.

"If such a suspicion exists in any of your minds, gentlemen, by your loyalty to Christ I beg of you to go at once to the bottom of the ladder, find where the hindrance is, and remove it. If God intended any of you to fly, though he may not have given you the wings of a cherubim, there would be some token of a pinion apparent. But when a brother does not fly at all, except from place to place, the sooner he gives up being one of the angels of the church the better.

"A great painter once declared to his wife that he would paint no more, for the reason that he had become satisfied with his work, and, having thus reached his ideal, he could expect no more success. If a great painter argued so, how much more surely should a dauber avoid self-satisfaction; a state of sorrow for their own weakness and helplessness would certainly be the most fruit-bearing condition. So you need to be cast into the fire of holy love and intense fervor, to avoid the end of a fruitless minister who passes away,—

'Goes back to the dust from whence he sprung, Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.'

AN ENCOURAGEMENT.

"You should bear in mind when thinking upon the success of others, that God while favoring His servants with infinite joy in public often disciplines them in private in order to enable them to bear their prosperity. The most joyous heart perhaps amongst us would not like to tell out all its depression lest others should be thereby depressed.

"You remember the Irishman who was wounded on the battle-field, and hearing a man who was also wounded near him making a great noise over his trouble, Pat, in the language which belonged to his native country, exclaimed, 'Hould yer tongue, do you think there is nobody kilt but yourself?' The philosophy of such an observation commends itself to our notice. I will claim championship in the department of affliction with any of you.

"A diver whom I once met at the Crystal Palace told me that he would have to add some 70 pounds to his helmet before he could sink. Many young brethren would have to clap on a good deal of the weight of trouble to keep them where they should be, and to give them the power of sympathy with others. A gentleman wanting to cross the Thames in the olden times, on inquiring for a ferryman, had many applications, and inquired severally if the applicants could swim. One after another replied that they could; but on coming to one who said he could not, he engaged him, feeling satisfied that he would not risk his life by getting into the water, and therefore there was more chance of his getting across in safety.

"I would prefer a minister who had known what tribulation means, and who could tremble with tenderness on entering the pulpit, for such a one would keep near to God for his own soul's sake, and consequently would be more useful to me.

"Do not judge yourself by other people, and say, 'I should like to be like Mr. So-and-So,' for it may be that one of his sort is enough.

"Be individuals and not somebody else's tail. The brother who you might envy has, perhaps, a brighter sphere of labor, yet you want to have as much water in your little reservoirs. This reminds me of my friend Dr. Bennett, of Mentone, who has a small garden on the rocks, and wanted to place a tank in it to contain many tons of water; he could not obtain this space in the breadth of the tank, so he made it deep. Be deep, gentlemen, and do the work thoroughly.

"The fox in the old fable boasted to the lioness as to how many cubs she had at a birth. 'I understand,' said she to the lioness, 'that you have only one—barren creature!' 'But, madam,' replied the lioness, 'that one is a lion.' If you cannot have many in your congregation, let those that you have be the best instructed in the world. When I heard of a cure of souls for which 1200*l*. ($5820) had been given with a population of ninety, I concluded they ought to cure them with the best salt, and do them thoroughly well; so that when I meet with the brother who has only a handful of people, I never expect them to complain that he does not visit them, or that his sermons are not well studied. How fat his few sheep ought to be, for he has the same pasture as the brother with the much larger flock. You may be depressed because you do not succeed the first twelve months of your pastorate as did your venerable predecessors; you must remember that before one can light a fire it sometimes happens that the chimney has to be cleared of the damp, and a draught created.

"I planted, some four years ago, at Mentone, some palm-trees. Upon remarking to the gardener that they had not made any perceptible progress, he told me that it took three or four years for them to establish themselves, but when they did begin to grow then progress would be most evident. So the first thing a minister has to do is to establish himself, and gain, and then keep, the affection of the congregation.

"Take care of your PERSONAL PIETY.

"Who will possess the kingdom of heaven? At least the Calvinists! Probably; but I have not so read. The zealots? the eloquent men? I have not so read. I commend to your particular notice the words, 'The saints shall possess the kingdom, and the victory will be to the saints.' Sanctity will win the day. They who will survive the struggle, and bear the King's colors out of battle, and surely walk even in white, being worthy, are the saints.

"Holiness is possible in the minister, surpassing every thing else, and often makes up for deficiency in other respects. Some, I am afraid, do not get on in the ministry because they do not get on with God. There is lots of sermon-preaching, hurrying away to tea-meetings, and so on; but it should be remembered that to shine much you must be full of oil, and if you would grow you must have plenty of manure with which to feed the roots of your souls.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

"I must go again for my figures where I went for rest. I saw at Mentone several palm-trees in a row; one of them was higher and better altogether than the rest, and it alone bore fruit. The doctor explained that the cause of the one being so much more advanced than the others was that it had struck its roots right into the tank, the whole of which it had to suck at, and could not help growing bigger. A palm-tree grows best with its head in the fire and its root in water. So, blessed is the man who lives near to God, for he should be like a tree planted by the rivers and water, that bringeth forth his fruit in season; his leaf also should not wither, and whatsoever he doeth should prosper.

"Do not run away and get disheartened, for there is much to do before success may be expected. They are making a port of Mentone, and in laying a breakwater they have had to let down under water some sixty feet of stone before anything whatsoever of the work appeared. After many years and rolling mountains into the sea they had a respectable breakwater. Our church work, too, lays very much under water. You should not be discouraged though millions of tons of your hard work should have to be rolled into the sea for a basement on which the superstructure might be reared.

"As an illustration of delayed blessing, I may mention the fact that a member of the Tabernacle prayed every morning with his carmen before they went out to business for nineteen years, and yet had observed no result until recently, when he had a dream that one of his men was converted, which was just afterwards exactly realized in fact, for many of them became converted, so that it became necessary for him to enlarge the accommodation for meeting them on Sunday evenings. The father had long worked and the son shared in the results.

"I have seen sometimes a very big man in th ministry, very learned, one to whom you woul never have the presumption to speak—a ver dignified man, having an air about him as if say ing, 'How blessed are they who dwell near m and have an opportunity of even gazing upon me A shake of the hands would immortalize an ord nary being. But I am afraid that my bump veneration for such men is small. I recollect kin and princes whom I have seen, and for the mo part they have been dressed very ordinarily, ve plainly, as gentlemen generally are. But the footmen—things surpassing wonder! Bedeck with lace, buttons, furs, stars, and garters of sorts. Seeing such a footman the other d splendidly arrayed in furs, I said, If I cou afford to buy those furs I would wear them m self. Standing behind 'my lord's' carriage wh wonderful calves—beauties of nature and a For a moment set the king beside his footman a very natural comparison when thinking of t Man of Nazareth, who took a little child and him in the midst of them, and allowed a p sinner to come and wash His feet with her tea In the patronizing way of many such big m many ministers treat young men who want th recommendation. What if one were to s 'Well, Mr. Flunkey, who is your governor?' sort of question I have often longed to pu such brethren. Pray remember, however h may be the station you may occupy, you are y servants still.

THE CURE FOR DESPONDENCY.

"Whenever you are down in the dumps, t as an antidote, to encourage some one else. y friend Rogers cheered me when I was awa y writing me one of his inimitable sententious t- ters, in which he reminded me that while y voice was silent, 400 mouths were open for d that I had helped to train. Think of other o- ple more than yourselves, and you shal be cheered yourselves.

"There is a story of three men who were i he Arctic regions. One of them saw a poor f t- bitten traveller lying down, but said he c ld not stop to attend to him; he must keep g ng. to keep his blood in circulation, or he wou be frozen to death, and he passed on. Then me another, who overtook him. He set to rubbing the half-frozen one until he brought life from what else had been a deadly sleep. He got him up, and they walked on together. A little way ahead they found, dead as a stone, the man who felt he must take care of himself.

"Of the latter days it is written, 'The young men shall see visions, and the old men shall dream dreams.' If you want quickening, go and fall asleep with Paul, and in your imagination hear the call from Macedonia. 'Come over and help us.' Hear the dying sinners on all sides and the perishing multitudes around you asking for the help of God through His instruments. Say, 'All the members of my church and congregation, them which sail with me, hath God given me. I have dreamed the dream, and now will I go forth expecting its fulfilment.' Will not this encourage you? If not, I think you must be dreamers in another sense."

THE IRISH SOLDIER'S FURTHER CAREER.

Recollections by Major Malan.

He goes on Foreign Service to Gibraltar—Thence to the West Indies—His uncontrollable Gratitude for his Master's Preservation—Death of his Master in the Crimean War—After returning Home, he Serves in India—Retires on a Pension and Marries — His Saving Faith in Christ.—His Death and Funeral.

THAT famous rock Gibraltar was the station abroad where Paddy was initiated into the peculiarities of "furreners" and "furren parts." He had learnt the circumstances connected with his pardon, and all the affection of his warm heart centred in the officer to whom he was so much indebted, and who had now rejoined the regiment. His honesty and cheerfulness had gained for him the respect of the officers of his company, and to his great joy he was selected by his noble friend as his soldier servant.

A life of self-renouncing love
Is a life of liberty.

So Paddy found it. He could not do too much for the man to whom he was so greatly indebted. Under the influence of beef he had developed into a remarkably powerful man. He was a perfectly Hercules.

The regiment was duly moved from Gibraltar to the West Indies, and there an incident occurred which proved the depth of Paddy's attachment. The officers owned a yacht, and while some of them were absent on a cruise, a very severe gale set in for several days, and a report was spread through the barracks that the boat had been capsized and that all were drowned.

His benefactor was one of the party, and poor Paddy's anxiety and grief were very evident. But a soldier must do his duty and has to hide his feelings, for melancholy is never welcome, and seldom allowed to remain inside a barrack-oom. All hope of their safety was given up, when one evening the whole party walked into the mess-room when the officers were at dinner. Military men can picture the scene. What a reception they had, and how sincere and heartfelt were the congratulations on their safe return.

Paddy at the time was employed in cleaning he plate in a passage just outside the mess-oom, and hearing an unusual noise and the remarks of the officers' servants, looked into the oom, and there, to his wonder and unutterable oy, beheld the man he so dearly loved standing alive, surrounded by a knot of his brother offiers.

Once more love burst all barriers. Ignoring he distance which military discipline necessarily laces between the officer and the soldier, and orgetting every thing but the fact before his eyes, with his shirt-sleeves tucked up and the butler's apron on, he dashed across the mess-oom, broke through the circle of officers, and aking the object of his devotion within the lasp of his powerful arms, while the tears rolled lown his face, he loudly blessed God for havng spared him, and again and again kissed him.

It was the act of a moment. It was true to nature. And although, as soon as the gush of feeling was over, Paddy felt that he had acted too impulsively, he had to deal with soldiers and gentlemen who knew the good cause he had for gratitude, and who, while they laughed heartily at the way he had shown it, were able to appreciate his extraordinary warmth of heart. He did not suffer in the good opinion of his officers, which he continued to deserve.

After service in Canada and at home, the terrible tocsin of war was sounded in Europe, and Paddy found himself in line with his regiment before the batteries on the slopes above the Alma. It was his first battle. The fire was heavy, but with his comrades he bore himself bravely. To his great grief the noble officer to whom he was so strongly attached fell among the slain. He himself was wounded by a bullet in the thigh. He soon recovered, and rejoined his regiment. The cold and wet of that fearful winter thinned the ranks of the finest army England ever saw.

On the 22d March, 1856, the night that Hedley Vicars fell, an attack was also made on the part of the trench held by a company of the Fusiliers. The captain was killed, and one of the subalterns to whom Paddy was servant was wounded. He accompanied his master to Malta, and there remained until another officer on his way to rejoin his regiment had the good fortune to secure him as servant, and took him back once more to the Crimea.

The blessed word "Peace" gladdened hearts and homes in England in the spring of 1856, and was heartily welcome in the camp near the Black Sea.

The regiment returned to England, and a well-earned furlough enabled the son to fulfil the hope with which he had striven to cheer his mother's heart many long years before. Could she believe her eyes? Was this her boy John? How changed! His broad massive chest was adorned with two medals; and three good-conduct badges on his sleeve would have told the widow, if she could have understood them, that he had been a good soldier.

The army had done him no harm. It is true he had lost an eye through disease, but that had not altered his honest face, or bated one jot the strength of his attachment to his mother. He had often written to her, and had sent her help from time to time, and now he brought her his savings' bank store. His return brightened up the old home; and his stories of the war and of foreign parts obtained for the distinguished narrator the increased admiration of his sisters and friends, and filled his mother's heart with pride and gratitude.

The next quarter was India. Its intense heat tried the old soldiers who had weathered the two Crimean winters, and many of them fell victims to heat apoplexy during the first summer. But the hardy Irishman continued to enjoy good health, and was as active and self-denying as ever. Again and again after a long march would he help the adjutant in looking after the tents of the camp-guard and other matters connected with the comfort of his comrades, and then would rouse the weary native servants to unwonted energy by his cheery words and example, as he made them pitch the adjutant's tent before going away to his breakfast.

He was indeed a pattern soldier. Always cheerful, never at a discount, willing and unwearied where he could do any thing to serve another. The native servants soon knew him. His cup of tea was always ready for him when he came to the adjutant's quarters before sunrise to accompany him to the guard-mounting parade.

The titles of "Geripero," "defender of the poor," and "Hadjure," "your royal highness," so commonly used by the natives of India in addressing Europeans, were accepted by Paddy with becoming dignity, and were rewarded by a good-humored smile, and "Thank you, Johnnie," which Hindu and Mohammedan alike knew was meant as a token of hearty good-will, the which they duly appreciated.

Paddy's warm heart had not suffered from the various changes of barometer to which his body had been subject as a consequence of his having joined her Majesty's army. Circumstances now led to his being separated for three years from the officer to whom he had been orderly after the regiment arrived in India. In a letter, dated "Jhelum," he thus writes: "If you have to stay in this country after my period of service expires, I should like to stay with you. There is not a night I go to my bed but I think of you. Your face I fancy I can see as naturally as I ever saw you."

It would have been almost contrary to nature if one blessed with such a strength of affection should have marched the weary road of life without seeking the companionship of one of those sacred beings whom God has created to love and to be loved by men. This is woman's holy privilege, deny it who will, and happy is she who wins a true man, and has wisdom enough to value him.

There was no need for the officer or Paddy to remain in India. Both had returned to England. The Irish soldier had finished his military career, and the medal for "long-service and good conduct," which he had well deserved, and a pension for life, rewarded his twenty-one years of toil and danger in so many foreign lands. He had earned a good name, the character of a faithful, honest man, and as another recompense for his trustworthy behavior in the various trials and temptations of a soldier's life, he was now, albeit a servant, the welcome guest of a happy household, where there was a home provided for his future years.

He had not long been installed here when, as a matter of course, he fell in love. His choice fell upon the head housemaid, and if she had known any thing of the depth of his loving heart she would have been an uncommon woman to have refused him. But though she knew very little of her veteran lover, she had probably discovered something of his distinguishing characteristic, and she accepted him. So it was all right.

The wedding-day arrived, and those who are accustomed to watch men's lives, and to mark the Providence which, in little things as great, evolves a system of measure for measure in a wonderful way, will not be surprised to learn that the bridegroom was supported upon this trying occasion by an Irish nobleman, as well as by the officer whom he had so long and faithfully served.

The humble but honest Irishman, who had so loved an Irish honorable, was rightly honored on "the happiest day of his life" by the presence and friendship of an Irish lord. The white slipper was duly thrown as Paddy and his bride started on their honeymoon. He was certainly entitled to all the happiness which a happy married life affords, if there be any truth in the old adage, "None but the brave deserve the fair." He had done his duty many years as a good soldier, and he was now entitled, as soldiers say, to a good wife.

The brightest earthly dreams are doomed to fade away. Thank God, the prospect of the life beyond can cheer man's heart when this thought darkens the sunshine of his allotted path. Those who deny the hope of immortality and glory blot their own names out of the Book of Life. The officer and his old soldier servant had learned something during their travels. The theories and speculations of philosophers and rationalists, and the experience of real life which soldiering gives, sometimes lead to very opposite conclusions.

The officer had become acquainted with the theories of the Divine plan of human redemption. He was convinced of the inspiration of the Scriptures, and having entered into that peace with God which is the seal of the truth, he did not hesitate to communicate to his faithful old comrade what he had thus been taught.

Paddy, so well developed in the school of human love, did not take long to understand and grasp the marvellous condescension of Him who became incarnate for man's justification, and he accepted the free gift of His salvation in the only way in which it can be accepted—with the faith of a little child. His grateful heart repaid love by love.

Chatham and then Devonport were the home quarters where Paddy accompanied the friend whom he was not ashamed to call his master. The last place was destined to be the point whence he should leave this abode of uncertainty and sorrow for the realms of everlasting day. His illness was comparatively short. He had been ailing for some months, but his undaunted pluck kept him at work until obliged to rest.

A loving wife and a little baby girl, whom he dearly loved, were the companions of his sick-room, and although he suffered much pain he never murmured or complained. As a king, as few kings have done, he triumphed in death. Calmly, quietly, trustfully, he watched its approach. As bravely and cheerfully as ever he encouraged his wife to trust in God, assuring her that he would never fail her.

He spoke little, but during the last night he talked in his usual manly tone to the friend who watched by his side of the change which now awaited him. Not a cloud or doubt of the Saviour's love disturbed his mind. "When a man comes where I am now, sir, it's a fine thing to believe."

His funeral was marked with honor. All the officers' servants of the regiment attended it by their own request. They were in uniform, and an escort of men, wearing each two or three good-conduct badges, preceded the pall. A whole company followed with their captain. As they entered the church-yard, distant martial music played the soldier's requiem, for the band of the regiment was at the time engaged at a sergeant's funeral.

The service was over, and almost immediately three distinct but clear volleys seemed, as it were, to pay the last mark of respect to two men who had bravely and loyally served their country. The soldiers gathered round old Paddy's grave. They all respected him, for he had often given them a kind word when he came down to barracks.

The officer had had no purpose of addressing the men who should attend the funeral, but he could not help himself, as he watched them looking into the last resting-place of his faithful servant. He said, "I should be a miserable man to-day, men, if I did not know where the spirit of my faithful old friend is gone. I loved him as a brother, and he loved me as a son. He was a noble soldier, but that would not have served him now. He believed in the Saviour, and loved Him, and now he is with Him; and I look forward, when I have fought the battle of life, to meet him again."

So lived dear old Paddy. These are but some of the incidents of his honest life. Do they not serve to prove that a brave, thankful, warm heart is a great blessing, and a great power in the campaign of life? If he could speak to his fellow Irishmen all the world over, he would tell them to cheer up, live honestly, trust in the Lord, and fear nothing.

He never regretted the day he took the Queen's shilling. It was for him the pathway to happiness, honor, and peace. Of him, and others who were his fellow-soldiers, the lines on the regimental tablet in Winchester Cathedral are indeed true—

> "Not once or twice in our rough island story
> The path of duty was the way to glory."

The Telephone in Church.—A Telephone has been placed in the Congregational Church in Mansfield, Ohio, the wires leading to the houses of several aged and invalid persons. It surmounts a floral decoration on the table in front of the open platform, a very unnoticeable position. The speaker pays no attention whatever to it, yet every word uttered in the auditorium is easily heard in the rooms of the dwellings which the wires reach. The first communication from the minister was: "The word is nigh unto thee;" "His word runneth very swiftly."

JERUSALEM—HER FUTURE.

A Lecture delivered by the Rev. Dr. Newman at the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, May 26th, 1879.

The Total Destruction of the Temple—An Unbelieving Englishman—The Present Condition of Jerusalem—The Restoration will be a Literal Restoration — There are to be Geographical Changes—The Mount of Olives to be Cleft—A New River to Break Forth—The Preservation of the Jews Remarkable—The Whole World has Persecuted Them—Their Present Eminence in Wealth and Power—A New Nationality Indispensable—The Central Position of Jerusalem—Their Present Indisposition to Return Accords with the History of the Race—The Completeness of their Present Organization—Their Adaptability—The Effect of their Restoration on the Rest of the Earth—A Stone Found with a Remarkable Inscription.

AT the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans the temple was set on fire, and that magnificent pile became a heap of ruins. It remained a ruin for seventy years. The whole city was destroyed and laid waste, except a portion of the western wall, with one or two towers which were left standing as an evidence of the strength of the city and a proof of the prowess of the Romans.

After the lapse of seventy years the Emperor Hadrian rebuilt Jerusalem, but the temple area he ploughed up, thus fulfilling the prophecy of our Lord, that not one stone should be left upon another. You remember the occasion of the utterance of that prophecy. The disciples had drawn the attention of Jesus to the beautiful stones of the temple, and Jesus said (Matthew 24 : 2): "Verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down."

I met an Englishman, when I was in Palestine first, who had come all the way to write a book against the Bible, supposing he should there be able to find evidence of the failure of its prophecies. He pointed out to me triumphantly five courses of stones one upon another, and said, "Behold the utter failure of your Master's prophecies! There are five courses of stone regularly laid, twenty-five feet in length, not isolated heaps. Where now is the value of your Master's prophecy, that not one stone should remain upon another?" Well, it was one of those moments in a man's life when he feels a challenge has been thrown down which he must accept; but I did not know what to say, for there were the stones, each one bearing an imprint I could not deny was proof of their date before Christ. I did the best thing for us always to do under like circumstances—I turned to the passage and read it over again. There I found that our Lord was not speaking of the wall of which these stones clearly formed a part, but of the temple itself.

Hadrian ploughed up the temple area, and right there where the magnificent fane of Solomon had stood, there he erected a temple to Jupiter and there he placed a statue of himself. After him came Constantine and his mother Helena, who discovered what she believed to be the site of the holy sepulchre, and reared the structure which commemorates that event, as well as another structure on the Mount of Olives. Afterwards the Holy Land passed under the rule of the Persians, then of the Saracens until it was rescued by the Crusaders, then under Saladin's rule, and since his day the crescent has floated over the Holy City.

The city has at the present time a population continually increasing, and the majority of that population are Jews and Christians. The Turks rule, but they are outnumbered both by the Jews and the Christians, and on Mount Zion stands a Christian church.

But our subject is Jerusalem in the future, not in the past; and here we find three theories. The first, that the restoration of the Jews is a spiritual one, and which will be fulfilled at their conversion. The second, that the Christian Church of all nationalities constitutes the Israel of God, and to that Israel belong the promises. The third theory is that of a literal restoration. I am inclined to the second theory; but this is not a matter for inclination, but must be settled by the Word of God. The text is unmistakable in its teaching. it points to it predicts a literal restoration, and I follow it.

Jeremiah said (Jeremiah 31 : 38, 40): "The city shall be built from the tower of Hananeel to the gate of the corner: it shall not be plucked up or thrown down forever." So it shall be the last city, and it shall stand forever. You cannot apply this to the Jerusalem of the past, for the Jerusalem of the past is torn up. Isaiah is equally clear, for he says (Isaiah 62 : 4): "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed desolate," etc. And again (Isaiah 2 : 2): "It shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it." That means that Jerusalem shall yet become the metropolis of the whole world. It is the city best fitted by its geographical position for the centre of railroad communication, and to be the centre of general communication for the east and the west; to be, in fact, the metropolis of the whole world.

But I take it there are to be considerable geological changes, especially in and about Jerusalem, before that takes place. Zechariah has said (14 : 4) "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem, on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south." Now mark with what accuracy the prophet speaks: he says one half shall remove toward the north and one half toward the south. Had it been toward the east and west the division would involve the destruction of the city. That such a convulsion is possible, we know; for it is not long since that a very similar event took place in Armenia. Bear in mind, too, that this prediction is confirmed both by Joel and Ezekiel.

After this we are told an immense river will break forth which will flow from the Jordan to the Mediterranean Sea. This too is possible, for in the Armenian convulsion to which I have previously alluded there sprang up in one night a mighty river; and in one of the geological convulsions of South America there sprang forth with equal suddenness a new river which is flowing to this day. When, too, it is remembered that the soil of Jerusalem is limestone, the possibility of this sudden appearance of a stream of water will be seen.

It will be remembered that all the water whic was used in the temple had to be brought int the city from outside the walls. Solomon constructed an aqueduct to supply the temple; I followed it mile after mile, and it would be no discredit to this city or any other city of the present day, to receive and store the water thu brought. A sea or large reservoir was constructe under the temple. It was cut out of the soli rock, with the pillars to support it left intact This reservoir was 676 feet in circuit, and was capable of containing three million gallons of wate Out of this reservoir, or sea, the priests obtaine the water required for the temple ceremonies and you will find, if you read your Bible, that very large quantity was needed for that purpos It was drawn up in buckets by the priests or the assistants.

The amazing fertility of the soil, which is ov and over again predicted as a sign of the approac ing consummation, has been the subject of e amination and experiment by eminent chemist and when I was in Palestine I met an Englis man who explained to me how the crumbling these mountain-tops and various changes co tinually going on were preparing a soil which the appointed time would cause even the dese to rejoice and blossom as the rose (Isaiah 35 :

It is clear that the prophecy, "The Lord sh set His hand the second time to recover the re nant of His people which shall be left" (Isaiah 11 : 11), has never been fulfilled. Only once has the Lord done that, and that was in the time of the return from Babylon. But this time the recovery is to be not from one country, but from the four corners of the earth. Read the list of countries mentioned in this eleventh chapter of Isaiah, and you will find that in those countries at the present day there are a large number of Hebrews. Indeed, go where you may, you find the representatives of the race. They are the most ubiquitous portion of the whole human race.

It is not remarkable that the Jewish people should have been preserved, for there are peoples still in existence as old or older than the Hebrew. The Chinese is one among others. The significance is not therefore in the mere fact of their preservation. Nothing is wonderful that is common. But the remarkable fact is that the people should have survived notwithstanding that every people under the sun have been their enemies, and have endeavored to effect their extermination. What a magnificent military history is that of the Jews! If they had a Gibbon to write it, as Gibbon did the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, how the world would admire and wonder!

THE NATIONS OF THE WHOLE EARTH COMBINED against them. No nation has ever been so proscribed, persecuted, and outraged. There is not a country except your own in all Christendom whose garments are not red with the blood of the slaughtered Hebrews. Seven times have they been driven from France. 800,000 were driven out of Spain. Edward the First banished them from England. At the coronation of Richard I. of England the Jews in large numbers were slaughtered in honor of the coronation. The black plague which devastated Germany was attributed to the Jews, who were falsely charged with having poisoned the wells of water, and they were gathered together in squares and publicly and deliberately burned. Russia would not allow them to enter any honorable profession. Even Switzerland, the land of Tell, drove them from her Cantons.

In Rome the Pontiff consigned the Hebrews to particular quarters of the city, and compelled them to wear a badge whenever they went abroad, in order to ostracize them and to injure them in the eyes of the Christian citizens. And when the Pontiff went in state to Saint Peter's to celebrate Christ's entry into Jerusalem, the Jews were stoned by the populace. Thus though the preservation of the Jewish race is not remarkable in itself, it is remarkable in the fact that they have survived in spite of the opposition of the whole world.

They have survived in numbers, in influence, and in wealth. They can boast of Rothschild in finance, a Montefiore in charity, Mendelssohn in music, Rachel in tragedy, and the statesman who beyond all others is foremost in the world's eyes and exercises the most potent influence in her councils, who possesses the confidence of his queen, a queen whose subjects are everywhere, and the sound of whose drums keeps march with the procession of the sun in the heavens, who has his hand on the key of every palace in Europe; that statesman—Disraeli—makes a boast of his Hebrew origin.

God loves a touch of poetic justice in His dealings, and in the present powerful and influential position of the representatives of the Hebrew race after nineteen centuries of persecution that poetic justice is fulfilled. Like an olive, the race seems to be indestructible. You know if you cut an olive down to the ground you do not kill it: it will sprout again from the root and grow into a stronger tree than before; and so will this people: they will yet arise in strength, and from being the persecuted and downtrodden they will become the rulers of the earth.

The man who first lifted a voice in behalf of the Jew was an American. Do not let us forget that significant fact; that man was Benjamin Franklin. So the beginning of their emancipation was in this country. Then followed Lord John Russell, and then Daniel O'Connell. The time of their humiliation is wellnigh over; the prophecy "they shall have no rest" has not failed, but it is exhausted.

Then, too, consider that

A NEW NATIONALITY IS INDISPENSABLE for the reformation and reconstruction of the East. The prophecy runs, "I have set Jerusalem in the midst of the nations round about;" that is, she will occupy the middle line, the meeting place between the civilization of the East and the civilization of the West. For such a mission her geographical position is eminently adapted.

She occupies a tract of land which is the only natural site for a city, a place fitted by nature to be a great commercial and railroad centre connecting the valley of the Euphrates, Egypt, and Asia Minor with Europe and the West. Thus it will become a very Pharos, a light political and religious for the whole earth.

There must be a new nation in the East. The whole region demands it. The East is exhausted; the Levant is exhausted; there is no future for the Greeks; years ago I cherished the hope that the Greeks were the coming nation and would eventually possess Constantinople, but the years that have intervened since then have demonstrated conclusively the fallacy of the hope. The Turks are exhausted, or ought to be exhausted, even if they are not, for they are the very worst specimens of humanity we know of outside of perdition.

A new dispensation needs a new people, and this people will be produced by the Almighty when the new dispensation is introduced. This new people are to come from Elam, from Egypt, and from the isles of the sea.

Strange to say, the Hebrews manifest no desire to return; but when we look to their history the mystery is explained: it is not strange at all, for they have always been a stiff-necked and obstinate people. They did not want to go out of Egypt, nor out of Babylon, and when Ezra went up, only 43,000 went with him. A large number remained behind, and their descendants are there to this day.

It is my belief that they were chosen for this very thing, that Jehovah might show His power in a stiff-necked and gainsaying people. The Almighty does not consult a nation or a person about His purposes. When He wants you as an instrument he will employ you nolens volens, Had these Hebrews migrated to the moon and the Almighty in His purposes desired to use them, He would bring them back.

Their organization at the present time is more thorough than it has ever been before. In every land they now have a correspondence bureau, and they hold national conventions which unite them for any practical purpose they may form. These national conventions not long ago sent delegates to a world convention in Paris, and there every language under heaven was represented. Thus scattered over the world they form the singular spectacle of a nation without a country, a people without a place.

The Hebrews possess another trait of character which is worthy of remark: they more readily than any other race adapt themselves to the habits of the people among whom they are thrown, and yet without losing an atom of their originality. In this city the men and women sit together in the synagogues, showing that the Western estimate of women has entered into their minds, thus giving her her proper place in the society, and which she loses in the Eastern mind. In Cincinnati there is a Jewish college, where the highest branches of learning are included in the curriculum; and there are Jewish schools in every city.

The present Jewish population of Jerusalem number 10,000; the entire population is 30,000, of whom about 6000 are Mahommedans, and the rest Christians of different sects. The Jews have a beautiful synagogue and a cemetery on the Mount of Olives, but they are not permitted to enter the temple area. They gather at a place outside the old wall every Friday, and there, at their wailing-place, the cry goes up to God, "O Lord! how long?" The reply is "Not forever." They will yet come from Egypt, from Elam, and from the isles of the sea. Some will come for business, some will come for pleasure, some for devotion, and some for ambition, when Jerusalem becomes a metropolis and the joy of the whole earth.

The effect of their return on the rest of the world will be most marked, for, as the Apostle Paul remarks (Romans 11 : 12): "If the fall of them were the riches of the world, how much more their fulness." Where could we find men so fitted for the evangelization of the world? They have been everywhere, and are the most polyglot people under heaven. There is no language on earth which has not been spoken by a Jew.

Jerusalem is a buried city. A city beneath a city. Under the débris, which has fallen in some places to the depth of one to two hundred feet, and which successive captures of the city have accumulated, there are buried fragments above three thousand years of age. On a stone which was dug out of a heap of this refuse recently, was this inscription: "The light of the world is Jesus Christ." That light will shine till this people and the whole world are saved.

The centripetal and centrifugal forces which govern the material world are not more certain in their operation than is the certainty of the fulfilment of God's promise, that the Son of man shall yet rule the world, and shall have the nations of the earth given to Him for His inheritance. You and I may pass away—I with my Christianity, you with your infidelity; but this divine Lord will march on and on until the last hour of recorded time, when all the world shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord.

Bishop Gobat, the first Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem, died there on May 10th, having been consecrated in 1848. The establishment of the see caused great excitement at the time to the High Church party, who sent out a deputation to sympathize with the Greek Patriarch. Soon after his appointment Bishop Gobat published his "Journal of a Three Years' Residence in Abyssinia," and much interest was for a time felt in his proceedings, but latterly, in consequence of his failing health, little has been heard of him.

The patronage of the bishopric rests alternately with the Queen of Great Britain and the King of Prussia, now Emperor of Germany. As Bishop Gobat was nominated by the late King of Prussia the present vacancy must be filled by her Majesty. The Episcopal salary amounts to 1,200*l.* ($5820) a year, of which one moiety was secured by the King of Prussia, and the other moiety consists of an investment of 600*l.* ($2910) a year arising out of contributions obtained by the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Jews' Society, of which he is President.

A Rare Pearl Stolen from the British Crown one hundred and fifty years ago has been recovered in a pawnbroker's store in Vienna. A poor Hungarian being pressed for money took an old scarf-pin to pawn. To his surprise the jeweller told him it was of great value, and he should take it to Vienna in order to obtain fair deposit on it. He did so, and there it was discovered that it contained one of three black pearls which formerly belonged to the monarchs of England. It had been stolen and eventually came into the possession of a valet, who gave it to the Hungarian peasant. The Queen of England purchased the gem for $8000.

A Boy of Fifteen Years was recently, with his younger brother, just packing up his tools in a mine where he was at work, at Dinas, in South Wales, when a large stone fell on his head and killed him on the spot. Only three weeks before, this boy had given himself to God, and had also been the means of getting three other boys to join the Church. We may readily believe that his widowed mother's sorrow is softened by a recollection that her boy's life, though brief, was useful, and a blessing to others. This, indeed, illustrates the text, "Thou knowest not what shall be on the morrow" (James 4 : 13).

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

A MATTER CF TASTE.

THE room was clearly the den of a student, and a student too of some considerable attainments. Scientific instruments of all kinds occupied places here and there, ready to their owner's hand. Bottles containing rare creatures preserved in spirits were on shelves at one end of the apartment, and a box covered with stout wire netting occupied a low table in the centre.

Over this box a man stood soliloquizing. He was not the man we would expect to see with such surroundings. True, his face had the look of intelligence, but it was not the intelligence acquired by study or observation, but rather a native wit, and "wise without the schools;" a man who probably had a contempt for mere book lore, and who, judging from his appearance, might be ready at a bargain and shrewd in his dealings, but was little likely to spend his time in attempts to fathom the mysteries of nature or to seek knowledge not practically useful to him in his ordinary avocations.

Who was he, then, and why is he introduced, standing in a room where all the apparatus of scientific study lies in profusion? He is Alec Stewart, a hard-headed Scotchman, and he is butler and general factotum to his master, Oswald Vernon, Esq., a wealthy man and a learned savant, well known in the scientific world.

Alec, then, was not studying: he was merely dusting and tidying up the place generally. "There is no accounting for tastes!" he said to himself, as he went slowly on with his work. Stewart was a tall, thin man, with a stoop. The gray which mixed with his coarse light hair showed that he had gone a good deal more than half-way through the course of life; and the lines on his brow and the furrows on his cheeks showed that the course had been a hard one. Alec was one of those men whom the world would pity for their misfortunes, had not those misfortunes so soured their tempers as to make the world rather dislike than pity.

His father had left him a small patrimony when he died, consisting of the good-will, stock and fixtures of a small business, in which groceries, provisions, sweets, and toys were delightfully blended. The patrons of the establishment were of the poorer class, and were to a large extent of tender years. The place was pretty well frequented, but as the receipts were chiefly composed of coins of the very smallest value, the bulk was altogether out of proportion to the aggregate value. But still Alec's father had contrived to thrive at the business, and at his death he bequeathed to his son a fair amount of ready money, which represented the reward of a life's steady application to business.

There had been once a Mrs. Alec Stewart, but that had been long ago, and Alec's appearance testified that the softening influence of a woman's companionship and the dexterous fingers of a wife had not been about him for a long time, and the man had all the appearance of a bachelor, or one who, having tried both ways of life, preferred the single to the married state.

The truth is, Alec had blundered in his choice of a wife. He had chosen a spoiled beauty to ornament his home, and expected, as many do, that good looks are a proof of the existence of those mental and moral charms which go to make up a man's ideal of a wife. He was disappointed, for he found the beauty of his wife her only charm, and the casket he had eagerly secured for himself, imagining so handsome an exterior must contain a treasure of priceless value, he found to be absolutely empty, or even worse, for he discovered faults which promised trouble for him in the future.

Alec could not take his matrimonial bargain back and complain of the mistake, as he undoubtedly would any other bargain; so he bore his trouble with what patience he could command, which truth to tell was not much.

His wife harassed him with complaints, wasted his money in useless finery, despised and mismanaged his business, and finally sickened and died, leaving him without a pleasant memory of her, and with a host of debts to pay which she had contracted without his consent, and which were for articles he deemed unnecessary in their position in life. So, like a sensible, he decided that he would learn by experience and let matrimony alone for the future.

Mrs. Stewart had borne him two children, but they had both died young; the gossips said that their mother did not know how to take care of a baby. She had loved her children little, and did not mourn for them long, but their father had bitterly felt his loss. Ever since his last fair-haired pet had been laid in her little grave, Alec Stewart had become a soured and gloomy man. After the death of his wife he had wound up his affairs—given up the business in which he had thriven so ill, and had resolved, at the age of fifty, to go into service.

It was not every place would have suited Alec, nor every master whom he would have suited. In a gay, fashionable family Alec would have been incongruous; he would have looked like an old rusty toasting-fork placed on a polished steel grate.

But Mr. Vernon, the master of Alec, was a learned, scientific man, who saw little company, and cared more for his butler's being sober and steady than for his waiting well at table or being expert in folding dinner napkins. Alec might not be quick at drawing the corks of his master's bottles, but he never drank their contents; he might be somewhat surly to Mr. Vernon's visitors, but he had never visitors of his own to feast at his master's expense.

Besides the good quality of being trustworthy, Alec had that of being more than commonly useful. He was ready to do all sorts of things which do not usually form part of a butler's work. He groomed the riding horse and looked after the donkey, clipped the yews, mowed the grass, and dug in the garden. But Alec's special field of labor was in what Mr. Vernon called his study. Alec cleaned his master's curious instruments as well as his boots, oiled his machines, labelled his bottles, and ran the risk of being blown up by some of his poisonous gases.

He had to dust skeletons, see that the moth did not get into the skins of stuffed animals, and that the spirit did not dry up in the bottles which held preserved lizards or scorpions. Nor have we come to the end of the list of the butler's duties. Alec had to attend to strange live creatures as well as to dead ones, and he was about this occupation when he said "there is no accounting for tastes."

Alec's tall figure, as he spoke, was bending over the large shallow box before mentioned. Any one looking through the grating would have seen a blanket, and, perhaps, as he gazed, the blanket would slowly have moved, as if it had life, and then the long slimy coils of a puff adder might appear, or its flat head, with bright eyes and slender forked tongue. This box, or cage, contained his master's special pets.

"There is no accounting for tastes," repeated Alec. "I can understand a man liking to have a good house; keep a good table, or ride a good horse; but why he should spend his money on dead bones, broken bits of marble and clay, or live poisonous snakes, passes my comprehension. Why, Mr. Vernon has paid as much for this brace of adders as he would have done for a pair of good trotting ponies. And they must be fed as daintily as if they were children. Mice and frogs are not good enough for these grand foreign snakes; a hutchful of luckless rabbits must be kept expressly for them."

Alec was rather fond of his long-eared charges, and sorely grudged the serpents their meals. "These are such vicious, deadly reptiles too," continued Alec, who had a trick of talking aloud to himself; "if I had a mind to keep such pets, I'd take good care first to cut out their fangs."

"You would do a very foolish thing, then, Alec," observed his master, who had entered the room unnoticed, while Alec was cleaning the tray of the reptiles. "I am making experiments with these puff-adders for an object which, if I succeed, will benefit all mankind. It is on the poisonous nature of these creatures that all my experiments must depend. To attain my object it would be worth while to sacrifice a whole warren-full of rabbits."

Having described the man, I must give a few words to the master.

Oswald Vernon was, as has already been said, a learned, scientific man, and he looked like what he was. Though Mr. Vernon's frame was small, his head was large, well stuffed with a more than usual amount of brains, as all who knew him declared. His eyes were weak—perhaps from peering through microscopes, or making experiments with dazzling lights; but no one saw much of his eyes, for Mr. Vernon always wore blue spectacles, and had his picture been taken without them, his nearest friend would scarcely have thought it a likeness.

Mr. Vernon's usual manner to strangers was smooth even to softness, and an impression of gentleness was given by his voice being weak as well as his eyes; but the impression was not a correct one. That the philosopher could be angry, obstinate, and even cruel when his will was crossed, or when any one ventured to speak against his favorite opinions, Alec Stewart knew but too well, and so did Edith Temple, the niece of Vernon's late wife. Miss Temple held in the philosopher's house a place between that of a daughter and that of housekeeper and humble companion.

As to what were Mr. Vernon's favorite theories the reader will know enough as the story proceeds. It is sufficient at present to say that Oswald Vernon thought a good deal more of his books of science than he did of his Bible. He had a great deal of faith in his own talents; no faith at all in that wisdom which cometh down from above.

As the God of the Scriptures was a Being too high and holy for Vernon, with all his learning, to understand, the philosopher made a kind of God for himself, which he called "Human Intellect," and another which he called "Science." To worship these suited the pride of Vernon's heart, for it was really worshipping self; his own intellect, his own science, were placed by the blind philosopher far above Divine Revelation.

Vernon felt no need of a Saviour, for he was not troubled by any remorse for sin. He was fond of praising the greatness of human nature, and was quite satisfied as to the goodness of his own heart. Had Oswald Vernon taken half the pains to find out the blots in his own character that he did to understand the nature of spots in the sun, he would have seen that instead of being the wise, clear-sighted, liberal-minded sage that he now deemed himself to be, he was but weak and erring mortal. But the world ad mired Vernon, and Vernon admired himself; i was much pleasanter to him to know that he ha earned the praise of men, than to feel that h needed the help and the pardoning mercy o God.

As Mr. Vernon could pay for the rabbits a well as the snakes, Alec had nothing to say i reply to the observation of his master. Th butler merely thought to himself that he woul take good care that the adders should make n experiments in favor of science upon his ow lanky fingers. Alec had a little request to mak to his master.

"As I've done feeding the live creatures, an dusting the dead ones, sir," said Alec, "an you don't want the Leyden jars or retorts ou to-day, may I have an hour or so to myself? I'v a niece come for a few days to her brother's co tage in the village, and I'd like to go out an see her."

"And wish her joy on her approaching ma riage, I suppose?" said Mr. Vernon, with bland smile, "if the girl is that Effie Campbe of whom I have heard from my niece, Mi Edith."

"I'm not in the way of wishing joy," sa Alec, turning down the corners of his lips wi a sour expression natural to him whenever a one spoke of pleasure. "The silly child is going to do a foolish thing, as girls are apt to do; as the proverb says, they marry in haste and repent at leisure."

"What sort of man is the future husband?" inquired Mr. Vernon.

"Much like other young men; I never heard any particular harm of Robert Holland, but doubtless he's selfish like the rest of them," was the reply. As Alec seldom gave much warmer praise to any one, his master thought that Effie's chosen partner was probably a very respectable man.

"Well, go to your niece, and wish her joy or wisdom, if you like that better," said Mr. Vernon; "and go on to the town, Alec: I've some drugs I want from the chemist; Miss Temple will make out the list. You had better call at Farmer Gibbs on your way back and get a couple of chickens."

"Ready plucked, sir?" inquired Alec.

"Plucked! oh, by no means!" exclaimed the philosopher quickly. "I must have them alive; they are for my pets;" and he turned to ook with such a kindly smile as he might have given to a faithful dog, at one of the scaly reptiles. The adder lifted up its head from its blanket, puffed out its singular throat, and hissed n return.

"Chickens as well as rabbits! these pets must have dainty fare!" muttered Alec to himself, after he had left his master's presence. "I don't deny that these Indian adders are handsome enough in their way, all speckled above, with scales of blue and yellow below. And they're curious enough, too, for I never yet saw an English nake that could puff out its neck as they do heirs, till it looks four times bigger than the reature's head, like a swollen bag fixed round its throat. But handsome and curious though erpents may be, when I take to coddling pets, hey shall be creatures that run on four feet if not on two, and that don't carry poison bags under heir teeth. Well, well, there is no accounting or tastes."

There was no difficulty, however, in accounting or the taste of Robert Holland when he had ourted Effie Campbell. A first glance at the girl would have made a stranger guess that the vely young maiden was born to be every one's et. Not that Effie was extremely beautiful; er features were not regular enough for that, ut she looked as an apple-blossom looks on a morning in May. She was one of the brightest, leasantest, happiest creatures that ever kept the mirth of a child to the age of a woman.

Yes, Effie had been a general favorite from er cradle. Her parents had delighted to hear heir child called the prettiest babe in the village. She was their daisy, their sunbeam, their arling. Effie's brother had made her his playhing; never bullying his little sister after the way of too many boys, but carrying her on his houlders, and dancing her on his knee. When Effie had been old enough to attend the National School she had shown that she had a quick brain s well as a sweet little face; the child was always winning prizes, and taking the top of her lass. Effie's schoolfellows were wont to say that she was the mistress's pet, yet scarcely en[illegible]ied their young companion, for was she not lso their own? Effie was so generous, so lively, so pleasant, that no one could bear her a grudge. Effie had scarcely known what it was to have trouble or to shed a tear until she had reached the age of eighteen: life's stream had flowed on in such a bright sparkling way, that she scarcely could believe that it had carried her on so far on er course. Then came a year full of events. First, that of her brother's marriage; then those of the deaths of both her parents, within two months of each other. All the village felt for the grief of the orphan girl. Every one said that Effie was so unused to trial, that it must ress more heavily on her than on those who ad had a less sunny childhood. Pity increased when it was known that Effie was looking out for a lady's-maid's place.

CONSECRATION TO GOD.

S. S. Lesson for June 22d.—Malachi 3. Golden Text, verse 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE book of Malachi vindicates the rights of God. Nearly the whole of the first two chapters is addressed to the priests, and their defection in the time of Malachi is exposed. The prophet bore the Lord's burden, and the sorrow of God's heart found in Malachi one who could understand and enter into it. Oh, how touching is the appeal, coming as it does from Him who created all things, but who had given man a position too honorable to exercise force upon him! "A son honoreth his father, and a servant his master: if I then be a Father, where is Mine honor? and if I be a Master, where is My fear? saith the Lord of hosts unto you, O priests, that despise My Name" (chap. 1 : 6).

Then comes the question, "Wherein have we despised Thy Name," showing an utter insensibility of their state. And God makes His charges against them. They offer the blind and the lame and the sick for sacrifice, and are not ashamed to present to God that which they would not offer to an earthly ruler (chap. 1 : 8). Then there is self-seeking in the very service upon the altar: "Neither do ye kindle fire on Mine altar for nought" (verse 10); next there is weariness in the Lord's service (verse 13); and lastly, the climax of all, "Ye will not lay it to heart" (chap. 2 : 2).

The position and responsibility of the spiritual leaders is strongly insisted on in chap. 2 : 5-7: "My covenant was with him of life and peace," etc. "The law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips: he walked with Me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity." Here is a principle which it would be well for all Christian workers to acquaint themselves with. First a life lived in personal covenant with God, a covenant of life, spiritual life, and then of continuous unbroken peace: "he walked with Me in peace and equity." The secret of power and success is, such a walk with God. The law of truth may be in our mouth, but unless our lips are clear of iniquity, and unless our walk is step for step with God, many will not be turned away from iniquity. Let us not impute to circumstances or to the character of those we deal with, any of our want of success. God lays His finger upon the teacher and says, "Thou art the man." He goes on to say, "Ye are departed out of the way; ye have caused many to stumble at the law." Thus every false step of a Christian teacher involves others in its consequences.

After continuing in the second chapter to expose the declension of Judah and Jerusalem, the prophet brings a direct message from God about the coming of Christ. As in all the prophecies relative to the Messiah in the Old Testament the first and second comings of Christ are spoken of as one, so also here. "Behold I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me." This is, without doubt, John the Baptist —"and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His temple."

What the Lord is, that is He to us. We also are His temple, and He comes to us as the Refiner and Purifier, and blessed are they who allow themselves to be put into the furnace by Him. Every event of our life, every circumstance, is utilized by our loving Father to further our education. A refiner sits always above the molten metal, and takes away the scum which rises to the surface, until the gold is pure enough to reflect his face, then the work is done. Often in our family or social life, sometimes in the trying hindrances in our work, very often in the differences of character between ourselves and those with whom we work, and the failure of means to accomplish an end we have in view, sometimes in physical suffering, the Lord is sitting by, watching with all the eagerness of love until the desired effect has been produced.

And the end of God's purification of His children is that we may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness, or (chap. 1 : 11) "a pure offering." The only reasonable, the only possible, offering which we can make to God is to present our "bodies a living sacrifice" (Rom. 12 : 1). But they must be pure bodies, refined from all which will not stand the test of the fire, all which is not divine. "Then [when the Lord comes again] shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years" (chap. 3 : 4). But no evil can dwell in His presence, and thus He says, "I will come near to you to judgment," etc. (verse 5). As it will be when He appeareth again on earth, so is it now in the lives of those who enter into and submit with joy to His refining process. He comes near in judgment, every thought is passed in review, not before our judgment, by our poor attempts at self-examination, but before His searching, all-seeing eye, which nothing can escape, and thus He reveals, judges, and delivers from all impurity.

There must be no answering again when God says any thing to us. We may be blind as to the things which He may discover to us, but He cannot err, and He will always be justified in what He reveals to us. We may be walking in the full sunlight of His blessed countenance without any conscious cloud upon our sky, and just then, in the jealousy of His love for us, He may make known to us His mind about things which we should never have found out. It is then that we must learn to take in silence all He says to us, not answering, "Wherein have we robbed Thee?" but waiting until He unveils the details in which our judgment has erred.

Every thing which is done or said for ourselves is a robbery of God. Christ died for us that we should no more live unto ourselves, and we are often long in learning how the root of self spreads where we little suspect it. But the Lord continues, "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in Mine house, and prove Me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts: if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it." The tithes were God's legal portion from the Jewish people; we have the privilege to give all to God, not reserving even a tithe for ourselves. Paul, speaking of the liberality of the Macedonian churches, says: "And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord" (2 Cor. 8 : 5). Lot sought the well-watered plains and lost all he had; and if we bargain for honor, gratitude, or esteem from men, or comfort, joy, or any thing else, to hold them for ourselves, we seek our portion in something else than God, and we fill up the place which would hold His blessing. It is the intensity and the delicacy of the love of God that He is willing to accept any thing at our hands. We can give to beggars from whom we would take nothing, but a man cannot ask too much from the hands of a wife, who loves to give all—and this is the position He gives to us.

"Then they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another" (chap. 3 : 16). It would seem that under the prophet's burning words there was a movement of the Spirit of God. But what was this speaking one to another? Was it only the general speaking of the things of God in which they had sympathy with one another, or was there the loving brotherly admonition, the watching with jealous tenderness over the souls of one another, that no spot might be left there, nothing which could grieve God or harm His cause? We read that a book of remembrance was written, etc. Oh that the intercourse of Christians one with the other was worthy to be written in God's book of remembrance! "And they shall be Mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up My jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him" (verse 17). The promise to Israel was, "If ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people" (Ex. 19 : 5). The jewels in this verse are the "special treasure" which is to be gathered and spared at the Lord's coming.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Anglo-Zulu War.—A despatch from Cape Town says that King Cetywayo on May 16th despatched an envoy to Colonel Crealock, asking him to send a European to discuss terms of peace. John Dunn accordingly went to Cetywayo's kraal, but had returned, the negotiations having failed, because the British refuse any terms but unconditional surrender. Cetywayo's good faith is doubted by the military authorities, who, however, are supposed to have instructions to carry on the campaign to the end, in order that Zululand may be annexed.

The appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley to the chief command has given great satisfaction in England.

Baron Lionel Rothschild, the Head of the great Jewish financial house, died June 3d. He was a grandson of the founder of the business. The City of London several times elected him as its representative in Parliament, but for many years he refrained from sitting, because he could not conscientiously take the oath, which contained the words "On the true faith of a Christian." In 1858 these words were omitted from the oath and he took his seat. He was born in 1808.

The New Italian Marriage Law by which it is enacted that a civil ceremony is necessary to a legal marriage, and that the religious ceremony is optional to the parties and does not affect the validity of the marriage, has called forth an energetic denunciation from the Pope. He considers the law immoral and a violation of Pontifical rights, but the Italians will probably disregard his denunciation and get married without the aid of the priests.

A Legacy of $38,800 has been left to Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, to be equally divided between the Pastor's College and his Orphanages at Stockwell.

Solovieff, the man who attempted the Assassination of the Emperor of Russia on April 14th, has been condemned to death. The trial not being public, none of the evidence has as yet been published. During the proceedings of Friday Solovieff denied that he had any accomplices in his act. Solovieff admitted that he was guilty of attempting the crime with which he was charged, and that he knew the penalty to which he was liable. For this reason he refused to accept the services of an advocate.

A Famine in Cashmere is causing an alarming amount of suffering. Official reports say that it is impossible to exaggerate the distress the famine is causing there. The Maharajah of the province, at the urgent request of the Viceroy of India, is proceeding to the capital city to superintend the organization of relief. Three thousand five hundred tons of grain are now in transit to the valley of Cashmere.

An Anti-Slave-Trade Treaty.—It is announced that the late Portuguese Ministry, before its retirement, concluded a treaty with Great Britain, looking to the suppression of the slave-trade, the development of commerce, and the civilization of Africa. The treaty provides for the freedom of commerce and navigation between adjoining British and Portuguese colonies; and grants Great Britain facilities for the passage of troops and munitions of war across Portuguese territory to South Africa.

The New Cardinals Created by the Pope are a sign that Leo is more liberal in spirit than his predecessor. Not only Dr. Newman, but the Hungarian Archbishop Haynald, is one of the new creations. Haynald, was one of the stoutest opponents of the doctrine of Papal Infallibility in the Vatican Council. Pius IX. never forgave him, and refused the repeated request of the Emperor of Austria to make him a cardinal.

The Greek Question is again assuming great political prominence. Immediate negotiations tween Greece and Turkey relative to the cession of territory to be made to the former by the latter, according to the stipulation or recommendation of the Congress of Berlin, having utterly broken down, the signatory Powers are called upon to intervene. Accordingly M. Waddington, the Prime Minister of France, has addressed a peremptory circular to the Porte and the Powers on the subject, in which he says, "What we expect of the Turkish Government and what we require of it is the execution of the resolutions recorded in the thirteenth protocol of the Berlin Treaty."

The other Powers take the same view; the English Government alone hangs back, and hence there is growing up in France, and openly expressed by the French press, a feeling of distrust as to the action of England in reference to the Greek as well as the Egyptian question.

Religious Liberty in Siam—The King of Siam has proclaimed religious liberty in his dominions. This proclamation is described as all that one could wish. No obstacle to the profession or propagation of Christianity is to be tolerated. No similar proclamation in modern times, it is said, has been more complete, and in no country is there a more open door for the truth than in Siam. This is the first instance of a heathen nation proclaiming religious liberty.

Seed Corn Needed for Bosnia.—Misses Irby and Johnston are making a closing effort to provide the repatriated Bosnian refugees with the means of sowing their fields. The most fertile lands are lying uncultivated, seed-time is quickly passing away, and should no harvest be reaped this autumn, renewed famine and suffering is certain next winter. The scenes of sorrow, suffering, and destitution beggar description.

COLONEL PEARSON.

The Defender of Ekowe.

Charles Knight Pearson, whose name is familiar to most of our readers as the commander of the gallant defence of the English garrison at Ekowe against such overwhelming numbers of opposing Zulus, entered active service in the British army in 1852, as ensign. His actual war service is confined to the Crimean War, in which he served as adjutant of the Thirty-first Foot. He obtained for this service the Crimean medal and one clasp, and the Turkish medal. Early in 1878 he retired from the Lieutenant-colonelship of the Third Buffs upon half pay.

In August, 1878, he was gazetted a colonel, and upon the departure of his old regiment for the Cape of Good Hope, Col. Pearson followed in October last. His position was not in command of his former regiment, but simply as an attaché to the staff of General Lord Chelmsford. But when in the progress of the war he found it necessary to intrench himself and his corps within the lines at Ekowe, he was surrounded by his old comrades of the Third Buffs. His kindly disposition and known abilities inspired full confidence in the troops, and enabled them to present an English parallel of the Turkish Plevna, with an English Osman supported by loyal British hearts. In this fort of Ekowe Col. Pearson and his little army, consisting of the remaining part of the No. 1 column which escaped the battles of Isandula and Rorke's Drift, were beleaguered for eight weeks. Cetewayo's general determination may be gleaned from the observation which he is reported to have made in reference to this imprisoned company: "Those rats shall never come out of that hole"—a prophecy which, happily, was not fulfilled.

The confidence of the troops inside was sustained by the news which it was possible to transmit by the heliograph, or flashing mirror, which we described in the Christian Herald May 29th. By this means the prisoners were assured of succor, and the fitting moment for mutual co-operation against the common enemy which held the little band within their grasp was decided, and the relief effected. So severe had been the sufferings of the troops under Col. Pearson, that only the day before the relief the message was flashed, "Come, or we die." This place of imprisonment of Col. Pearson and the British forces, called Ekowe—pronounced Echauwey—was originally a Norwegian mission station, abandoned by its occupants, and more or less wrecked by the natives when the present troubles began. The mission had made but few converts, and had been only tolerated of late by Cetewayo. It consisted of three houses of sun-dried brick, straw-thatched, and a church of the same material, roofed with galvanized iron, and once surrounded by pretty gardens.

Colonel Pearson's name will be perpetuated on the borders of Zululand by a fort which he erected to protect his retreat in case he should need it when he marched into the interior of the enemy's country. Into that fort—Fort Pearson, on the river Tugela—he has retired with his weary and sick little army for rest. We have traced the career of this notable soldier so far as his history has been publicly written, hoping he may be found as good a soldier of Jesus Christ as he is distinguished in his country's service.

COLONEL H. EVELYN WOOD, V.C.

This remarkably distinguished English officer has had a most eventful life, which has been spent in the interest of his country in both of the services—the navy and the army. He entered the Royal Navy in April, 1852, and very soon displayed such marked merit that he was selected as aide-de-camp to the famous Captain Peel, who organized the Naval Brigade, and which he led with much bravery until he fell in India.

Under this distinguished commander Lieut. Wood, as he then was, served from October, 1854, to June, 1855, before Sebastopol, during the Crimean War. While carrying up the scaling-ladders by means of which the troops were to storm the Redan fort, he was severely wounded. For this brave enterprise he was mentioned in Lord Raglan's dispatch—an event which is considered to be of as great moment to an English soldier or sailor as the heraldic proclamation of a hero was to the Roman victors of old.

At the close of the war he was, upon his return to England, loaded with honors. He received the Crimean medal and two clasps, was created a Knight of the French Legion of Honor, and received from Turkey the Order of the Medjidie of the fifth class, and the Turkish military medal.

About three months after his return he changed his profession, relinquishing the life of a sailor for that of a soldier. He found no difficulty, after his brave services, in obtaining a commission in a cavalry regiment as cornet.

His next steps, those of lieutenant in 1856 and captain in 1861, were purchased, but in 1858 he evinced capabilities which obtained for him the temporary rank of brigade-major in Somerset's Brigade, and throughout the Indian Mutiny he served most efficiently, being present at the battles of Rajghur and Sindwaho. For his bravery in these engagements he was again mentioned in the despatches of General Michel, and again at Kharee and Barode.

He was employed in 1859-60 in hunting down the rebels who had fled for shelter to the Seronge jungles. He was specially mentioned by the Indian Government for an attack which he made on a band of rebels in 1859, while in command of an irregular cavalry regiment, known in the Indian service as Beatson's Horse. Such was the bravery which Brigade Major Wood displayed, that he was gazetted as entitled to receive the Victoria Cross. This order (indicated by the letters V.C. after the owner's name) is the prize most coveted by British soldiers. It is awarded only for distinguished personal bravery, and as such is highly esteemed by all ranks, from general to private. Even the Order of the Garter, the highest order of English knighthood, is not so respected by a soldier as the Victoria Cross. The former may be a sign of the wearer's rank, or influence, or wealth, but the Cross means valor, and no order in the world takes rank in the soldier's eyes with that.

The experience gained by him in irregular cavalry enabled him to make a successful attempt to raise another regiment of troops of this arm. The troop so raised is called the Second Regiment of Central Indian Horse.

He accompanied Sir Garnet Wolseley to the Gold Coast in 1873 on special service. He had previously purchased the rank of Major, but when entering upon the Ashantee War he was gazetted Lieut. Colonel. With this rank he served throughout that war, during 1873-4, with conspicuous bravery.

He was much beloved by his men for his great kindness and consideration of them, while as a soldier he was, and is, a strict disciplinarian.

A large number of the discontented subjects of King Coffee, of Ashantee, came over to the British camp and offered their services to the general. These Col. Wood organized, and made of them a very efficient corps, which bore the name of "Wood's Regiment."

He commanded the attacking force at Essaman, for which he received the expression of Her Majesty's approbation. Further on in the Ashantee campaign he commanded the troops which held the head of the road followed by the enemy from Mansu to the river Prah. With this mere handful at his command he successfully resisted every attempt to dislodge him until the European troops arrived to relieve his garrison.

He led a reconnaissance force in November, 1873, which was surprised suddenly by the Ashantees during the night. He also commanded the right column in the battle of Amoaful, in which he was slightly wounded. Beside other minor engagements he was present at the capture of Coomassie.

He was several times mentioned in Sir Garnet Wolseley's despatches, and was given the rank of Brevet-Colonel, was made [illegible] the Bath, and received a medal and clasp.

Col. Wood went out to the Cape before the Zulu war began, when several tribes on the border of the Transvaal were giving the Colonial Government some trouble. Upon the British army crossing the Tugela into Zululand, Col. Wood commanded one of the three columns into which that army was divided.

He has had no occasion, like Col. Pearson, to intrench himself for the defence of his force, but his main work has been to keep the communications open for the relief of Pearson. While fulfilling this onerous duty he was constantly open to attacks from the wary enemy.

On the 30th of March, 20,000 Zulus attacked Col. Wood's force. After a desperate engagement, which is considered to have been one of the bloodiest battles that have ever been fought in the colony, the Zulus were repulsed, but with heavy loss on the British side.

The British were caught in a trap. As the mountain was only accessible at one point, Col. Wood's corps cut their way out through the Zulus. Here the Colonel's personal courage came out conspicuously.

A Zulu [illegible] times, it is said, has been more complete, and in no country is there a more open door for the truth than in Siam. This is the first instance of the head. Col. Wood galloped up with Capt. Lloyd behind him, when the Zulu fired again, the shot passing under Col. Wood's arm, tearing his coat, and killing Capt. Lloyd.

MR. JOHN DUNN,

Lord Chelmsford's Guide in Zululand.

This gentleman, whose service as a guide to Lord Chelmsford's Relief Column must have been very valuable, is a person of great local importance and celebrity. He is of Scotch descent his father, who was a doctor, having settle many years since at Port Elizabeth, where Joh himself was born.

While yet a mere boy, he, being of an adventurous disposition, found his way into Zululand where he subsequently established himself as trader, and ultimately became the acknowledge chief of a tribe of natives. He took an activ part in the Zulu civil war between Cetewayo an Umbulazi, rival sons of the old King Panda an competitors for the throne.

Umbulazi, on whose side Mr. Dunn chose t fight, was defeated and slain; whereupon M Dunn made friends with Cetewayo, and has en joyed the King's confidence till within the la few months. He was at one time employed b the Natal Government, with a salary of 300 ($1455) a year, to superintend the passage Tonga laborers, from the northern coast cou try, through Zululand, on their way to servi in Natal.

But it was found that, under cover of this im migration system, there was a great importati of firearms from Delagoa Bay for the use of t Zulus. The British Government did not appro of it, and Mr. Dunn was deprived of his sala two or three years ago. He is, neverthele reputed to be a wealthy man, and usually lives the Zulu style; but when he visits the neighb ing colony he appears in the ordinary fashion an Englishman.

In Zululand he holds the rank of an Indur or State Councillor and General, and his dip matic services may yet be rendered useful.

Cetewayo's message to the effect that would "eat up" every English soldier witho spoiling his appetite was sent through M Dunn, who, before British troops entered Zu land, prudently crossed over into Natal, taki with him the whole of his tribe, which numb about 2500 men.

THE LATE MAJOR WIGRAM BATTYE

Commander of the Indian Guides.

This gallant officer, who was killed in the tack on the Khugianis at Futtehabad on the of March last, was the seventh of ten broth all of whom were soldiers. His elder broth Quintin Battye, who like himself belonged Corps of Guides, was mortally wounded dur- the siege of Delhi in January, 1857, and died days afterwards, exclaiming, "Dulce et de- um est pro patria mori" (It is sweet and oming to die for one's country).

Vigram Battye first served as a volunteer with Azimgurh and Jounpore Field Force in na, and was afterwards posted to the Guides ecognition of his brother's gallant services. 1863, when serving with that corps at Um- la, he was shot through the body, the wound g of such a dangerous character that he er completely recovered from its effects. He subsequently engaged in other expeditions. n 1870, while on furlough, he followed the man army in the Franco-German war, for purpose of gaining practical experience in profession in the field. He attached himself he ambulance train, and received as a recog- on of his services the non-combatants' medal. le returned to India in time to take part dur- the campaign against the Jowaki-Afridi, hos- tribes who harass the trading convoys which s from India to Afghanistan; and he received thanks of the Viceroy for services in the two editions against the Renizais in the spring of year, and in October last he was in com- d of the escort at the famous interview be- en Major Cavagnari and the Ameer's repre- tative at Ali Musjid, when the unfriendly tude of the Ameer toward the British was ounced which led to the late Afghan war.

le met his death in the following manner. Khugianis having assembled near Futteha- , General Grant ordered some artillery, hus- , and Guides to go out after them. Major tye, who was charging at the head of the des, was first shot in the leg, and afterwards he arm and body; his horse also received bullets and fell; and a brave native soldier, aldar Mahmoud Khan, who stood over his en officer's body, was cut to pieces before the p could get up.

is said that Major Battye killed four men h his own hand before he fell. "He was," he London Times observed, "the ideal of an gular officer, and a worthy representative of ock which has done much gallant service in Indian Empire in times of great trial for opeans, particularly in the case of the Mu- ti."

he many officers and soldiers who are brave- defending the British Empire at the risk of ir lives are the objects of special supplication he throne of grace on behalf of their spiritual temporal welfare by many Christians.

Sculptor on Trifles.—The Great Italian lptor, Michael Angelo, was once visited by acquaintance, who remarked, on entering his dio, "Why you have done nothing to that ure since I was here last." "Yes," was the ly, "I have softened this expression, touched that projection, and made other improve- nts." "Oh," said the visitor, "those are re trifles!" "True," answered Michael gelo, "but remember that trifles make per- ion, and perfection is no trifle." In like nner the highest forms of devotion to Christ sist in fidelity in apparent trifles; for only rtfelt love and abiding recollectedness of Him, an ever-beloved object, will enable His dis- les to maintain throughout each day, in word company, in busy occupation, and before His mies, the duty of honoring Him thus contin- sly and in the whole details of life.

arley-Growing.—At a Prayer-Meeting in don regarding the duty of Christians towards or-sellers, Mr. T. B. Smithies stated that the Joseph Sturge, the Christian philanthropist, monstrating one day with a drunken man om he met, was startled by his reply that had got drunk at a public-house, adding, he beer was made from your barley." His d was at once made up, and the next Mark e Express announced that under no circum- ces would the Messrs. Sturge supply barley malting purposes. This conscientious de- on struck $38000 a year from their income.

THE FATAL BARGAIN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Evening, April 20th, and Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul."—MARK 8 : 36.

MY eye runs across this congregation, and up and down these galleries. I find people here of all occupations and professions. There are bankers here, there are merchants here, there are lawyers here, doctors here, farmers here, mechanics here, artists here—all denominations of people, and all classes of people, and all occupations represented. But I think the vast majority of the people here to-night are bargain-makers. They are accustomed morning and night across the table to discuss with their families questions of commerce, loss and gain, values, profits. If you buy a property at $15,000 you do not expect to sell it at $4000.

If youget any thing at $10,000 you do not want to part with it at $5000. You expect in commercial life to make a profit on all your bargains. And when my text comes to you to-night, you quickly take the simile, and when I ask you the question, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul?" you immediately catch the meaning.

Christ was accustomed to draw his illustrations from the occupation of the people to whom He spake. Addressing the fishermen, he spoke of the Gospel net. Addressing the farmers, he said, "A sower went forth to sow." Talking to the shepherds, he told the story of the lost sheep. And I am certainly not wrong to-night when, addressing an audience of bargain-makers, I ask you the question, What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

I want to-night, as God may help me, to make a comparison,

TO MAKE AN ESTIMATE,

a calculation of the value of the world on the one hand, and then the value of the soul, and to see whether it will be at all profitable for us to make the exchange. I shall take the values of the one, and add them up, until I get an aggregate; and then I will take the values of the other, until I get an aggregate, and I will compare this aggregation with that aggregation, and then we will be able to understand what a miserable speculation that man makes who gains the world, but loses his soul.

I. When I come, then, in the first place, and look at the value of this world, I have to tell you it is a grand property,

A VERY GRAND PROPERTY.

Its flowers are God's thoughts in bloom. Its rocks are God's thoughts in stone. Its dewdrops are God's thoughts in pearls. It is a beautiful world. It became wayward and wandered off, and God sent out a sister world to call it back, and that sister world nineteen centuries ago one Christmas night hovered over Bethlehem until it got the confession of the returning world, and that wayward world is coming with feet of light, treading on back to heaven, until it will take its place again around the throne of God.

It is a beautiful world, an attractive world, a glorious world. The hills—how beautifully they billow up; the crested wave, white with the foam of the crocuses; the rainbow, the arched bridge on which heaven and earth come out to talk to each other in tears after the storm has passed. How inimitable all the lamp-lighters that one hour ago set a blaze in the dome of the sky, the brackets of the stars!

Who was it that beat time in the June morning for the bright orchestra? How sweetly the harebell spreads its fragrance on the air! (Here a child in the church began to cry. Dr. T.: "Well, I don't know which of us is making the most noise. God bless the baby. Sorry any one is disturbed with it; I wish we could keep it; if it don't disturb others it don't disturb me at all. It will feel better after it gets into the cradle.") Well, I have said it is a beautiful world; and it is all the more beautiful for the children. What a dull world it would be without the children and without the flowers!

Oh, how attractive God made this world! And I hear some one say, "If this is such a sweet world, and such a beautiful world, why I am willing to trade my soul off for it." I suppose God may have made larger worlds, and swarthier worlds, but I do not believe He ever made a more beautiful world than this world. It is very small, yet it is a minuet on the bosom of immensity. And I hear some one saying, "It is a beautiful world, and I am ready now to make the bargain, to trade my soul off for it."

Ah, my friend! you had better halt before making the bargain. I want to ask, What is the value of this world? You do not care any thing about a property if you cannot get a title to it, if you cannot get a warranty deed for it, if you cannot keep it; if after such a large price it slips away from you. I want to know what is

THE TITLE OF THIS WORLD.

I remember, when I was in a lawyer's office, it was my duty to search titles, and I used to go to the county office and search the titles. Sometimes I would find the title good back two years, three years, five years; but after a while I would come to an imperfection in the title; then the attorney would tell his client, "Do not purchase that property; the title is imperfect."

Now, I want to know whether I can get any title to this world before I trade my soul for it; I want to know whether I am coming into permanent possession of it. Oh no. One moment after I have made the bargain, the world may go away from me. I cannot keep it. At the very moment I am settling down upon the possession, it may be gone.

My only way of holding possession of this world is through my senses: all beautiful scenes through my eye, but my eye may be blotted out; all sweet sounds through my ear, but my ear may be deafened; all appreciation of art and culture through my mind, but my mind may fail. O my friend, if these are the only modes in which we can hold this earth as our possession, I tell you it is a very poor title!

I have noticed in courts of law that are sent forth, and men are given several days notice before they must quit their premises. But I have to tell you that when death comes to us he gives us not one moment's warning. He says, Be off these premises, and be gone forever. We may offer $10,000. That will be of no value. We cannot say that we have a warranty deed. That will be of no avail. We may say, I have a lien on that storehouse; that will be of no value. We must be ejected from the premises and ejected forever. A title no better than that is no title at all.

But having found out what is the title to a property, I want to estimate its value, and I must see also what is its insurance. There is not a man in this house so silly as to purchase a property worth twenty thousand dollars or fifty thousand dollars, a property of such material that he can get no insurance upon it. And when you propose that I trade off my soul for the world and tell me you can get no title to that property, in the next place I want to know what insurance you will give me against the burning up of this world which you propose to pass off in exchange.

Why, so far from giving me any insurance against the burning up of this world and the destruction of this estate which you offer me in exchange, geologists tell us that the world is already on fire down in the heart of it, the flames kept from bursting out only as when a ship at sea is on fire, and the flames are kept down by the closing of the hatches. And yet you tell me that you would like to exchange this world for my soul while you cannot give me any title, and cannot give me any insurance.

Astronomers sweep their telescopes across the heavens, and they tell me that during the last few centuries have perished. They looked at them, and they were like other worlds; they looked at them again, and they were very red and fiery; they looked at them again, and they were burning worlds. After a while they looked again, and they were ashes; they looked again and they were burning down. Then they directed their telescopes to the heavens and all had been destroyed; even the ashes had been scattered.

Now, if the prophecy of some geologists and the prophecy of the Word of God be true, our world is finally to go in the same direction. And yet you propose to give me in exchange for my soul a world for which there is no title, and a world for which there is no insurance. Suppose an agent of insurance should come and stand in front of your house proposing to insure the building, and while he was there looking at it he should see that there was a flame in the basement of that house, why, the agent of insurance would say, I will give you no insurance on that building though you paid three fourths the value of the building; it is already being consumed.

And yet you propose that I trade off my soul and trade it for a world for which there is no title and no insurance, and it is already on fire in the basement, according to geologists who say that in the centre of the earth, far down in the depths of the mountains, the world is already aflame. I tell you you have no right to ask me for such an exchange, to give up a soul for a world for which there is no title and no insurance, and never can be.

You are aware of the fact that some people are very shy of certain property because all the people who have taken hold of that property have had trouble with it. When I lived in the outskirts of Brooklyn I used to ride through what is called Jackson's Hollow, and I used to ask the people, Why is it that while there are fine residences on this side, and fine residences on the other side of that place, there is an intermediate region where there are no houses? And they told me that everybody that ever had any thing to do with that property had trouble with it, and could not hold the estate without law-suit after law-suit, and the people would not build there.

Now, I have to tell you that every man that has bargained to take this world, and trade it for his soul, has found trouble with the estate and with the property. It was so with Lord Byron, who traded off his soul. He had the applause of all nations. So many admired him that they imitated him. He had a limping foot, and we are told that tens of thousands of people in England imitated his lame gait.

He had a large collar, and thousands of people imitated his apparel, and they felt that if they could not have any thing else they would have Byron's foot and Byron's collar, hoping in some way to make up for Byron's genius. But, alas for Byron! he lived in wretchedness, and he died in misery, with a cry so desperate and agonizing that his servant had to leave the room—trading off his soul for the world, and finding trouble with it

And so it was with Napoleon, after all his conquests had ended, and he was dying, and he asked that his military boots might be put upon him; dying in exile, his military boots his only estate left him. He traded off his soul for the world, and the world cheated him. He had trouble with the estate; he ought never to have had any thing to do with it. So it was with Thackeray, one of the most genial of men that ever lived. After winning the applause of all those who love wit, and love fine writing, one day he sat in a restaurant in Paris, and, looking across the restaurant, he saw a man, and he said within himself, "What a wretched-looking man that is! How sad and how miserable he looks!"

Then Thackeray rose from the table, and as he rose from the table at one end of the room the man he had been watching rose from the other end of the room. Thackeray put on his hat, and the man at the other end of the room put on his hat. Thackeray took his cane, the man at the other end of the room took his cane; and it was found out, on one side was Thackeray in the body, and on the other side was

THACKERAY IN THE MIRROR.

Oh, this world is a poor portion for an immortal spirit! All those that have any thing to do with it as a portion and as an estate have had trouble with it. So it has been in the past; so it will be in the future.

Besides that, no man can give you the world. I tell these young men plainly to-night, that when that promise is proposed there is an impossibility proposed. Who ever got the world? Who ever owned half the world? Who ever owned a hemisphere? Who ever owned a continent? Who ever owned Brooklyn? Who ever owned New York? We are asked to give up our souls not for a whole world, but for a mere fragment of it.

Now, suppose a man has a large estate for forty years. He lies down to die. How are you going to divide that estate? Oh, you say, send for the surveyor, and let him come with compass and chain, and let him measure the estate, three miles in this direction, three miles in that direction. Ah, no, my friend, that is not the way to measure that man's estate; now you want the undertaker; now he puts a finger in his vest-pocket, now he brings out a tape-line, and he measures five feet nine inches one way, two feet the other way.

That is the estate; not the surveyor, not the compass and the chain; just a tape-line to measure a short distance this way, and a short distance that way. Ah! even the grave does not belong to a man after he is gone. The title to that is in the hands of the executors and the heirs, and the man may have lived in a marble palace in Fifth Avenue, Presidents entertained at his house, picture-galleries the finest in all the land, and yet the ghouls of darkness after he is dead will not allow him a resting-place even in St. Mark's Churchyard.

O my friend! look at the value of the world. Pause now before you make the bargain; be deliberate. You always deliberate before you make a bargain in trade; you go to your partner and you ask him about a sale of goods; you ask of the probability of that man settling to whom you sold the goods, whether he is responsible, and whether after the goods are sold you are likely to get the compensation. And I ask this audience now, this moment, to stop and deliberate, and to find out what is the value of the world, before they propose making an exchange for it.

Now, here is the world. I will say no more about it. I cannot for my soul afford to make a mistake, you cannot for your soul afford to make a mistake. If I make a mistake in regard to the value of this world, I make a mistake forever; if you make a mistake in regard to the value of this world, you make a mistake forever. Be deliberate. Ask God for illumination. Think, judge, weigh, lift the balances, make the calculation.

II. Now I come to estimate the other value—the soul. How shall I do that? By its exquisite organism, mighty, silent—those are the characteristics of valuable machinery. Go into the mint at Philadelphia—mighty machinery, yet all moving in silence. The machinery that draws and tears itself is soon destroyed. Of machinery, the most mighty on earth is the most silent. And so this mechanism of the soul, how silently it moves, how the judgment lifts its balances in quiet, meekly, without any noise, as it brings out the treasure of all the faculties, moving in quiet, yet moving in strength, velocity, majesty, might.

Oh, this soul, superior to almost every thing, at the right moment it tosses aside the body though it were a toy, with one stroke of its wi it goes around the earth, and over the throne
God. With one leap it is beyond the stars, b
yond moon, beyond sun, beyond all the chas

I conclude its value also by its capacity for h piness. You go into a concert, you hear t snap of a broken string, you hear the harsh n tion of the bow across the viol; you say, Th is no music. It is no music, but it is in pre harmonies of this world are comparative disc compared with the harmonies of heaven; a after a while, when the curtains of the gr song and amid that congratulation and a that orchestral triumph.

We cannot in this world get an idea of soul's capacity for happiness. You have g to be exhibited. The room is made dark; t the lights are put out, this light and that li until the room is thoroughly dark, before know they will be there? Do flowers die?

you sure that when the flowers die on earth

If there are no flowers in heaven, whe they get the garlands for the righteous?
the capacity for happiness will never be k in this world, but we will understand heaven!

I also calculate the value of the soul by ow much is bid for my soul?" Satan: "I bid e world." "Ah," says the man, "I cannot cept that offer. That is no equivalent. That no bid. Sell my soul for a world? I cannot it. Begone! begone!" But another man, so wise, puts his soul up to the highest bidr, and says, "What is bid for my soul?" And answer comes back, "I will bid the world." d the man says, "Well, then, let the soul go that; going at that—going—gone."

What is the thing of greatest price,
  The whole creation round?
That which was lost in paradise,
  That which in Christ is found.

Then let us gather round the cross,
  That knowledge to obtain,
Not by the soul's eternal loss,
  But everlasting gain.

ome years ago a sailor came ashore after a mpestuous voyage, and he said, "The last trip made across the ocean was very rough, a very ugh trip. After we had been out three or four s the machinery got disarranged, the steam gan to escape, and the captain gathered us at e side of the ship, and gathered the passenrs, and said, 'Unless some one will go down re and stop that machinery, rearrange that chinery, and stop the steam, this whole vessel ll be destroyed, and we will lose our lives.'

'No one made an offer to go. The captain nself would not go. After a while he said ain to the crew and the passengers, 'If some e is not willing to sacrifice himself and go wn there, and change that machinery, and p that steam, we shall lose our lives; this ssel will last for only a few moments longer.'

"Then a plain sailor wrapped a mantle of me coarse canvas around him, and said, 'I will , sir.' And he went down the stair, and he anged the machinery, and stopped the steam, d the peril ceased. And the captain, standing the deck, said, 'All saved, thank God—all ved."

"'But let us go down,' said the captain, 'and what has become of the brave fellow that has ved us.' And they went down the stairs, and the foot of it they found the sailor—dead." carious suffering! He died for all.

And so the Lord Jesus Christ comes to us. e must perish unless some one sacrifice himf. All the nations must die unless there be an mement. Who will go? One of the seraims? One of the cherubims? Not one. hen said Christ, "Lo, I come to do Thy will." nd he went down the dark stairway of the rld's sin, and the dark stairway of the world's ffering, and the dark stairway of the world's es and the world's death, and he stopped the ril, and he saved our immortal souls.

Vicarious suffering! The good dying for the d, the just for the unjust, His sorrow for our rrow, His life for our life. Oh, the love! oh, e sacrifice! oh, the suffering! oh, the death the Son of God! This night accept and beve in the sacrifice, surrender all your sin, do t let the world cheat you any longer. What all it profit a man if he gain the whole world d lose his soul?

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

The Rev. Jerome Grant is Installed in his New Office—He Lays Deep Plans for Arnold's Perversion—Mrs. Montaigne becomes Uneasy about her Son—Mr. Grant Thinks that the End Justifies the Means—Percival Submits to be Guided by him—He makes Overtures to a Roman Catholic Priest—Mr. Grant Disgusted—Protests.

MR. GRANT was at first somewhat staggered at this proposal—this secret and fraudulent scheme of proselytism. It shocked the honest Protestant principles in which he had been brought up, and which in some measure lived still in his soul. He had come into contact, however, with one who had been trained to perfection in all the arts of sophisticating the conscience, and under the skill of his Jesuit friend's special pleading and the ardor of his own new-born zeal for Rome, his moral judgment was blinded and his scruples set aside. A Roman Catholic at heart, and a Jesuit in fact, he yet called himself an Anglican clergyman, ready to undertake any task for the Papal Church which his ostensible position as a Protestant minister might cast in his way.

The work of tutor to Percival Montaigne was such a task. The Superior of the Jesuit order in Dublin called his attention to Mr. Gogharty's advertisement in the Dublin newspaper, hence his reply to it; and the same person, knowing at a glance for whom the tutor was wanted, sent his note to Mr. Gogharty, calling upon him to see to it that his friend Mr. Grant should be introduced to the home and confidence of Mrs. Montaigne.

Mr. Gogharty divined in a moment the significance of this request. To his wondering and delighted eyes the whole astute plot revealed itself. His Jesuit friend, then, had not forgotten the enterprise he had placed in his hands, but had only bided his time for a fitting opportunity. "Isn't it a lucky thing," said Mr. Gogharty to himself, "that I didn't write that note to him, which though enjoined not to send, yet, egged on by my mischievous impatience, I was a short time since on the very point of despatching to him, forsooth, to jog his memory? Indeed, I should have made a pretty mess, and put my foot in it."

Throwing into his waste-basket with a gleeful chuckle the five or six most eligible replies he had received to his advertisement, and which he had set aside for Mrs. Montaigne's inspection, and then selecting from the general heap of applications five or six of the most unlikely answers he could find, he fastened about them and Mr. Grant's letter and testimonials an elastic band, and that afternoon, putting the packet in his pocket, set off for Portarlington.

On Mrs. Montaigne's reading over the epistles submitted to her by the lawyer, it was not difficult to persuade her which applicant to choose. It was evident that Mr. Grant's fitness for the vacant post was far and away superior to any of the rest. "In fact, madam, it is quite a happy Providence," said Mr. Gogharty, "which has brought before your choice such an accomplished candidate as this Oxford graduate." "Yes," said the poor confiding lady, "and only think of it, Mr. Gogharty, he is a clergyman, too, and therefore one certain to take a special interest in a clergyman's son." Almost as a matter of course, Mr. Gogharty was instructed by his lady client to form at once an engagement with the precious Mr. Grant, and to ask him as soon as possibly convenient to enter upon his duties with her Percival.

In due time, therefore, this Jesuit in disguise arrived—this seducer to spiritual bondage and darkness, "clothed as an angel of light"—and he became a trusted and revered inmate in a Protestant household,—resolved, however, to work out a consummation therein which would destroy its peace, poison its happiness, blast its temporal prospects, and fill it with desolation and woe.

It would take too long to describe the methods which the Rev. Jerome Grant put into operation to sap and overturn his pupil's Protestant belief. The first thing to success was to worm himself, by any and every means, into his pupil's affection and confidence. When this was artfully accomplished—nothing was done in a hurry—the Jesuit had too cunning a knowledge of human nature to wound or startle by too precipitate disclosures the strong and early formed predilections of the young man. From the history of his own mind he knew how to begin and where to begin his subtle enterprise, and right skilfully he dealt with the unsuspicious and plastic intellect before him. Percival, now somewhat more than eighteen years of age, had reached a stage of mental growth the most critical in a human being—one in which there is a love of freedom in opinion without caution, or experience, or knowledge to guide it—one in which the mind is open to the assaults of error without having the firmness and skill to withstand and refute them; and in which all the unsophisticated and generous impulses of the heart would move it to sympathize with a cause that had long been in adverse and unfortunate circumstances, as had been the case, both politically and religiously, with the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and that for centuries.

"It is noble," Percival said within himself, "to stand, in the face of prejudice and scorn, by the down-trodden and despised; and there must be—it is clear as a sunbeam—a marvellous vital force in those dogmas and principles which have outlived all 'penal laws,' and which have victoriously stood their ground against a richly-endowed and patronized Protestant Establishment."

There is a strange and perilous proneness in the religious instinct, the noblest in its possibilities which man possesses, to attribute a secret and magical potency to holy persons, holy places, and outward forms; in other words, while all but ignoring the spirituality of true religion, to invest priests, shrines, and sacraments with an all-saving and sanctifying efficacy; and this does Romanism. Protestantism, more opposed to human nature, teaches that religion is altogether a personal affair, and that acceptance with God depends, not upon the "hocus pocus" and manipulations of a priest, but upon real faith in Jesus Christ and inward character. Mr. Grant, however, insidiously and persistently suggested to young Montaigne that the supernatural and mysterious powers of the Church, handed down by a presumed unbroken succession from the Apostles, must count for something; and that if so, "what Church," he asked, "can have these powers in such complete and unchallengeable exercise as the ancient Church of Rome? One and undivided," he urged, "and not in schismatical disunion, like the thousand sections of Protestantism?"

Union, however, as we know, is essentially a matter of inward life and spirit, and not of outward organization and form. But Mr. Grant took good care to keep this crucial fact in abeyance, for, if understood, Percival would at once perceive that in this sense Protestantism has a far truer unity that what the Church of Rome can boast of. Its hymns in common use, its oneness in fundamental doctrine, its sole appeal to the Bible, and its harmony of prayers and worship prove this; but still the show of unity in the Papacy, though the result of fettered thought and tyrannical authority and not of living spontaneity, is something patent and palpable, and it was speciously and skilfully, time after time, put before Percival Montaigne, and not without effect. He took, as many have done before him, appearances for reality, and, beguiled, was soon enamored of the cheat.

Mrs. Montaigne more than once of late was a good deal startled by certain remarks of her son; his spiteful criticism of the work and character of the Reformers, his depreciating tone in regard to evangelical religion, his expressed admiration of the orders and ceremonies of the Papal Church, were all new things to hear in her house, and, as coming from her beloved Percival, pained and almost shocked her. She felt she must take counsel of his and her mentor, the Rev. Jerome Grant, upon the matter, and warn him that some evil pamphlets and books must somehow have got into his pupil's hands. She entreated him to find out what these books were, and to destroy them.

Mr. Grant, as we know, was quite aware of the source of his pupil's new opinions, only he would not have called what had wrought this change of religious sentiment evil publications. He himself it was who had brought them before the notice of Percival Montaigne. Some of them he had left in his way, and to others he had given his positive recommendation. "The result of my wary scheme," he said within himself, "is, no doubt, very distressing to this poor, simple-minded lady, and," he added, with a gleeful shrug, "I suppose, poor thing! I ought to be sorry for her, but, by St. Peter, I cannot. Jesus Christ said, 'Be wise as a serpent,' and Paul said of his mission, 'This one thing I do,' and holy Church must be served whoever may come to the wall. That ardent youth, her son, however, must be curbed and made to hold his tongue, or he'll ruin my well-set enterprise with his glib talk and ill-timed babble."

He therefore, that very day, exhorted his pupil to absolute silence upon his transition state of religious opinion when in the presence of his mother, and even counselled him to put on a seeming acquiescence in her views. "You see, my dear Percival," he blandly said, "Mrs. Montaigne's ideas are, as it were, stereotyped, and are now so long formed and fixed that there is not the remotest likelihood that she'll ever change them. Your talking, therefore, about these matters before her will only alarm and anger her, and lead her to cruelly forbid you any further progress in Catholic truth. Of course, my dear young friend, when conscience is concerned, even the injunction of a parent must be disobeyed; but there is no use, my son, in unnecessarily calling forth her opposition; you could not submit to it, and the result would only be an unpleasant dispute. Take my advice, dear friend, and just keep things, for the present, quiet and pleasant, and by and by, when your position is more independent, you know, you can do as you like without the possibility of any hindrance."

Percival did not relish these lessons on the suppression of what he deemed vital truth, nor this counsel to dissimulation. It grated upon his conscience, did violence to his moral judgment, and contradicted his life-long practice of keeping nothing hidden from his mother. Mr. Grant, however, was a clergyman—one, as he thought, who knew far better than he could what was justifiable and expedient. It was probable, then, that he, Percival, was only weakly scrupulous, and his reverend tutor right. He would, consequently, act upon his direction, and on all religious questions would remain before his mother, in the future, silent as the grave; and he kept well to his new purpose. Though his mother, anxious to gainsay some opinions she had heard him express, often tried to draw him into controversy, he avoided her attempts, and adroitly turned the conversation into another channel.

The young man's moral and spiritual nature, however, wounded and degraded, knew from this hour a rapid descent. He was soon in a position to be taken captive by even the most absurd and vicious delusions and dogmas of the Romish creed. In fact, he travelled the road of perversion quite too facilely even for the Rev. Jerome Grant, for he startled and vexed that gentleman by abruptly telling him one day that he had made up his mind to become at once a member of "the holy Catholic Church," and had even spoken to the parish priests of Portarlington upon the subject. "I have done this without your knowledge," said Percival, "because I feared that as an Anglican clergyman you would seek to oppose me in such a step—one which has become necessary to my peace of mind.

"I have, therefore, without consulting any thing but my own conscience, to all intents and purposes crossed the Rubicon; and forgive me, Mr. Grant, if I respectfully say," he continued, making that worthy inwardly smile, "that you, my dear sir, from what I have heard you admit many times, should in all consistency follow in my steps."

But why, it may be asked, was the Jesuit annoyed at this intelligence? Was not this just the very result for which he had come under Mrs. Montaigne's roof? And had he not, with peerless skill, not only made a most desirable proselyte, but also secured for his Order a very handsome money reward? For Mr. Gogharty would have now to redeem his pledge of a large emolument, of which pledge Mr. Grant was fully cognizant.

Dear reader, Mr. Grant had a far deeper scheme in his mind than you give him credit for. No thorough-going Jesuit, such as he was, would close in with an inferior project when a greater and grander one by a little diplomacy might be accomplished. The sum which Mr. Gogharty had engaged himself for to the Jesuit order was trifling compared with the value of the Percival estate. Why, then, should it be accepted, when by a wise and prudent delay the whole of the late knight's property could be got into the Jesuit coffers? And this, as Mr. Grant saw, could be successfully and easily managed by keeping Percival Montaigne until his twenty-fifth year in nominal connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church. The eccentric conditions of Sir Christopher's will would thus be met, and Percival Montaigne once in possession of the estate, from what he knew of human nature, and especially of his pupil's human nature and his influence over him, he was fully persuaded he could move him to enter a Jesuit monastery, and even, were it desirable, induce him to become a Jesuit priest. Now, this sublime plot, by a too hasty development, seemed on the eve of failure, his well-thought-out scheme was in imminent peril of becoming a thing of naught; and this threatened "debacle," as he called it, involving the loss of several thousand pounds, filled the soul of Mr. Grant with disgust and chagrin.

He therefore strongly protested against the hasty step which the young man meditated. At first, he sought to show him what temporal ruin it would entail both upon himself and his mother, since he would forfeit his heirship to the Percival property; but when he found that his pupil was proof against this consideration, and was prepared to sacrifice all, even his mother, to the felt imperative claim of his conscience, Mr. Grant proceeded upon another tack, and pointed out to him how the steps the young man proposed to take would cause a tremendous loss to the Church itself for which he was now so zealous, and, in fact, finally and boldly urged upon him the act of hypocrisy which he had so long marked out for him.

With a start the young man heard his pernicious suggestion—it shocked all the remaining virtues of his character. After a look of intense indignation and reproach at his tempter, he turned his back upon him and left the room.

(To be continued.)

Crying for Help.—Several Children of a Family were playing in a garden, when one fell into a tank. When the father heard of it he asked each what means they thought of to rescue their brother from his perilous situation. Inquiring of the youngest he said, "John, what did you do to rescue your brother?" The boy answered, "Father, what could I do? I am so young that I could not do any thing, but I stood and cried as loud as I could." But in crying for help he did his part, and did well. If we cannot bring a ladder or a rope, we can at least cry to God in prayer for Him to help and bless.

A REVIEW OF 25 YEARS' PASTORATE

Address by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, at the Monda Evening Prayer-Meeting, May 19.

His first Congregations at New Park Stree Chapel, Exeter Hall, Surrey Hall—Origin of th Pastors' College, and of the Stockwell Orphar age, to which £20,000 was given—How anothe £20,000 was Guaranteed to the Metropolita Tabernacle—Mr. Spurgeon's Frequent Tren bling on Entering the Pulpit—His Fits of Sicl ness—No Divisions in the Congregation, etc.

THE spirit of prayer so thoroughly pervade this meeting that I am loth to break in upon i but there are some things I should like to say. must crave your indulgence this evening if we g a good deal beyond the general closing time- 8.30. This is a special night, and for once think we may make a night of it. I have felt, you must imagine, the deepest emotion at th end of these twenty-five years, and an emotic which I shall never attempt to express, of grat ful thanks to you for the noble testimonial yo have raised. It never entered into my mind th any thing like such a testimonial could possib have been given—the immense sum of £62 ($30,254)—a universal gift, a delighted gift, giving which everybody seemed only afraid being excluded—the giving of the rich, the givir of the poor. I certainly could not imagine th any thing like such an immense sum as that cou possibly be given among you.

All the while you were raising it I was ill bed, too ill to rise, and as each day brought n tidings of what you were doing, as each day heard some account of all your acts, and word and deeds of love, my heart could hardly bear i I hardly like to begin upon the subject. I ha generally fought shy of subjects I was not a quainted with, and of some which I was acquain ed with, but which I felt would master me; ar this is such a subject. I bless you all a thousan fold for this token of your love and kindness me.

WELL, I HAVE TO SPEAK OF MYSELF.

Last night I had a difficult task. I felt I mu praise God for the twenty-five years of prosperi He has given us, but I was afraid it would lo so much like speaking about myself. I did n like the task, and was glad when it was over. must bless the name of God for all that He h done. All He has done in this place is not gat ered up in this place, nay, not a thousand part of it, for the influence which has gone for from this pulpit is not confined here. There scarcely a place in all this world where God h not made the arrows shot from this pulpit find a lodging place.

Now I cannot take any honor for this to m self, for I may say of myself, as did the apost if I have preached the Gospel I have not t glory of it, for necessity is laid upon me. I m preach the Gospel; I cannot help it; I could n live without preaching it. If anybody kno any thing better than the Gospel let him prea it, but as I know of nothing a hundredth part good I must go on with the old, old story long as my tongue can move. I cannot help I cannot be praised for it. I cannot help it.

Looking back over the twenty-five years, I serve that in nothing I have done has the cre been due to me. When first I came to the N Park Street Congregation it was through no vo of mine; the people would have me, and I can When the place I preached in got too small could not help it; people would come and ma it small. Then I preached on Sundays in Exe Hall, and that was thought a great thing; we went there because we had nowhere else go—we could not help ourselves. I recoll going to see the Surrey Hall, and thinking wh a fine place it was, and could we venture to t that. I remember that one or two of our me bers always persisted in calling it the "dev house." I told them I would preach in devil's house any day as long as he would let preach the Gospel, and the devil could be ther he liked. Well, we went there because we h nowhere else to go—we could not help o elves. Then this place was built because we ould not help ourselves.

So it has been with every thing. Necessity was laid upon us in the matter of the College; because there were some young men who would preach the Gospel, and some of them preached it very badly, and made great fools of themelves. So we thought if these young fellows would preach, the best thing we could do would be to give them an opportunity of learning how o do it better. We could not help the college; it grew up of itself.

Then, too, when that dear woman of God sent me a letter saying she had laid aside 20,000*l.* $97,000) for the Orphanage, who in his senses ould help starting it?

In all I have done I have been pressed forward by some influence or other which has carried me along. I have just floated on the crest of the wave, borne on by some influence, of which it is true I was the willing instrument, but only the nstrument. In nothing whatever can I take the slightest honor or credit to myself. I say again, with the apostle, "necessity was laid upon me."

I always have one good reason for speaking with bated breath of any thing which God does by me, because usually the real honor belongs to some one else—to some men or some women who are not seen. I don't think I ever told in public what I am now going to tell you of what once happened to me. This great house was to be built, and some 30,000*l.* ($145,500) were needed. We didn't know it would want so much, and we started with about 12,000*l.* or 15,000*l.*

Well, when we found that 20,000*l.* ($97,000) was needed, you may suppose it was a cause of some anxiety to us. I remember going down the street one day, when I met a friend who was driving a gig. He asked me to get in with him and I did. "Well," said he, "I suppose you must feel very nervous that you will not get the money you want to complete the building?" "No," I said, "I was not nervous." "Well," said he, "how much more do you suppose it will take to finish it altogether?" I told him about 20,000*l.* "Then," he answered, "I will come down to-morrow and give you the 20,000*l.* Say nothing about it to any one and pay me back as the subscriptions come in. If you never get any more subscriptions, I will lose the 20,000*l.*; but I don't expect my subscription will come to more than 20*l.* ($97)." Well, he brought me the money, and when I had it I said nothing about it; but it is wonderful what a degree of faith I had that the building would be completed.

His subscription in the end amounted to 50*l.* ($242), no more. I felt very thankful to him, as you may suppose. Then, again, in the matter of the Orphanage, that dear Christian woman, who always wishes to be unknown, was behind the scenes; and whenever any good work has been done, there have always been people behind who did the work.

So you see I have been like a weather-beaten figurehead put up in front of the vessel, but behind has been the real motive-power. People have said to me, "Here, take this money; you can use it better than I can; take it and distribute it as you think fit." These men and women God alone knows, but to them all human credit must be given—to them do I most freely and heartily yield it. I do not know that they could have done the work so well without me, but I am certain I could not have done it without them.

THEREFORE UNTO GOD THE PRAISE.

Now the leadership of such a church as this has not been without many sore difficulties. I do not think many of you know me at all; I hardly know myself. It is generally supposed that I preach with very little trouble or struggle. Now, for many years I never entered this pulpit without a fit of trembling, of fear and dismay, lest my powers should suddenly desert me. If I might have had my way, I think I would almost as soon have taken a flogging or a horsewhipping as preach a sermon. I recollect years ago asking a preacher if he had not had this feeling, and got over it. He said he was afraid he had got over it, but he hoped I never would; he hoped I would always feel the trembling, for when I didn't I certainly should not preach so well. I never have preached as I should preach, but I have tried at it, and it has stirred me through and through. It has never been a recreation to me to preach to such audiences as gather here, and if it has become in time more and more easy to preach in the same house to the same people, still the same feeling of horror and trembling often comes upon me when I am striving with a subject, and trying to get my soul into sympathy with it.

Now, during the twenty-five years of my ministry I do not know how often I have been laid up by severe fits of sickness. I think almost every year I have been laid prostrate. I do think this was necessary. I think it was right. I should have liked to escape from it; but let God be thanked even for that, for He knows best. But if I should get worse and worse, have patience with me. I cannot always be in my place, but I always will be when I can, and when at last it comes to this, "Well, he is done for," then I shall go, without standing in your way, and I will cheerfully set about such labor as I shall be able to do, and not attempt to lay hold of a task too great for my powers. Yet I do not know but what there is life in the old dog yet. (Applause.)

My great joy has been that in the church we have had no serious troubles of any sort—no division about dogmas. I have sometimes heard that a brother is heretical, but I have not believed it; and I have never thought it my duty to come down like a terrier dog and snap at him.

True it is that during the twenty-five years we have not been without a few members who have brought disgrace upon us and upon the name of Christ—we never expected to be without such—there will be such everywhere; but when, on the whole, I think of the holiness of living and the steadfastness of faith which have characterized our members, and of the union which has prevailed among us, I can only bless and praise and magnify the name of the Lord. Though one brother may occasionally have grumbled at another brother, yet it has not been much. You do not seem to have differed much from me. Nobody has fallen out with me. Yes, there have been one or two, and I have also fallen out with them in another way. If they have spoken ill of me, I have tried to speak well of them. When they have been very fierce I have been very gentle, and the fiercer they grew the gentler I became. In almost every case I have conquered by this simple process.

Young men, this has been all my policy—to hate nobody; to love everybody; and I can recommend it to you as a policy which conduces to success. I have tried to

SEE EVERY THING IN THE BEST LIGHT.

I have turned the best side foremost, as some of you do with your goods in the shop windows when they get a little dingy or soiled.

Now there are many things I would like to say but cannot. I will simply make a remark about the testimonial. When my dear friends said there ought to be a testimonial to me, I said it was God who had done it all, and I would have nothing to do with a testimonial for myself. Well, many uses have suggested themselves for the money; but our funds have sometimes been heavily taxed for the support of our poor brothers, and it has been thought that 5000*l.* ($24,250) might well be devoted as a perpetual fund for that purpose. But you have raised over 6200*l.* ($30,000). Well, many brothers have said, "This 1200*l.* extra is clearly for you, and you must have it." Indeed, I have been scolded by some friends, who said they would give more if I would take it; but I will not take a penny.

But I said, at the same time, I would like to have a piece of bronze which should be a memorial of your gift, so this clock (uncovering a handsome bronze clock) has been given to me—(applause)—with two side ornaments in bronze, which are to come to-morrow from Paris. These are for my study, and I shall never look at them without remembering your kindness. I shall greatly treasure them. I don't know which of my sons will come in for them for I have not the least notion which is the elder of the two. I know one of them was born in this country before the other, but then the second one was in Australia at the time of his coming of age, so in relation to that event was exactly twelve hours before his brother.

I don't know how it will go, but I hope in years to come that it will be remembered that this was presented to me on this occasion as a token of your kindness to me. This memorial is paid for out of the money raised, but all the rest of the money will be devoted to various purposes which I shall name to-morrow. I shall leave it in the hands of treasurers, and they shall see it is so used.

It will be said by some people, I know, "Ah, Spurgeon makes a good thing of this." (Laughter.) He does. He is perfectly satisfied. I should not like anybody to think my Master does not pay His servants well, for He does. If anybody thinks he can fill my place better than I do, he is welcome to take it, and I hope he may have a testimonial raised to him. If he does, I hope he will do with it as I have done. When people say, "Ah, he makes a good thing of it," I should like to have it known he does make a splendid thing of it, and that if they will serve the Lord Jesus Christ they may make the same splendid thing of it.

That clock shall be an Ebenezer to me. I shall recollect that the Lord has brought us in love and unity together so far. Many who began with us have passed away, dropping off one by one, but another set of men have been always ready to fill the vacant places. If some dear names, familiar in your mouths as household words, are heard no more—names of men and women who have gone home—there have been others to take their place; not quite like them perhaps—some we shall never see the like of, and filling their places well and bravely.

It always seems to me I have the very pick of men and women around me. I wish they were better, and myself better too—for if I did not get better as well they would be too good for me—but I cannot imagine better friends, kinder helpers than I have. Still we are not going to indulge the idea that any one here is essential, least of all the pastor. Let us go forward! Let us go forward! let us go forward! Our tasks are not yet accomplished, they are only beginning.

The lady who sent the money for the Orphanage sent 50*l.* ($242) for a girls' orphanage. I wanted her to take it back, for I felt I was not equal to the task at the time. But she said, "Keep it—it will grow." I should have liked to commence the twenty-sixth year with a girls' orphanage; but though I must wait awhile I am keeping the 50*l.* and letting it grow. I have always found the proverb true that money breeds money, and I am quite sure that the 50*l.* will lay eggs.

We shall have a girls' orphanage; I feel sure of it. God has always sent us the help we wanted just at the very right time. Unto the Lord Jehovah be all honor and glory forever and ever; and so we close these twenty-five years, giving Him all the praise, world without end. Amen.

The Shape of a Hat may seem unimportant, but circumstances may conspire to render it a national question. Aleko Pasha, the Governor-General of Eastern Roumelia, has been required by the Sultan of Turkey to wear the Turkish fez. He is desirous of conciliating his subjects by wearing the Bulgarian hat. The Sultan considers the refusal a breach of Aleko's arrangement, and threatens to send an armed force against him unless he wears the fez. Aleko wishes he had two heads that he might please both the Sultan and his subjects, but as he has not, he runs a risk of losing the head he has.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the American public and readers of his sermons. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to the manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

DR. TALMAGE says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

We have already published extracts from numerous letters commending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the strongest terms, which we have received from all parts of the country, and from ministers of all denominations.

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be in registered covers. Post-office orders and drafts should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. Subscribers who make their remittances in postage stamps would oblige us by sending one-cent stamps.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress.—A Monument to mark the birthplace of "The Father of his Country" is to be erected; a joint resolution providing for this object has been passed. A resolution approving the issue of rations to the yellow-fever sufferers last year was passed in the House. The legislative appropriation bill has been sent to the Senate without the political clauses to which the President and the Republican Party object. A stubborn fight has been made over the Supplementary Judicial Appropriation Bill, which it is contended renders inoperative laws remaining unrepealed on the Statute Book. Even if it passes the Senate, it is not likely to receive the assent of the President. In his last veto message he stated in strong language his objections to a repeal of the laws regulating elections, and he will doubtless consider those objections are as valid against nullification as against repeal.

The House adopted without division a resolution to adjourn June 17th. Public opinion outside Congress is unanimous in the belief that an adjournment cannot take place too soon, for the credit both of that body and of the country.

A Fire of a Remarkable Character occurred at Philadelphia, Pa., June 11th. During a thunderstorm, lightning struck the pump house of the Atlantic Refining Company at Point Breeze, on the Schuylkill River, in the southern section of the city. Along the river front were stored about 25,000 cases of oil, and in the river by the wharves were a number of ships and barks loading or loaded with oil. In a few minutes the flames communicated to a large filling warehouse where the barrels are filled. This was soon enveloped in flames, which then extended to the long line of sheds on the wharf. By this time an immense quantity of crude and refined oil was ablaze. The burning oil was running in all directions and the long line of wharf property was soon one continuous blaze. By the time the city fire engines reached the scene five ships on the river and 10,000 barrels of oil and the surrounding buildings were burning fiercely for a distance of over a thousand yards, and the heat had become so intense that very little headway could be made against the fire. It was eventually got under control, but broke out again on the 13th, doing much damage.

Dr. Talmage in London.—The New York Herald publishes the following telegram from its London correspondent: "The Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage preached to day (June 15th) at the Islington Presbyterian Church, Colebrooke Road, to an enormous congregation. Much curiosity was evinced by the people to see the famous American preacher; a dense crowd blockaded the streets leading to the church. The enthusiasm was immense. Half a mile before the Presbyterian Church was reached the carriage of the reverend gentleman was lifted from the ground and carried bodily to the church. It was one of the most tremendous ovations ever paid to an American minister in London."

The Serious Illness of Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., has caused acute anxiety, not only to the Church of Holy Trinity, but throughout the city of New York. The general respect in which he is held by all denominations of Christians, and the knowledge that his illness is in great part the result of overwork, renders the issue of his malady a subject of general concern. Many prayers have been offered, that if consistent with the Divine will, his life may be spared. Some weeks ago this energetic clergyman protested against the closing of the churches for the summer season, and announced his intention of continuing his labors through the summer; but God is showing that His work may be continued without the instruments man regards as essential to its success.

A glance at the work at Holy Trinity causes surprise that Dr. Tyng's physical powers have sustained the strain so long. Among the various religious and philanthropic enterprises connected with the church, and which Dr. Tyng carefully superintends, and with the minutest details of which he is thoroughly conversant, may be mentioned, the House of the Evangelists; the Orphanage; a Dispensary and Infirmary; a home for Christian care; the Peabody Home; the Andrew and Philip Society; the Dorcas Society; Mary and Martha Society; a Committee on Strangers; a Committee of Employment; and the Innocents Aid Society, besides the Sunday-school and the usual adjuncts of church work. Holy Trinity, under Dr. Tyng's pastoral care, has been made a centre from which good flows out in many streams over the whole city, and his influence and energetic spirit are perceptible in all. It may be mentioned that Dr. Tyng studied the work of philanthropic organization in Mr. Spurgeon's church in London, and obtained there many valuable suggestions which he has elaborated and improved.

More Large Bequests to Religious and Philanthropic institutions are announced. Under the will of Mr. William Sloane, the Treasurer of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, $140,000 are left for division among eleven societies, amongst which the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions receives $30,000; the Presbyterian Board of Domestic Missions, $30,000; the American Sunday School Union, $10,000; the New York Tract Society, $5000; the Seaman's Society, $5000; the St. Andrew's Society, $5000, the New York Bible Society, $20,000. To his pastor, Dr. John Hall, Mr. Sloane also left a legacy of $20,000.

A Newsboy's Present to the Public.—The public library of Cincinnati has lately been enriched by the large addition of 2500 volumes. They have been presented by John King, a newsboy of the city. His history is a remarkable one. He was crippled in early life by an accident, an while confined to his bed he developed a likin for books and an ambition for a library. He le his bed, and after many trials found himself i the city of Cincinnati keeping a news-stand and for the last ten years the cripple and hi papers have become well known on the streets King now began to start his library. He had little money saved at the end of each day' work, and he found his delight in reading book of his own purchasing. Keeping a sharp eye f bargains, he gradually accumulated hundreds volumes, not of worthless publications, b books of standard value. In addition to his l brary he had saved several hundred dollars i money—a fund intended for his support when i his old age he should sit down for a "big read, as he expressed it. Circumstances have, ho ever, combined to defeat his purpose, and thought the best thing he could do was to pr sent his library to the city.

The Duke of Argyll arrived in New Yo June 3d from England. He is well known as author and a statesman. In visiting the Ne World he stated that he had three principal o jects in view besides a general desire to s America. The first to visit his eldest son, t Marquis of Lorne, now Governor-General of Ca ada; second, to call on Longfellow in his N England home; and, third, to see Niagara.

We hope to publish his portrait and a sket of his life in the next number of the CHRISTI HERALD.

Taunton, Mass., is the sphere of labor which Rev. S. H. Pratt and Mr. and Mrs. Cl Willson are at present occupied. The servi are held in their Gospel Tent, which is crowd to its utmost capacity at all the meetings. D icatory services were held June 3d and 4th, which Dr. E. G. Taylor, of Providence, and R E. P. Hammond took part. Great success attending the work, and it is proposed to c tinue it as God may point the way in other cit and villages through the summer.

A Lawsuit about an Aerolite is to be tr in Iowa. The farmer on whose land the m fell did not set any value on it, and some sci tific gentlemen obtained his permission to move it; but when the farmer heard that public were offering a dollar an ounce for fr ments, he endeavored to regain possession, his demand has issued in a suit for recovery.

ood Abilities are Frequently Used for Ig- ble purposes, and time and talents spent in sin ich used in the ways of righteousness would ve been beneficial to the owner and to the rld. An instance of this has turned up in the ipe of a counterfeit United States note of the denomination. It is produced with pen and , and is so exquisitely done as to deceive even erson accustomed to handling notes of that nomination. All the intricate figures and ves, all the heads, the seal, the fine engrav- work, are almost perfect. The signature of n Allison, formerly Register of the Treasury, almost exact, while that of John C. New, for- rly Treasurer, is perfect. The whole bill, k and face, is a wonderful piece of pen-work. was detected at the sub-treasury at New leans. Unless the individual who executed counterfeit is as rapid as he is a wonderful rker, it would take at least a month to finish a ce of work like this $20 bill.

even Hours in a Chimney.—A singularly inful and sad experience has been that of a rglar who endeavored to enter a pawnbroker's op by the chimney. Descending to within six t of the fireplace he stuck fast, however, and, spite all his efforts, failed to get free. For ur long hours he struggled in vain, and then servant of the pawnbroker came and lighted fire beneath. Then the roasting of the rglar began. What kind of sensations the ber experienced we are left to imagine; all at is known is that, after three hours of torture, groans became so audible that the proprietor the place heard them, and, sending for the lice and a builder, did the best he could to ex- cate the thief. This proved, however, to be easy matter, for, before the entrapped rascal uld be rescued the brickwork had to be taken wn. When found, the miserable man was im- dded firmly, "crying fearfully." His mouth d eyes were filled with soot and he was readfully scorched," and he died immediately er he was taken out.

Taught by an Arab.—Some years ago a enchman, who, like many of his countrymen, d won a high rank among men of science, yet o denied the God who is the Author of all ence, was crossing the Great Sahara in com- ny with an Arab guide. He noticed with a eer that at certain times his guide, whatever stacles might arise, put them all aside, and, eeling on the burning sands, called on his God. Day after day passed, and still the Arab never led, till at last one evening the philosopher, en he rose from his knees, asked him with contemptuous smile, "How do you know ere is a God?" The guide fixed his eyes on e scoffer for a moment in wonder, and then id, solemnly, 'How do I know there is a God? ow did I know that a man, and not a camel, ssed my hut last night in the darkness? as it not by the print of his foot in the sand? en so," and he pointed to the sun, whose last ys were flashing over the lonely desert, "that otprint is not that of a man."

Russia is at the present time undergoing period of national suffering which may be mpared to the sufferings the Israelites en- red as chastisement for their sins. Russia s been for several generations filling up the ps of her iniquities. Her insatiable lust for rritory has led her, under one hypocritical ise or another, to appropriate the lands of her ighbors. Sometimes she has pretended sym- thy for oppressed peoples, sometimes a desire aid a hated ruler, but her object has always en the same—plunder.

Having but recently ended a sanguinary and rrible war, burdened with debt to the very rge of bankruptcy, shaken as by the throes a revolutionary earthquake, she seems des- ned, moreover, to be devastated by fire and stilence. On April 28th, the partial destruc- on of the important town of Orenberg, of 10,- o inhabitants, took place by fire, and the best rt of the town was destroyed. On May 12th, e same town was again set on fire in the Cossack quarter, and a large part of what the previous conflagration had spared was consumed. On May 9th, a great fire broke out in another town, Irbit, which lasted five hours. All the best parts of the town were destroyed. Again, on May 11th, during a violent gale of wind, a fire broke out at Uralsk, whereby a great part of that town was destroyed. In addition to these conflagrations, many other fires are reported from different towns and villages.

Meanwhile, we learn from Tiflis that terrible mortality prevails in the Caucasus, in the district of Gore, the settlement of Metche, and other places. The nature of the malady is unknown. It is fatal in about twenty-four hours. In the Dirby settlement of 150 houses, 70 men have died; in Belot, 31 men. In Medjvrisheni, containing 200 houses, 200 men are reported dead. Similarly great mortality is reported in seven other settlements.

The reign of terror by the Government still continues, and arrests are made in the most arbitrary manner all over Russia.

Waldensian Fair at Rome.—A Fair or Bazaar for the Waldensian church was held at Rome lately, and yielded nearly $1000. It is the first effort of the kind made during the eight years of Italian occupation, and, "for Italy," where money is scarce and little interest is taken by the native population in this cause, the sum is very satisfactory. The Waldensian schools in Rome have now seventy-eight children on their rolls.

Among the helpers at the fair were two titled Italians, who are members of the church. One had been a soldier in the Papal army for forty, and the other for thirty years. They are both noble-minded, simple-hearted, and sincere Christian men. One of them, a model of courteousness and kindness, dresses and acts with the utmost simplicity. "Ask that man to drive in this nail for us," said a rosy-cheeked and amiable American girl who was assisting in preparing the table. "That man! That man is a Count," was the response; and she herself soon discovered that, notwithstanding his plain brown coat and unpretending manners, he was possessed of that exquisite politeness resulting from fine education and Christian charity.

A New Temperance Hospital is now being built in London. The foundation stone has been laid by Sir Wilfrid Lawson. It is to cost $55,000, and towards this amount $50,000 had already been subscribed. Hitherto the non-alcoholic treatment of disease has been on its trial at a smaller institution, and the result has been so satisfactory as to justify an experiment on a wider scale. In this larger institution there will be a better opportunity for collecting and systematizing facts and figures on the subject.

The Rev. H. Webb Peploe, Rector of St. Paul's, Onslow Square, London, related at the Tract Society meeting his own conversion as follows: "A lad just bursting into manhood, being nineteen years of age, was once spoken to about his soul by a faithful Christian who was then taking a leading part in much of God's work in London. The next day that lad tried to get rid of the influence which had been produced upon his mind the previous evening by going to the race-course at Derby, where the races were then going on. Just as he was stepping on to the ground a young man walked towards him and said, 'Sir, will you kindly look at that tract?' He took it, and the first words that struck him were these, 'Reader, if you died to-night would you be in hell?' He fled from that race-course as if he were stricken by God's hand, or pursued by some evil spirit, and he continued running until he had got a distance of some miles from the race-course. He did not dare to go back, and he now stood in the presence of that assembly in Exeter Hall to acknowledge God's mercy as displayed in the distribution of tracts."

JESUS, THE JUDGE.

A Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is He which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead."—ACTS 10: 42.

The Judgment an Accessory Truth—The Gospel Message Incomplete without it —The Apostles Ploughed with this Doctrine—I. The Message—1. There is a Moral Government—2. There will be a Judgment—3. Judgment by the Man Christ Jesus—His Peculiar Fitness for the Office—4. This Judgment will Concern all Mankind—Its Characteristics—II. The Importance of the Message—Its Beneficial Influence—A Pleasure-seeking Lady and her Maid.

YOU will notice throughout this short address by Peter how very careful he is to speak not at all upon his own authority, but wholly upon the authority of the Most High. He commences his conversation by saying that God had shown him that it would be right for him, as a Jew, to commune with the Gentiles. God had shown it to him; he had not, therefore, broken through Jewish law as the result of his own judgment, but under divine direction.

He goes on to commence his sermon by saying, "The word which God sent unto the children of Israel." He had come, therefore, not with a word of his own inventing, but with a word of God's sending: "That word, I say, ye know." Then he speaks of Jesus of Nazareth Himself as anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power, and he speaks of himself and his fellow-apostles as "witnesses," bearing testimony to what the Lord Jesus had done.

Now, this way of speaking was, perhaps, rendered the more necessary by the mistaken reverence which Cornelius had rendered to his person, for he fell down at the apostle's feet and worshipped him; but it should be the constant habit of all the ministers of Christ. It is ours to keep within the bounds of our commission, and shield ourselves behind its authority.

The apostle was not long in his address before he came to the doctrine of the judgment of all men by Jesus Christ. He says that he was commanded to preach it, and therefore he did preach it. It may not be called "the Gospel," but it is certainly a most important accessory truth to the Gospel; it is one of those doctrines without which a Gospel ministry would not be complete. I mean that if in any testimony concerning Christ the doctrine that He shall come a second time to judge the world were utterly neglected such a testimony would not be a complete Gospel.

Hence you find that Paul, when he preached to the famous congregation of the Areopagites, took care to insist upon this truth. This was also a part of Paul's subject when he stood before Felix; "he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;" and this made Felix tremble, for there is great force of conviction in that solemn truth.

The doctrine of the judgment of the world by Christ was used by Peter and Paul and other apostles as a sort of preliminary truth which they insisted upon before they came to the essence of the Gospel, which consists in preaching Jesus Christ as a Saviour. They ploughed with this doctrine before they sowed the invitations of the Gospel. They did not, however, lay the axe to the root and then forget to proclaim the word of grace; they preached the terrors of the Lord, not in a legal, but a Gospel manner. Peter does so in this case; for first he speaks of Christ in the judgment, and then in verse forty-three he adds, "To Him give all the prophets witness, that through His name whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins."

This morning, in obedience to the same command, I shall try to speak first of all upon the message; and, secondly, upon the evident importance to be attached to it, which we shall, in a great measure, gather from the words of our text. May the Holy Ghost, who in Peter's day fell on all those who heard His word, fall also upon you as you are led to believe in the Lord Jesus!

I. First, let us consider

which God commands all His servants to declare. That message begins first with the assurance that there is a moral government. There is a judge over the race of men; we are not as the locusts, of whom Solomon says that they have no king. The world is not left unobserved of God, to be as a den of wild beasts, or a pond of fishes, wherein every one devoureth his fellow, and none calleth them to account. Men are not permitted to do whatsoever is right in their own eyes, but there is a law, and a Governor over them.

God hath committed at this day all authority unto the Son; and Jesus Christ at this moment reigneth and ruleth over the whole race of men, taking account of all the actions that are done in their bodies, and making note of every thing in order to the summing up of all things by and by. There is a law, there is a rule, there is a government, over the human commonwealth. The race is not left to anarchy; Jesus Christ is head of all.

That being announced, we have secondly to say that there will be a judgment. "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." As the result of there being a government over mankind, an assize will be held, wherein cases will be tried, and justice will be administered; this, indeed, is the sanction and support of the law, that it will call men to account; its voice of power proclaims, "O ye house of Israel, I will judge you every one after his ways." There will be a day of final account. I need not stop to quote the numerous passages of Scripture which assert that every one of us must give an account of himself before God, for we are fully persuaded that "we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ;" but, my brethren, we think that all reasonable persons will conclude that there must be a judgment, if they will only consider the character of God. Being the ruler of the world, He must do justice. We should count any man who was made a king but a miserable counterfeit of a monarch if he never administered justice at all.

"Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." "The Father who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's works" will not permit offenders to insult His laws with impunity. It is wrapped up in the very idea of God that He is Judge of all the earth, and must do right; and to do right He must hold a final court in which He will "render to every man according to his deeds."

The character of man equally involves a judgment, for he is evidently a responsible being, and this is clear to anybody who cares to open his eyes. We count not the cattle of the hills or the fish of the sea responsible, let them do what they may; no one blames the wolf that he ravens, or the lion that he devours, but when we come to think of man, we regard him as a creature whose actions have a moral quality about them, and are either right or wrong; in fact he is a responsible agent. Surely, where there is responsibility there is a law, and where there is a law there must, some day or other, be rewards for well-doers, and punishments for malefactors. The constitution and nature of man inevitably require this, or else his responsibility is given to him in vain.

THE PRESENT TANGLED CONDITION OF THE WORLD'S HISTORY

requires that there should be a day of rectification at the end of time. At this moment we often see the wicked prosper, while the righteous are abased: at this day the mirth and the jollity are often connected with sin, while sorrow and grief go hand in hand with godliness in many and many an instance. The judge of all the earth must do right, and how can this be but by a final adjustment in which it shall be clearly seen that though the righteous suffer for a while, it is but as the gold suffers in the furnace, that it may come forth purified.

Moreover, there is in the consciences of most, if not of all, men a testimony to a coming judgment. I will not say of all men, for I believe that some manage so to drug their self-consciousness as at last to quiet all their fear; but yet the most of men believe in a judgment to come, and in their more thoughtful moods are alarmed thereat.

How very seldom do you find a man die in stolid unbelief! At some time or other reason will speak and conscience will be heard, and then that "dread of something after death" makes men cling even to the most wretched state, choosing rather "to bear the ills they have than to fly to others that they know not of." Universal conscience, or almost universal conscience, speaks like a prophet within the soul, and tells of a throne of judgment, a heaven, and a hell.

Now, whether we had or had not this argument to support us would make not one jot of difference to those of us who believe in the Word of God. What God says would always be enough for us, even if the nature of things and the apparent force of reason should flatly contradict His word. Yes, I will even put it in that harsh way. We are always glad when we get the subordinate help of arguments fetched from the nature of things, and so forth; but we care very little about them; we have accepted the Bible as God's revelation, we believe the teaching of this book to be infallible, and inasmuch as the Scriptures declare that there is a judgment to come, we confidently look for it.

3. Now, according to the revelation of the Gospel, this judgment will be conducted by the man Christ Jesus. God will judge the world; but it will be through His Son, whom he has ordained and appointed actually to carry out the business of that last tremendous day. He who shall sit upon the throne is "the Son of man." He will be thus enthroned, I suppose, partly because it is involved in his mediatorial office, in which the Lord hath put all things in subjection under His feet.

God has been pleased to put the world, not under the direct government of personal deity, but under the government of the Mediator, that He might deal with us in mercy. That Mediator is both prophet, priest, and king, and His kingship would be shorn of its glory if the King had not the power of life and death, and the power of holding court and judging His subjects. Jesus Christ, therefore, being mediatorial king and sovereign, all power being given unto Him in heaven and in earth, He will take unto Himself His great power at the last, and will judge the nations.

This high position is also awarded to our Lord as

by which shall be wiped away every trace of the shame and dishonor through which He passed among the sons of men. The kings of the earth stood up to judge Him, but they shall stand before Him to be judged; the rulers took counsel together to condemn Him, but the rulers shall stand at His bar to be themselves condemned; Pontius Pilate and the chief priests shall all be there, and Cæsar, and all Cæsars and Czars and emperors and kings and princes shall do homage before Him in lowliest manner, by standing before His judgment-seat as prisoners to be tried by Him.

I want you especially to remember that in the Holy Scriptures we are perpetually reminded in reference to the judgment that it is a judgment by the man Christ Jesus. There must be special reason for this honor done to the manhood of our Lord, or it would not be so continually insisted upon. Daniel in his prophecy (ch. 7:13) says: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him." The coming one in His vision was "the Son of man," and we all know to whom that title belongs. Hence our Lord Himself very early in His ministry took care to claim for Himself this power of governance and judgment.

It is as Son of man as well as Son of God that our Lord will judge the world at the last great day. Be ye sure, then, of His impartiality. He is God, yet man, having an intense sympathy both with the King and with the subjects, having manifested His grace even to the rebellious, and being yet filled with intense love to the Father and His law. If we could have the election of a judge, what being could we suppose more impartial or so impartial as the Lord, who, though He counted it not robbery to be equal with God, yet made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of sinful flesh? O blessed Judge, be Thou at once enthroned by the choic of the whole creation!

This person is peculiarly suitable to be judg because He has a perfect knowledge of the law "Yea, Thy law is My delight," saith He. He pu on righteousness as a garment. The Lord Jesu Christ from His youth up was an exceedingl deep scholar of the law of God; He grew, a a child, in wisdom concerning the will of God His ear was opened to hear as the learnec that He might know how to speak a word i season to them that are weary.

He knows the law, for He made Himself sul ject to it and kept it in all its parts. This is tl first requisite in a judge, to be thoroughly we acquainted with the statute-book. Yet furthe He knows also the evil of law-breaking. Wh a Judge is this whom God hath appointed, wh strange to say, has Himself suffered for si With what precision, then, can He judge wh being both God and man, and knowing well t law, has also an intimate acquaintance with the heinousness and wickedness of law-brea ing! Well did the Father choose Him to be t judge of the quick and dead. It puts juc ment beyond a cavil when He who is the Frie of sinners is made the Judge of sinners.

Thus much, then, concerning the fact th there will be a judgment, and that this judgm will be conducted by the man Christ Jesus.

4. Now observe, that

THIS JUDGMENT WILL CONCERN ALL MANKI

He will judge the quick and dead; that those who will be alive at His coming He judge as well as those who have already di He may come before some of us shall die. time of His advent we cannot guess, but shall certainly appear before His judgment- whenever He shall fix the assize. The summ will exempt no man; from the utmost end the earth shall they come. None will be abl hide themselves in solitary places, or to shelter amongst the crowded cities.

It concerns you, my brother, as it does me concerns you, my sister, and your childre well as those who have gone before. As su as the Lord liveth, the things that are shall pass away, mountains and hills shall before Him, and rocks shall be melted at His presence; but His word shall never away; and behold He cometh, "Behold cometh with clouds, and every eye shal Him, and they also which pierced Him, an kindreds of the earth shall wail becaus Him."

Just a few words concerning this judg When He doth come, that judgment will very eminent one. It will be a judgment fix the peremptory ordinance of God, for the saith that He hath "ordained" Jesus to judge. It is by ordinance and decree that Christ will take the throne. He taketh no honor upon Himself on His own authority He claims the throne as one that was ord of God as was Aaron. In all His office quotes the divine decree, and for this, th of all, He hath the ordinance of God to judge of the quick and dead.

Every thing done will be by divine auth there will be the stamp and seal of the lasting God set upon every thing that sh transacted on that grand occasion. The trial will be most solemnly conducted. I not for a single moment attempt a descr of the scene. There is room, indeed, fo gery and poetry, but we have none of thes want them not this morning.

That judgment will be very searching, for the ostle Paul tells us in 2 Corinthians 5 10, that shall give an account for the deeds done in e body, each one according to that he hath ne, whether it be good or whether it be bad ; d our Saviour, in Matthew 12 : 36, informs us at for every idle word that man shall speak he ist give account in the day of judgment ; rds, therefore; will be put in evidence as well actions. Such things as were never known by r fellow-creatures, and were forgotten by ourves, shall be revealed and judged. Imaginans, lustings, and desires of the soul, secret oughts and passions, and murmurings, shall be d open before all men, and before God shall a koning be made.

That judgment will be of a very exact kind. will proceed upon evidence and documentary timony, and slander and hearsay will not be ntioned there. No condemnation will come on good men through the whisperings of maious tongues, but every thing shall be gone out in due order and according to the rules of court of heaven. The judgment will be done record, and solemn affidavit, in that great urt of King's Bench. There will be no hurry, passing over judgment with a light hand, but will be done in truth, and equity, and accordg to facts recorded by the infallible omniscience God.

The sentences which will then be pronounced l be so just as to be indisputable, and even the ndemned will own the justness thereof. At last great day not one of the condemned shall able to deny his guilt, nor the justice of the ntence. Though sent to hell, he will feel it is at he deserves.

Oh, what a judgment-day will that be in which ry one shall be certain, even in his own sad e, that the verdict of the Judge is bright as sun with righteousness, and cannot be apaled against ! This, surely, will be the hell of l, that it is deserved even in its utmost pang bitterest pain. O my hearers ! will any of have to say "Amen" to your own condemtion ? I pray the Lord to save you from such ate.

AT VERDICT WILL BE FINAL AND IRREVERSIBLE.

When Jesus has once pronounced it, there will no appeal, no suing out of a writ of error, no ersal of the decree. He himself hath said it : These shall go away into everlasting punishnt : but the righteous into life eternal." ere will be no delay in execution, nor escape m the doom. There will be no steeling of the art to endure it, and no outliving the doom. will last on in all its terror—the final verdict the Judge of all the earth, pronounced by the rist of love. I know not how to speak upon h a theme as this, but must leave it as it nds before you. May the Holy Ghost imess it upon your minds.

II. I desire, in the second place, to call your ention for a little while to

THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS MESSAGE.

It's importance may be gathered from the t, because it says, "He commanded us to each this." Did the eternal God give a comnd for us to preach this truth ? Then He must ow in this infinite wisdom that there is a great essity for its being declared. Whether ye beve it or not, He cometh ; whether ye trifle with or not, whether ye are rebels or loyal subjects, cometh, and that speedily. He cometh to lge the world in righteousness and the people equity. Thus we make solemn proclamation His name, declaring to you a fact which ye well to hear with serious hearts and thoughtminds.

Now, brethren, there is importance in this, not ly according to the text, but from other sons. If you think awhile you will see that heds a great light upon the future of the undly. Whatever you, my brother, choose to of the wrath of God which is revealed conning the impenitent, please think of this. It y be, you feel troubled about its dread severity eternity ; but let this ease your perplexity, that the Judge upon whom the sentence depends is Jesus Christ, the Saviour of men. I feel perfectly safe in leaving the future of the wicked in such hands as His ; and however terrible may be His own words, and they are terrible to the last degree, about the future of the lost, I for one can never quarrel with Him.

If it were Moses that spoke, if he spoke for God, I dare not challenge him, yet might there be the temptation ; but when He speaks who is the Son of Man, let all the earth keep silence before Him. The severity which He exercises must be inevitable severity ; be ye sure of that. If there be pain, and anguish, and wrath to every soul of man that doeth evil, then, since it is the Christ who will pronounce it, it will be because it must be, and cannot be helped, but must be so in the nature of things. Therefore we bow before the dreadful doctrine of Scripture, and, instead of trying to quiet men in their sins, we know the terrors of the Lord, and we beseech them in Christ's stead that they be reconciled to God.

"Ye sinners, seek His face,
Whose wrath ye cannot bear ;
Fly to the shelter of His cross,
And find salvation there."

Fly into the clefts of that rock which otherwise will grind you to powder when it falls upon you.

I close by noticing that the importance of this doctrine is very great, if we recollect its beneficial effect upon our everyday life. I constantly hear silly people, wicked persons, say, "Tell the people about something that has to do with today, about cleanliness and honesty, and all that." As if we did not do that, and as if we were not the first to exhort men to fulfil all manner of social duties. Do we not bid them think on whatsoever things are pure, honest, temperate, and of good repute ? But if I want men to live righteously, soberly, and honestly, I know of no motive that can have greater weight with them than this of a judgment to come. Take that away from us, what have we to urge upon the sons of men at all ? If they are to die like brutes, they will live like brutes. If there be no hereafter, they do well to say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." If God will judge men at the last, it behoves men to see how they live to-day.

Another special benefit of this truth is its convincing and awakening power. Men tremble when they hear of judgment to come, and they are led to cry, "What must we do to be saved ?" Men begin to confess their sin when they are told that the law by which they will be judged is spiritual, and reaches even to the thoughts and intents of the heart. This is the plough which makes furrows for the good seed ; this is the surgeon's knife which prepares for the reception of the healing balm.

And O my brothers and sisters, you all know how quickening this doctrine is to Christians. We do not fear the day of judgment ; we do not dread the thought of standing before our Lord Jesus, because we have a plea which we know will answer every purpose. Our plea is this : we have been tried, condemned, and punished already. Thou Judge of all, Thou knowest when we were tried, and judged, and condemned ! Lo, in thy hands the nail-prints which are the witnesses that Thou didst bear our sins in Thine own body on the tree. Lo, at Thy side Thou wearest the ruby gem which tells how thine own heart made expiation for the guilt of all that trust in thee.

We are not afraid, for there is no judgment for him who is judged already, no punishment for him who is punished already in a Substitute whom God has accepted. Yet this expectation of judgment quickens us to holy duty ; we feel that since the Master comes we would be as men that look for their Lord, and stand with our loins girded, doing service, expecting to hear His footstep at any moment.

"O watch and pray ! the Judge is at the door,
Before His flaming bar thou soon must stand ;
O watch ! and keep thy garments spotless pure,
And thou shalt then be found at His right hand."

a gentlewoman had been spending an afternoon at cards, and the evening at a ball, and such-like amusements : she came home very late, and found that her maid-servant, who was sitting up waiting for her, was reading a book. "Ah !" said she, "are you still poring over your dull books ? They make you moping and melancholy." The lady retired to her chamber, but she slept not. In the night she was troubled, and fell a-weeping. Sleep forsook her. She tossed to and fro ; and at length she called her maid. She said, "Madam, what ails you ? I thought I left you very merry and well." "Oh," said she, "but I looked over your book, and I only saw one word, but that word stings me : I cannot sleep ; I cannot bear it." "What word was it, madam ?" "It was that word 'ETERNITY.' Oh, maid," said she, "it is very well for me to sport and play, and waste my time as I have done, but oh, eternity, eternity, eternity ! How can I face eternity ?" And so that night was turned to weeping and to prayer.

I could wish the like might happen now to many of you. The Judge is at the door. Jesus comes to judge you : will you have Him now to be your Saviour ? If not, His coming will cause you to weep and wail, and that throughout eternity. Remember that word—ETERNITY. God bless you all. Amen.

BREAKFAST MEETING OF THE Y. M. C. A. IN LONDON.

A BREAKFAST meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association was held at Aldersgate Street, London, at 6 A.M., on May 13th, when the Rev. W. J. Mayers, of Bristol, gave an address, and said he was reminded of a memorable breakfast meeting on the shores of the beautiful lake. The disciples had been toiling all the night, but had got nothing, and when the morning came, there was Jesus on the shore, and He invited them to come and breakfast. And they had an after-meeting, and the Master said, in loving, tender words, "Feed My lambs ; feed My sheep." So this morning our Master's voice bids us go forth to duty. An old tradition says that on May-day the maidens used to go out early in the morning to bathe their faces in the dew, that they might become beautiful forever. There is a dew of the Holy Spirit which comes not on May mornings only, but every morning, and if we bathe our hearts in it, it will help us right through the day.

Chevalier Van de Welde, from Holland, said he was introduced to the Y. M. C. Association more than twenty-nine years ago by an officer, Mr. Dampier, one of the members on board ship coming from the Cape of Good Hope, who afterwards introduced him to Mr. George Williams, who was now on the platform. It was the gentleness of young Mr. Dampier on board that ship that captivated his heart. A short time previously he (the Chevalier) was travelling in Ceylon, and was led to deep conviction on account of sin by a missionary ; but he did not fully find Christ until he met that young officer, only nineteen years of age, and the gentleness with which he treated his soldiers, and stood the sneers of some of those around him, made a deep impression on his mind

Mr. Woods, of Massachusetts, then remarked that in America there was a wonderful bridge ; it cost treasure, and labor, and life to sink the foundation ninety feet below ; the abutments were fixed, the arches laid over, and now there were laid railway tracks, tramway lines, carriage paths, and foot-paths along which humanity was continually travelling So the bridge of salvation through Christ has been founded in England and America at the cost of much labor and life ; but it now spans the ocean, and its keystone is in heaven. Some people say they can do nothing for Christ ; that the work is too great ; but the ocean is made up of drops, and the world of atoms. We must cultivate a warm, loving heart and a cordial hand, and going forth thus God will help us to,

THE MAY MEETINGS IN LONDON.

Church Missionary Society.

Its 185 Stations and 400 Clergymen, etc.—Converted Kings — 11,000 Heathen in Tinnevelly Christianized last Year — Bishop Thorold on True Ambition—Driving Bats out of a Temple —Ice Breaking-up—Canon Hoare on the Superior Liberality of the Poor—Bishop of Rupert's Land on his Mission Work—An Indian Giving a Fourth of his Income—Fervor of Native Christians—Rev. Buckley Wood on Polygamy and Slavery in West Africa.

THE eightieth Anniversary Meeting of this Society was held on May 6th in Exeter Hall, London. The chair was taken by the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Chichester, the president of the Society, supported by several bishops and a number of clergymen.

This Society carries on missionary operations chiefly in Africa and India, and also to a little extent in China and Japan. It has 185 mission stations, 204 European clerical missionaries and 200 native clerical missionaries, 61 European lay agents and 2736 native lay agents, catechists, teachers, etc., and 27,488 communicants in its various congregations.

No station supplies more grounds for thanksgiving to God than that on the banks of the river Niger, in West Africa. In no country are the abominations of heathenism more hideous and more rampant. But the progress made has been great. King Okiya, now a zealous supporter of the mission, has erected a temporary church at the capital, Nembe, where, in the absence of any paid agent of the mission, the service is conducted by four young converts of the king's retinue, educated at the Mission School in the old station, while the singing is led by one of Okiya's daughters.

In East Africa upwards of 600 natives are under regular Christian instruction, of whom 64 are communicants. A letter has been received at Freretown from Mandara, King of Chagga, who offers to place himself and all his people under the instruction of the missionaries.

Palestine now has eight missionaries, and four native clergymen of the Society. The English occupation of Cyprus, and the relations now established between the English and Ottoman Governments, are regarded, both by American and by British missionaries, as likely to prove favorable to evangelistic effort.

In South India the most conspicuous event of last year has been the large accession from heathenism in the Tinnevelly districts. Eleven thousand heathen have applied to Bishop Sargent, or to the native clergymen whom he superintends, for instruction with a view to admission into the visible Church of Christ. Several hundreds have already received baptism. The Native Church also, no longer, as in former days, depending on a large staff of resident European missionaries, has been enabled to come nobly forward in meeting the emergency. Three hundred and ninety unpaid labourers, some of them women, from a community of less than 40,000 baptized persons, have voluntarily come forward to labor among their inquiring and still heathen countrymen.

TRUE AMBITION.

The BISHOP OF ROCHESTER (Dr. Thorold), in the course of an able speech, said: "Our Committee, that body of grave elderly men who sit in a somewhat dull room in Salisbury Square, have in their hands the affairs of a Society which penetrates into every part of the globe; a Society which is engaged in the very noblest, the most glorious work any man can do—sending news of the redeeming love of Jesus Christ to the world for which He died. We are ambitious and aggressive; and it is our duty and life. There is a sort of ambition which is sinful, and a sort of aggressiveness which is sinful too. But ours is an ambition for our King, 'to make the kingdoms of this world the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ.' And as to fighting, we cannot help ourselves. Gibbon, in his 'Decline and Fall of Rome,' speaks of a time when Christianity was offered a place in the Roman Pantheon, among all the other religions of the world, and there invited to keep itself quiet and be civil to its neighbors. But the Christian religion declined to do any thing of the kind; and from that time until now Christianity has more or less been an aggressive and restless agency, and we are here together to-day because we feel that it is true to nature, and must be, in fighting its battle, and in winning the cause of Christ.

DRIVING BATS OUT OF A NUBIAN TEMPLE.

"I remember many years ago visiting a great temple in Nubia, where the sculptures of Osiris, who was coeval with Joshua, look down with a sort of sad majesty on the rushing Nile. As we entered one of the smaller chambers, the light flashed in, and out flew the bats. That incident illustrates what we have to do by means of education. We have to drive the bats, so to speak, out of the human mind, and make the place a home for the Lord of light and glory. That is what Christian education does. We have great extremes to deal with in this work of ours. We have to deal with brutalized masses of humanity. We have got almost to create mind and character. We have certainly to create a vocabulary for them; we have to make new words that they may understand the great facts and ideas of our Divine religion, which otherwise would be unintelligible to them.

"God is working by His Word, and by many, so to speak, subterranean agencies. What may seem to us difficult and slow, we shall find accomplished presently, just as the ice breaks up in Russia, on the river Neva. In the evening, it is one hard, smooth mass; carriages and coaches go over it. In the morning a great noise is heard, and the ice is halfway to the Baltic. God has His ways and His times; and let us trust Him."

MISSIONS IN RUPERT'S LAND, AMERICA.

The BISHOP OF RUPERT'S LAND said, among other remarks: "I have now in the young province of Manitoba a most complete system of higher educational institutions, a theological college, a college for preparing students for the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the new University of Manitoba, a grammar school for boys, and a school for the education of young ladies of the country. In all these efforts I have obtained the full sympathy of the Society, and I have been enabled to carry out my plans mainly by the help of its funds.

"The operations of this Society in Rupert's Land began a little over fifty years ago. The work of a missionary in that country has been very difficult. The country is huge and a wilderness, and until lately it was separated from civilization, and from comforts and conveniences.

It has a small scattered population of some 60,000 Indians. Each missionary's district in that country is generally nearly as large as the whole of England, and perhaps there are only from 300 to 1200 Indians scattered throughout it. Well, these for the most part of the year are in single families in their hunting-grounds. There are now four dioceses in Rupert's Land. The diocese of Moosonee, in the northern part of the country, is now happily under the charge of the most experienced missionary of the Society, Bishop Horden, a man peculiarly gifted for his work by his great linguistic power and other practical abilities.

PIETY OF NATIVE CHRISTIANS.

"His diocese is now largely Christian, and, looking to the experience of the past, we may expect that in a few years heathenism will be extinct. These Christians are not merely nominal Christians and Christians by baptism, but the truth of their Christianity has been evidenced in many cases by holy lives and peaceful deaths. These Christians are intelligent Christians, and are generally able to write their own language in what is called the syllabic character, and to answer accurately questions on the leading facts of the Bible and the chief truths of the Gospel. I believe a large proportion of the grown-up Christians in the diocese of Moosonee are able to read the Bible and the Prayer Book in their own language. These humble Christians might put to shame many a family of good position in this land of privilege. It is a common custom among these Indians to have family worship, and when they go on any expedition in a boat they will have their morning and evening devotions. Moreover, they contribute very liberally to the support of the Mission.

AN INDIAN GIVING A FOURTH PART OF HIS INCOME.

"At Easter one Indian gave the most valuable fur he had obtained in his year's hunting. It was worth about one fourth or one fifth of the whole of the man's year's earnings. The archdeacon was unwilling to receive it, but the Indian said he could not take it back, as he had given it to God, and he was anxious that the Indians of the neighboring districts should have the privileges enjoyed by him and his.

ONE MISSIONARY'S LABORS—STANLEY INDIANS.

"In the diocese of Athabasca, in the Northwest, an experienced missionary of this Society displays most self-denying zeal and untiring energy in travelling thousands of miles on foot, in canoes and in dog-sledges, denying himself for the work's sake the comforts of a settled home. That, however, is nothing new in his life. He spent the greater part of one winter as the guest of the Esquimaux in their snow-huts. The Indians in that diocese are also being largely Christianized.

"I pass next to the diocese of Saskatchewan which is under the care of Bishop Maclean. In it there is the mission of Stanley on the English River. That is a field nearly as large as England. It is nearly all Christianized. What d the Christian Indians of Stanley do? Two o three times in the year they come from all part of that large district up to Stanley, and as Stanley is a place where provisions cannot be easil obtained by hunting and fishing, they have t lay up provisions beforehand. So they sta there for ten days or for three or four weeks, a cording as their provisions will last. They d this simply in order that from day to day the may receive during that period religious instru tion from the missionaries, and have the enjo ment of religious ordinances."

POLYGAMY AND SLAVERY IN AFRICA.

The Rev. BUCKLEY WOOD, missionary fro West Africa, said: "On the African we coast, where it has been my lot to labor, t great mass of the people are either idolaters Mohammedans. Their idolatry is of the lowe possible kind. Thunder, lightning, rivers, a mals, any thing that is out of the ordinary cour such as a tree with two branches when it oug to have only one, their own heads, evil spiri and especially the devil, are all objects of w ship to these people. If we wish to know th moral condition, we have only to read the fi chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. One their customs is polygamy. Some persons do whether the Society is right in requiring t polygamy should not be tolerated by their m sionaries.

"But no one who knows polygamy in Af will ever doubt that the Society is perfectly ri in not for an hour allowing such an abomin system to exist. (Cheers.) In Africa the r of slavery are found in polygamy. You fin man with his five, ten, fifteen, or twenty wi who are mere slaves of the man, although it be that they are regarded as free. You go t and you see the different families of child but they, like the wives, are often the bi vals of one another. There are strifes and b erings existing among the wives, and t strifes and bickerings are inherited by the dren; consequently the children grow up wit seeds of strife in their hearts, and instead of which we understand by home life in Eng there exists the very contrary of it out t When those seeds have been developed w them go forth as slave-hunters to catch wiv themselves, thus keeping up the system, v probably had its origin in polygamy.

THE PROPHETIC CHART OF TIME.

By Mr. S. A. Blackwood.

Many shall Search—The Seals Broken in the Last Days—The former Chronological Periods—The Signs are Written fo[illegible]s—Some of them in Cipher—The 1260 D[illegible]he Fourth Empire under its Eigh[illegible] Sabbath-keeping Era—[illegible]unishment—The General ublished at 63 Bible Political Signs.

[illegible] late years men have begun to search earnestly into the inspired Chart of Time, to ascertain, if possible, the landmarks which may denote the drawing nigh of the "day of God." This is a striking sign, for it is especially implied that though the prophetic book was to be "shut up and sealed to the time of the end," yet that at that time "many shall search therein, and the knowledge thereof shall be increased" (Daniel 12 : 4).*

Daniel was told to "shut up the vision, for it shall be for many days" (chap. 8 : 26), and to seal it up till "the time of the end," implying that it was not to be revealed till its understanding became necessary as the time drew near.

The Revelation, or unfolding of the hidden mystery, is contained in the last book of the Bible, where the book has its seals broken, and its contents published. Why? Because, as St. John said, "it is the last time." And now that the "last days" of that "last time" have begun to dawn, many are searching through the page of the prophetic Word, and the understanding of it is largely increasing. Is not this a sign of the times?

Do we not read that, "as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man"? And how was it then? The world was living without God. Busy in its everyday cares and pleasures, its building, and buying, and eating, and marrying,—ignorant of coming evil, though continually warned,—content to get on without God (see the description of those days in Job 21), and anxious to banish Him from their thoughts while they enjoyed His gifts,—the earth filled with violence and unbelief. Is not all this the case now?

Thus, I think, the observant eyes of those who stand upon their watch-tower to watch, who can from the elevation of God's Word, and therefore from His standpoint, look upon the scene around them, whether in church or world, can discern many and many a symptom of the deepening darkness which is to settle down upon the world; and at the same time many a dawning ray of brightness of that day-spring from on high, for whose rising they watch "more than they that watch for the morning."

FORMER CHRONOLOGICAL PERIODS.

We must not disregard the chronological evidences of the closing in of this dispensation which God has caused to be written for our learning. If they form part of God's written Word, we shall only do well to take heed to them. God has on various occasions, in past dispensations, foretold to His servants the periods and dates of the events that specially concerned them; and attention to those prophecies was most needful for them.

To Noah it was foretold that, after one hundred and twenty years, the deluge was to come. He gave heed, and built the ark. Then, again, he was told that "yet seven days" and the rain should commence, and he entered into the ark.

Four hundred years was the period which God specified to Abraham as the duration of the sojourn of his seed in Egypt; and "when the time of the promise drew nigh, the people grew and multiplied," and into Moses's heart the thoughts of deliverance began to enter.

Seventy years were to be accomplished in the desolations of Jerusalem; and when "Daniel understood the number of years by books," he set his face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer that He would cause His face to shine upon His sanctuary, which was desolate.

Seventy weeks, or sevens of years, were then shown to him as intervening between the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem and the coming of the Messiah. And it was, no doubt, in dependence upon this prophecy that Simeon and Anna "waited for the consolation of Israel," and that many in Jerusalem "looked for redemption."

If God has thus encouraged the hopes and strengthened the faith of His servants in past dispensations, it is not unreasonable to suppose that He has done so in the present. I believe that He has, and that chronological signs have been written down for our learning. We must not disregard them. We may not all agree in our interpretations—it is not probable that we shall entirely—but it is surely our duty to give heed and seek to understand.

Some of these signs are written in cipher—in enigmatical characters. But that is no reason for neglecting them. In days of old there were those who "had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do;" and Job's question is still a deeply important one, "Why, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know Him not see His days?"

THE 1260 YEARS.

The most prominent of these chronological periods is that of the 1260 years, symbolized in the Revelation as 1260 days and 42 months, and in Daniel by the three and a half times, each the equivalent of the other. During this period the fourth great empire, under its last and eighth head, was predicted to rule the kingdoms of Christendom, and persecute the people of God. There is but little diversity of opinion with regard to Rome Papal being thus designated, or with regard to the general epoch when this period commenced.

The assumption of dominant power by the Roman See dates from the opening of the seventh century, when the Emperor Phocas constituted the Bishop of Rome universal bishop, and 1260 years from that date bring us to the present epoch. There is probably, however, some indistinctness as to the moment when, in the sight of God, this prophetic period actually commenced, and therefore an equal indistinctness as to its precise termination; and, doubtless, this has been intentional, in order that the people of God might be kept in a watchful frame of expectation, like "servants that wait for their Lord."

But there is a growing belief that we are on the very verge of its close; and it impossible to view the position which Rome has of late occupied without noticing that the nations of Christendom are weary of her sway, and that the ruling powers, into whose heart God has put it to yield their kingdom to her "until the words of God shall be fulfilled," are now beginning to despoil her and to cast off her yoke (Rev. 17 : 16–18).

THE 6000 YEARS.

Then, again, it is generally believed that the six thousand years of this world's history are on the point of termination, and that the seventh thousand will be the "Sabbath-keeping" of the people of God (Heb. 4 : 9, margin). This is no new idea. Jewish rabbis before our Lord's coming, and early Christians after it, alike held this belief; and if "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years" (2 Peter 3 : 8), and the time of rest is the Sabbath or seventh day, we seem not to be without some indication in Scripture that this supposition may be correct. Not long ago our Christian poet Cowper wrote:

> "Foretold by prophets, and by poets sung,
> Whose fire was kindled at the prophets' lamp,
> The time of rest, the promised Sabbath, comes:
> Six thousand years of sorrow have wellnigh
> Fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course
> Over a sinful world."

And if the latest and most received chronology be correct, these six thousand years have indeed almost fulfilled their course, and we may be on the point of being able to say, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

THE 2520 YEARS.

Lastly, it is believed by many that the "seven times" of punishment of the Jews, predicted in Lev. 26 : 18, 24, 28, are on the point of completion. Taking a "time" as a year of 360 days, this period, in the year-day fulfilment, amounts to 2520 years; and dating their commencement from the time when God pronounced the doom of Jerusalem in the reign of Manasseh (2 Kings 21 : 12–15), and gave the nation to the Assyrians (2 Chron. 33 : 11), they will terminate about the present epoch.

There are other prophetic periods predicted. But these are enough, I think, to stir up the hopes of the waiting people of the Lord. If the 1260 years of the great apostasy, the 6000 years of the present dispensation, and the 2520 years of Israel's rejection, are all converging to a common point, we may well begin to lift up our heads, and to hope that our redemption draweth nigh.

THE POLITICAL SIGNS OF THE END

are also striking.

The development of constitutional government, foretold by Daniel as to happen in the latter days of the fourth great empire (the Roman), when the iron or monarchical power of the ten kingdoms would be mixed with the miry clay, or with the seed of men, the popular power (Dan. 2 : 42, 43), is a prominent feature of the present day. It receives a notable exemplification in the manner in which the despotic house of Austria, and the monarchical nation of Spain, have lately adopted constitutional forms of government. It is "in the days of these kings" (the ten clay-iron kings of the Roman Empire) that "the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed" (Dan. 2 : 44).

The wasting away of the Turkish power, symbolized, as many believe, by the drying up of the Euphrates (the irruption of the Turkish power, which originated at the Euphrates, being clearly thus designated in Rev. 9 : 14–21,* in Rev. 16 : 12, is an event happening under our very eyes.

The political emancipation of the Jews in almost every European state, their exaltation in so many cases to power and position, and the influence which by their wealth they exert upon the politics of the day, may also show that the period of their national degradation is approaching its termination, and that they are being prepared to enact the great part they are destined to take in the last days, when, being brought to acknowledge the crucified Jesus as "King of the Jews," they shall become the missionaries of the nations, and when "the receiving of them" shall be "life from the dead" to the "world."

The signs I have dwelt upon are numerous, and to my mind, and the minds of many, most striking. Moral, chronological, and political, they combine to send forth the cry, "THE LORD IS AT HAND." Singly we might not consider them of importance. It is not one swallow that makes summer, nor one falling leaf autumn; and there may have been times when one or another of these signs has been manifested with more or less distinctness. But there never has been a time when, as at the present, the have all been manifested together.

It is this which to me gives to their appearance such significance and weight. Surely it is not without meaning. Surely it is a warning, encouraging voice to God's children, repeating, in clearer and still clearer accents, "Behold, I come quickly;" "Surely I come quickly." May "the Lord direct our hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ" (2 Thess. 3 : 5). And "seeing that [we] look for such things, [may we] be diligent that [we] may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless" (2 Peter 3 : 14).

---

* The following interpretations of this verse are advanced in support of the above:

"Thus many will come across it, and get much understanding."—Luther's Bible.

"Seal the book to the time of the end, until many are taught, and knowledge is increased."—Septuagint.

"Many will run through it, and then the knowledge will be increased."—De Wette.

The Italian of Diodati, corrected by Guiccardini, and the French of Ostervald both give the same meaning.

* Compare the use of a river as a symbol of the Assyrian power (Isa. 8 : 7, 8).

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

AN OLD MAN'S FOREBODINGS.

"Poor dear child!" sighed Mrs. Gibbs, the farmer's wife, "when she heard Effie Campbell going to service she will find service a very different thing from such a life as she has led in her father's home. Effie will soon know plenty of this world's hardships, as well as its sorrows."

Sorrow Effie certainly knew, for hers was a loving, clinging nature, and she grieved sorely for the loss of her doting parents; but hardship seemed farther off than ever when she entered the service of Lady Ethel. The favorite of the village when taken to a grand mansion in London remained a favorite still. Even the cross old housekeeper liked her, and her mistress thought her a treasure.

"It is quite a pleasure to have such a bright little maid as Effie about one," observed Lady Ethel to her friends.

"It is quite a pleasure to do any thing for so kind a mistress as mine," was the frequent thought of Effie, as she plaited her lady's long hair, or skilfully trimmed her dresses.

Again Effie's life became happy, and if she left her place after a twelvemonth's stay, it was but in the hope of making that life even more happy still. Effie only quitted the service of Lady Ethel in order to go back to Ashley, her native village, there to be married to one who had called her his pet from her childhood. Lady Ethel was sorry to lose her favorite maid, and gave a handsome wedding dress as a parting present to Effie.

Willie Campbell, who was about to emigrate to New Zealand, delayed his departure on purpose that his sister Effie might be married from his house. Willie's wife, with all her own packing work before her, was ready to sew from morning till night to make an outfit for Effie. From half the cottages in the village came little presents, which Effie received with such a smiling grace that all her friends felt pleasure in giving. Every one said that Robert was "a lucky fellow," and Effie herself secretly thought that he was not at all to be pitied.

Even the hard features of Alec softened at the kindly welcome given to him by his winsome niece, when he entered the cottage of her brother, in which he found her alone. Effie was very busy in giving the finishing touches to the dress which she was to wear at her wedding. The quiet gray silk given by Lady Ethel had been flounced and frilled by the nimble fingers of Effie, and "brightened up," as she said, with gay pink fluting and quilling, till it looked altogether unsuited for the wear of a farmer's wife.

There was a bonnet of the latest fashion upon the table; it was adorned with artificial flowers, and a dashing feather besides. Effie was very eager over her work, but the moment that she caught sight of her uncle, up she sprang with an exclamation of pleasure; and when her arms were round Alec's neck, and he heard her kindly welcome, the poor man's heart, half frozen by trouble, warmed towards his young niece. Alec remembered his own children, and said to himself, "Had my little Amy been spared to me, she might have been just such a girl as Effie."

It is possible that Effie's reception of her uncle may have been all the more warm from the fact that he carried in his hand a brown paper parcel. Effie had not a particularly covetous disposition, yet it must be owned that at this time she looked with curiosity and interest at all the parcels that entered her brother's cottage. Effie had been given many presents, but one article of dress which she fancied above all others she had not yet received, and that was a nice silk shawl. Effie had indeed a jacket, a cloak, and a scarf, but no shawl had yet made its appearance. Effie, who had much of the spoilt child in her disposition, cherished a little superstition that whatever she wished for she was sure at last to obtain.

"I think that a fairy must have given me a wishing-cap," Effie would laughingly say; "it happens so often that I get the very thing which I fancy!" Effie forgot that she usually took a very simple and natural way of bringing the matter to pass.

Now, the moment that Effie's eyes fell on the brown paper parcel (a neat long-square one, and rather flat, just such as might come from a haberdasher's shop), "There is my silk shawl," said Effie to herself; "I hope that the color may suit me!"

Alec was in no hurry to present his gift, whatever it might be. He set the parcel down on the table, right over the long strings of the bonnet, and then seated himself, looking with a very doubtful expression, and a little shake of the head, at the fine flounced dress which his niece was preparing.

"Is it not pretty?" asked Effie, shaking out the folds, and holding up the dress to the light.

"Humph!" grunted the uncle, "your finery reminds me of a saying which I heard long ago. There are three things which a woman ought and yet ought not to be like. She ought to be like a church-clock, always keep time, but not like a church-clock, be heard all over the town. She should be like an echo, speak when she is spoken to, but not like an echo, always have the last word. She should be like a snail, keep in her house, but not like a snail," Alec pointed to the dress as he added, "carry all her fortune on her back."

Effie laughed; her laugh was such a merry one that few could hear without joining in it, and it brought a smile even to the grave wrinkled face of her uncle. "I wonder what Robert would say to your comparing me to a clock or a snail," she cried with a burst of merriment, "I look so unlike the one or the other! As for carrying my fortune on my back," added Effie more quietly, "I never mean to do that. I've spent next to nothing on this dress. Lady Ethel gave me the silk, and I've made it all up myself."

"Lady Ethel had better have given you a side of bacon and a good Gloucester cheese," observed practical Alec.

"Oh, dear, no, we shall have plenty of bacon and cheese of our own,—I hope that you'll often come and share them," said Effie. "Have you not heard, dear uncle, that Robert has taken Cross' farm?"

"I have heard it, and I want you to explain how Robert Holland has managed to take it," said Alec, resting his two long hairy hands on his knees, and looking like one who means to come to business. "When you went to service, Effie, Robert worked for Farmer Gibbs, and had no means of getting a place of his own. Has any one left him money? If not, I cannot see how he can buy Cross' farm."

"No one has left Robert money, and he has not bought an acre of land," replied Effie, taking up her work, and proceeding to thread her needle. "Robert has saved a little, and I have a little of my own, just enough to start us, as you know. As for the farm, we have that by an arrangement which Robert has made with Mrs. Cross."

"You have it on lease," I suppose.

"Not exactly on lease," answered Effie, pausing in her sewing; "I'll tell you all about the arrangement. Poor dear Mrs. Cross can't manage a farm herself; very few women could do so, therefore she makes it over to my——to Robert, I mean."

"With all the stock on it," asked Alec,—"the horses, cows, and sheep?"

"Pigs, poultry, ploughs, harrows, and all that sort of thing," replied the smiling Effie, speaking fast to display her knowledge of agricultural matters.

"Humph! and what does Cross' widow expect in return?" asked Stewart.

"Robert is to give Mrs. Cross ten pounds a quarter; he has paid the first quarter in advance, all out of his savings put in the post-office bank," replied Effie, with great satisfaction.

"He's a sensible fellow to put money there instead of swallowing it down his throat in the shape of gin," observed Alec.

"Oh! Robert has his own reasons for saving," said Effie, smilin[illegible]nd blushing, as she again ran her needle [illegible] quilling.

"But I can't suppo[illegible]ross' widow made so bad a bargain as to [illegible] have her far[illegible] (though it is but a s[illegible] his upon it, for a matter [illegible] She's not the woman to [illegible]" observed Alec. "Did Jemima Cross [illegible] other conditions?"

"Oh! of course she did," replied Effie. "Mrs. Cross does not wish to leave the farm, though she gives it up to Robert. We are to lodge and board her and her little nephew; there is plenty of room in the house for us all."

"Wheugh!" whistled Alec Stewart, and again he shook his grizzled head, "two mistresses in one house! 'twill soon be too hot to hold either."

"Not two mistresses," said Effie, looking a little playfully pert; "the farm will belong to Robert, and of course his wife will be the only mistress. Mrs. Cross says that she will just consider herself as our guest, and meddle with nothing, unless I should wish her to show me how to manage the poultry. It will be such a nice, such an economical arrangement," continued Effie, "indeed, we could have had the farm on no other, for Robert and I have but little money between us. It will cost us nothing to lodge Mrs. Cross, and scarcely any thing to feed her, for a dish for two holds enough for three, and a child of four years old eats next to nothing."

"I never heard that before," observed Alec dryly, "and I've a notion that children don't stick to the age of four; the boy will grow, and his appetite too."

"I hope that they may," said Effie, with cheerful good-humor; "we shall stint neither Fred nor his aunt, but try to make them both happy. I so like to make all happy around me!"

"And suppose," suggested old Alec, "tha this arrangement does not work well, suppos that Robert can't manage to pay his ten pound a quarter, or that you can't get on with th widow?"

"You need not suppose such things; Rober will make plenty of money, and as for me, I g on well with everybody," said the pet of th village.

"But just suppose," persisted Alec, "tha for once matters should go wrong, that cro should take to withering, or cattle to dying, an so that money should not be forthcoming. [illegible] suppose that you and the widow should n agree."

"Then the engagement would end," repli Effie, "and Robert would, at a quarter's notic have to give up the farm."

"And become a day-laborer again," sa Alec; "and you would carry your fine frippe into some two-roomed cottage."

"Uncle, I do not know why you should try frighten me with such notions," said Effie, tr ing to keep her good-humor, yet coloring wi vexation. "The arrangement is not in the le likely to come to an end, for it suits all parti so nicely. Mrs. Cross will have a pleasant ho for herself and her little nephew, she will n have to leave the house in which she has liv so long. Robert gets a good start in the wor and on easy terms, and as for me, wherever is, there I am sure to be happy."

Alec once more gave his peculiar grunt, expressive of doubt, and then asked his ni whether she knew Jemima Cross very well.

"Very well," replied Effie, lightly; "that to say, I have seen her at least half a do times, and we've had nice quiet chats togeth Mrs. Cross is the pleasantest woman that eve met with, not in the least proud, and so v obliging! She did not even make the slight objection to our changing the name of the fa 'Cross' Farm,' that sounded so vulgar; besi it is Cross' farm no longer."

"And what name will Robert give to place?" inquired Alec.

The late LORD LAWRENCE, the Christian Governor-General of India.

LORD LAWRENCE.

His Birth on March 4th, 1811, and Education in England—His Career in the Indian Civil Service from 1829 to 1849—His Administration over the Punjab from 1849 to 1863—His Heroic Maintenance of Order in the Punjab during the Mutiny of 1857—His Christian Character and Beneficent Administration—He becomes Governor-General of India from 1863 to 1869, and Chairman of the London School Board from 1870 to 1873.

DIED June 27th, 1879, in London, John Laird Mair Lord Lawrence, G.C.B., K.C.S.I., etc., at the age of sixty-eight. So runs the cable announcement of the close of a life eminently distinguished among many distinguished men who have won honor and renown on the same fields and in the same service. The roll of great names identified with the history of British rule in India, brilliant as it is, contains few which will compare with that of the brave, wise, and Christian man now gone to his rest. The fierce temptations which assail a man separated by an immense distance from the Power to which he is responsible, and placed in supreme authority over nearly two hundred millions of subject peoples, proved too strong for men even so upright as Lord Clive and Warren Hastings, but the pure and noble character of Lawrence, strong in Christian principle, has never been tarnished by a charge of oppression or cruelty. Honored and loved in the country he ruled, he was respected and trusted in his native land, and he goes to his reward a good and faithful servant of his God and his country.

John Lawrence was born at Richmond, Yorkshire, England, March 4th, 1811. His family had long been connected with Indian affairs, and his father, Lieutenant-Colonel A. W. Lawrence, had won considerable reputation as an officer in the Mysore campaign and at the siege of Serengapatam in 1799. His brother, Sir Henry Lawrence, also won distinction in India, and fell in the brave defence of Lucknow during the terrible days of the Mutiny in 1857.

The early education of the future Viceroy of India was conducted at Foyle College, Londonderry, and completed at the East India College at Haileybury, where he obtained many prizes. He was trained with a view to civil service under the East India Company, from whom he obtained his first appointment in 1829. He went out to India as a writer, and soon after his arrival he was nominated to the post of Assistant Commissioner and Resident at Delhi.

In December, 1833, he was promoted to the situation of Officiating Magistrate and Collector at Delhi, and about twelve months afterward he was transferred to a similar appointment at Paniput, where he remained until 1836. From the latter year until December, 1838, he fulfilled the duties of Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector of Goorgaon and the southern division of Delhi; in November in the same year he became Chief Magistrate of the last named division, and in 1838 he was transferred to Goorgaon.

He undertook some other duties connected with the civil department of the East India Company's service, on the conclusion of which, in 1840, he returned to England on leave for three years, but resumed official life in India in September, 1842. He was then appointed to a responsible office in the Revenue Department, and he continued an active member of the Company's Executive until the year 1846, when he was promoted, and removed to the important office of Commissioner of the Sutlej. In this capacity his great administrative ability became evident. He won a distinguished name in the service, and on more than one occasion elicited a marked compliment from Sir Henry Hastings by the efficient manner in which he discharged the onerous duties of his position as Commissioner of the Trans-Sutlej provinces.

He was also twice employed, during 1846 and 1848, as Acting Resident at Lahore, in addition to his substantive duties. The assassination, at Mooltan, of the English envoys, Mr. Agnew and Lieutenant Anderson, April 18th, 1848, followed by a general insurrection in the Punjab, led to the second Sikh war. After a long and obstinate contest, the Sikhs were finally defeated by Lord Gough, at Goojerat, February 21st, 1849, when their territory was surrendered into British hands, and was declared by Lord Dalhousie to be thenceforth annexed to the English possessions in India. The first important step on the part of the Governor-General was to seek for men of administrative ability to bring the newly acquired territory under British laws and rule.

Mr. Lawrence, with his brother, Sir Henry, who had filled the post of Resident at Lahore, were nominated two out of three members of the board for the administration of the Punjaub. The third member was Mr. Charles Grenvill Mansel. Some slight idea of the labors of this commission may be formed from the fact that the superficial area of the country is 50,400 square miles, and that it contains a population, partly military and partly agricultural, of various races and religious creeds, who all "hated every dynasty except their own, and regarded the British as the worst because the most powerful of usurpers." Under their former sovereign, Runjeet Singh, the administration was deplorable. There was scarcely a crime for which impunity could not be purchased by bribes; while the oppressive exactions of the provincial governors, who farmed the taxes, were unchecked. Such was the state of affairs when the British Government first interfered in the internal administration of the country.

Much had been done by Sir H. Lawrence, when acting as Resident at Lahore, to ameliorate the condition of the people; but his endeavors were interrupted by the rebellion of 1848-49. The first labor undertaken by the board appointed by Lord Dalhousie was to organize a comprehensive system of law and justice, and of social and financial improvement throughout the Punjaub. It was found necessary to disband the Sikh soldiery, though many of them afterwards entered the British service, and an irregular force, consisting of ten regiments, was raised for the protection of the western frontier. In consequence of these measures, at the end of two years the board was able to report to the Governor-General that "the entire British system and its institutions were thoroughly introduced into the Punjaub." One triumphant result of this consummation was shown in the fact that in the great Mutiny of 1857 that province remained faithful to British rule, and contributed largely to the preservation of our Indian empire.

In 1856 Sir J. Lawrence was made a K.C.B. (Knight Commander of the Bath) in reward of his services as Chief Commissioner of the Punjab, and was advanced to the dignity of a G.C.B. (Grand Cross of the Bath) in 1857 for his zeal, intrepidity, and energy in aiding the military authorities to suppress the formidable revolt. He was created a baronet August 16th, 1858, sworn a member of the Privy Council, and on the creation of the Order of the Star of India was made K.C.S.I. (Knight Commander of the Star of India).

On the outbreak of

at Meerut, May 10th, 1857, his situation, like that of every Englishman in India, was one of extreme peril. A mere handful of men against their numerous enemies, they knew not on whom they might rely. The native troops they had trained and armed and whose valor they had seen in the field, were eager to destroy them and put an end to British rule in India.

Sir John Lawrence in his position in the Punjaub, isolated and far from succor, with accounts of the bloody massacres of his countrymen, their wives and children, at Cawnpoor, at Lucknow, and at Delhi, flowing in, he might well consider his position critical in the extreme. His actions at the moment of peril were prompt, sagacious, and effective. Skilfully turning to account the natural configuration of his province, he isolated the Punjaubees from the mutineers by stopping all means of communication; he destroyed all the small, and placed efficient guards over all the large, ferries on the five rivers by which the Punjaub was reached from India, an dispatched to the assistance of his countryme at Delhi every soldier whose fidelity was assured. He thus left himself entirely at the merc of the Sikhs, and voluntarily placed himself i the extremity of peril that he might aid thos who might need it more. There is no doub that this decisive step taken at the critical mo ment by concentrating the British forces save the country.

The Hand of Providence is seen clearly in th events of those days of peril. The telegrap wires connecting the Punjaub with the rest c India were cut by the mutineers, and therefore n orders could be received by Sir John Lawrenc and he was left to his own judgment. But fc that act of the enemy he would have been fo bidden taking the wise but desperate course h did take, and the issue might have been defe and massacre.

He referred to that state of things in the follov ing speech at Calcutta, on January 11th, 1869 "During the terrible crisis of 1857 I was fo tunate enough to find the chiefs and people c that great and warlike province willing to rall round me, and trust to my guidance. They di right loyal service. I shall always feel a dee and grateful interest in their welfare. I entre my countrymen in India to do their utmost i cultivating friendly and cordial relations wit the people among whom they dwell. Withou the aid of the native people we could never hav weathered the storm of 1857. It is no exagge ation to say that thousands of native soldie fought and suffered for us in those terrib times. From the Punjaub alone I estimate, fro first to last, not fewer than eighty thousand n tive soldiers were ranged on our side during th Mutiny. In the siege and storming of Delhi, particular, it is difficult to say how great was th benefit derived from such services."

His character as a Christian man and Chr tian statesman become specially developed in th Indian Mutiny. His dispatch narrating i events in 1858 concluded with these word "Throughout the crisis he could not but fe that human means and human precautions we utterly impotent, and that trust could be plac in Divine Providence alone. He joins with M Montgomery in the expression of devout than fulness to Almighty God. To Him alone is d the praise for our success, and for our very sa ty. His mercy vouchsafed a happy issue to o measures, and confounded our enemies. Hum aid could avail us nothing in that crisis. And is owing to an over-ruling Providence, and that alone, that a single Englishman was l alive in the Punjaub."

A general expression of satisfaction w evoked throughout India and in England whe in December, 1863, the announcement was ma that Sir John Lawrence had been APPOINTED VICEROY OF INDIA.

His administration was marked by power, b very, kindness, unswerving truth and justice, a was the embodiment of all that the natives f and respect.

During Lord Lawrence's term of office t roads, railways, and telegraphs were much tended; great improvements were effected in t civil, military, financial, legal, educational, a other public departments; schools and colle were multiplied, the study of the classical a vernacular languages promoted, and the foun tion laid for extending primary or element education to the masses of the people; barb ous customs, inconsistent with humanity a justice, were effectually discouraged; better v tilated barrack accommodation was provided the soldiers, thereby conducing to their physi and moral health; the marriage and other so laws amended; savings banks were establis throughout the country for the benefit of peasantry and humbler classes; the railway rangements for the conveyance of the poo class of travellers were reformed, so as to s much unnecessary suffering; measures w adopted for the elevation and enlightenmen native princes and chief, and for encouragin better discharge of their duties towards their subjects; and a copyright law was passed. In these and other ways Lord Lawrence's action, as head of the government of India, manifested an enlightened acquaintance and sympathy with the conditions and wants of all classes of the people of India; so that the native press was accustomed to designate him as "The Man of the People."

In one of his minutes, in 1858, he declared, with respect to State education, that, in his judgment, "the Bible should be taught in class wherever we have teachers fit to teach it, and pupils willing to hear it."

He advocated the stern prohibition of all obscene images or gross immoralities connected with Hindoo worship in public, and the alteration of the laws about polygamy, early marriages, and other customs subversive of the best interests of society. He also said: "The system of caste can no longer be permitted to rule in our services. Soldiers and government servants of every class must be entertained for their merits, irrespective of creed, caste, or class. The native Christians, as a body, have, with rare exceptions, been set aside. I know not one in the Punjaub (to our disgrace be it said) in any official employment. But a change has come, and I believe there are now few who would not eagerly employ those native Christians capable of filling appointments.

"I consider I should be wanting in my duty at this crisis if I did not endeavor to secure a portion of the numerous appointments in the judicial department to the native Christians; and I shall be happy to advance their interests equally with those of the Mohammedan and Hindoo candidates. Their future promotion must depend on their own merits. I shall therefore feel obliged to each missionary favoring me with a list of native Christians belonging to them who, in their opinion, are fit for the service."

This document of Lord Lawrence concluded with the following weighty words: "All those measures which are really and truly Christian can be carried out in India, not only with every advantage to its stability, but, on the contrary, without danger to British rule. Christian things done in a Christian way will never alienate the heathen."

On his retirement from office and RETURN TO ENGLAND in March, 1869, he was raised to the House of Peers by the title of Baron Lawrence of the Punjaub and of Grateley. The Universities both of Oxford and Cambridge also conferred on him the honorary degrees of D.C.L. and LL.D., and when the system of public education was adopted in England in 1780 Lord Lawrence was elected on the London School Board, and at its first meeting was chosen its Chairman, a position he occupied until 1873, when he resigned.

He continued, however, to take great interest in the cause of education, and especially in the Christian Vernacular Education Society for India, of which he was an enthusiastic supporter. At the anniversary of this Society, in 1876, he pleaded its cause in an earnest speech, which reveals the sincere Christian fervor of his heart and the vitality of those high Christian principles which had been his support in times of peril in India. In the course of his address he observed that his love for the Society had been prompted by its efforts on behalf of native Christians in India. He hoped that in the course of time a large body of native Christians, trained in the knowledge of the Lord, would be raised up and spread over the length and breadth of the land. If theycould secure a sufficient number of native Christian teachers, then, and not until then, could they hope to make an impression on the ignorance, vice, and idolatry of India. He also looked hopefully on what had been achieved in the translation into the Hindoo language of a large number of good moral books—books which gave amusement, pleasure, and delight to the readers, joined with good moral principles and Christian views. He also regarded as a great good the employment thus furnished to colportors who would have opportunities of doing good while engaged in the sale of such books.

It is obvious from these remarks that Lord Lawrence was the man above all others best fitted for the exalted position he occupied. If England had more of such men in her high places, her numerous dependencies would be benefited to an incalculable extent. That she has so many men so actuated is due the fact that she has been able to retain her possessions and attach them in loyalty to herself.

Lord Lawrence was singularly blessed in his domestic relations, HIS WIFE being a lady like-minded with himself, whose tastes, manners, and culture eminently fitted her to adorn the viceregal court.

Dr. Norman MacLeod, the eminent Scotch divine, was present on board a steamer when Lord Lawrence came to bid his wife farewell on the occasion of her visit to Europe. He thus describes the illustrious pair: "I was more than ever impressed with the noble character of Lord Lawrence. I was under a spell of romance as I gazed on that face, bronzed with the Indian sun of many a long year in camps and durbars, marches and pursuits, skirmishings and battles, with all sorts of unknown tribes and chiefs—that face furrowed by lines of thought about war and peace, Rajahs, Sikhs, and mutineers, and those hows and whens which make government in India the most severe and exhaustive in the world. And when the moment of parting came, and he bade good-by to the brave and loving companion of his life, the bride of his youth, the mother of his children, then I felt a something in my throat, and my heart filled with a deeper love for both."

Lord Lawrence will be buried in Westminster Abbey among the great and the good whose memory England cherishes with pride and love.

Death of a Soldier Clergyman.—The Rev. William Leeke, who was buried recently in Derbyshire, England, was a soldier at Waterloo, and carried the colors of his regiment, the 52d Light Infantry. This regiment led the gallant charge on the Imperial Guard of France, in that battle which finally decided the fortunes of the day. He remained with his regiment in the Army of Occupation in Paris, followed it into the north of France, and was with it in New Brunswick. When thirty one years of age he left it and was graduated at Cambridge. He then took holy orders; remained a curate about ten years, and was appointed to a living, which he held until two years ago, when, owing to the infirmities of age, he resigned it. He was eighty-two years old when he died.

A Hypocritical Pretence has been put forward by the Prince of Monaco, the little Italian principality which has a present population of 3127, occupying six square miles. The prince is an inveterate and successful gambler, and a profligate generally. But he has denied to English and Scotch Protestants the privilege of establishing a place of worship on his territory because it would "endanger the unity of the faith!" The real cause of his opposition is doubtless that like all bad men he shuns the light and hates those who preach of righteousness and a judgment to come.

Ritchie the Blind Boy.—Mr. M. B. Gerds once asked Ritchie, a little blind boy, if he loved Jesus; his tiny frame shook with emotion as, turning his sightless eyes towards heaven, he said: "Ye dinna ken how I love Him, or ye'd never ask! They ha'e na made the right word yet to tell o' half my love; but I'm just waitin'—waitin' till I ha'e the 'new song' put into my mouth, an' then I'll gang awa' and tell it to Himsel'." The same little boy was one day at the house of a friend, and a little girl with whom he was playing said very pitifully to him, "I am so sorry you cannot see me!" "Hoot," said Ritchie, "it's nae loss. I see a better—Jesus, the 'altogether lovely,' an' ye canna beat that."

THE DIVINE LULLABY.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached April 30, 1879, and Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."—Isaiah 66: 13.

The Gentle Words of the Bible—God Like a Mother—1. In His Modes of Instruction—Teaching A B C—Spelling Faith—Teaching by Pictures—2. In His Style of Favoritism—Father's Favorite—Mother's Favorite—3. Although the Bible is a warm letter of affection from a parent to a child, there are some people who seem to dwell chiefly upon the severe passages. Just as fifty calm nights of summer dropping gently the dew are not so impressive to some people as a half hour's hail-storm, so there are some people who seem to entirely overlook the calmer portions of God's Word, and take only the expressions of His indignation.

There may come during the year into the household fifty letters of affection, but they do not seem to make so much impression as one sheriff's writ: and so all the expressions of God's mercy and love in the Bible do not seem so much to arrest the attention of the people as here and there an expression of God's wrath against sin.

A parent and a child go out for a summer ramble into a field, and while they are in the field there comes up a thunder-storm, and there are terrific flashes of lightning, and the father says to the child, "That is God's eye;" and then the thunder rolls reverberating among the mountains until the child shivers with terror, and the father says, "That is God's voice." But the clouds roll off, the sky and the storm is gone, and the rainbow spans the heavens, flooding the sky and the earth and the sea with beauty, and the father forgets to say to the child,

"THAT IS GOD'S SMILE."

My text to-night is a very rainbow of beauty and compassion. It kindles with sympathy, it sobs with pity, it is the hush of a divine lullaby. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." You have often heard that God was a King, that God was a lion of the tribe of Judah, that God was a Conqueror, that God was a Father. I tell you to-night that God is a Mother. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

1. In the first place, I remark that God is like a mother in His modes of instruction. The mother it is that teaches the child the A B C. The father is not so competent for the primary department; he loses his patience. It takes a mother to tell the child fifty times the difference between G and H, the difference between I and J: and having told that difference fifty times, she does not lose her patience; for she goes on and tells the child the hundredth time, until it has learned the lesson. Sometimes she teaches by song, sometimes she teaches by worsted work, sometimes she teaches by books, sometimes in one way, and sometimes in another; but she does not lose her patience.

She goes on until the child learns the lesson, and that makes me think of God. He comes down with the most patient lesson to our soul, and He teaches us now in one way and now in another, line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little. Sometimes He teaches us by prosperity, and the letters are in sunshine. Sometimes He teaches us in adversity, and the letters are in black. We are not willing to learn the lesson; we are too stupid to learn. Yet God goes on, lesson after lesson, patiently, patiently. Oh, how good God is in His modes of instruction!

There is just one word He has been trying to teach us, some of us for twenty years, thirty years, forty years, fifty years, sixty years, seventy years, just one word of one syllable, and that is F-A-I-T-H—Faith, and after we have been in the school of Christ, or rather been in the family of God, and he has been stooping down to teach us that lesson all these years, we stop at it, we halt at it, we go back from it, we mispronounce it, we cannot understand it. Yet God keeps teaching us, teaching us, like a mother, like a mother.

I have noticed that most mothers teach by pictures. The very best lesson they ever teach is by pictures; they want to show the evil of contentions. The mother turns to the page where there are boys in conflict, and she says, "See the quarrelling. Is it not a hideous picture?" The child never forgets it. Mother wants to show the evil of war among nations. She does not discourse about war; she turns over the history of some great conflict, and she shows her child the garments rolled in blood, the wounded soldiers, and the darkness and the battle, and the child learns the horrors of war.

That is the way the mother teaches the child, and so God comes down like a mother, and He teaches us by pictures. He wants to impress us with His goodness, and He shows us the autumnal orchard, the ripe apple; He shows us the autumnal field; He shows us the full barn, the presses bursting out with new wine; and while we are looking at the autumnal scene, we say in our autumnal, our thanksgiving service, "Thou crownest the years with Thy goodness." And so we have learned by the picture.

But some morning after wintry years our family is gathered at the breakfast table, and they are all bright and well, for they were under coverlids while others were freezing in the darkness and the storm, and under the blaze of the warm rays of the hearth they sit. Their appetites are keen, turning the plainest fare into luxury, and with our families all about us we say, "Bless the Lord, oh, my soul." And by that picture of domestic quiet and peace we learn God's goodness.

God would teach us brotherly kindness and neighborly kindness. How does He do it? By a picture. A Levite is wounded on the road to Jericho: a man has been in a fight with a robber; a robber stabbed him, knocked him down; two ministers come along, two ministers of religion; one goes on this side and looks at him, the other goes on that side and looks down at him, but the two go on to preach, I suppose, some great sermon, to tell about God's decree; and they want to tell what God thought, what God felt, years ago, and they are going to preach these two sermons, and they cannot stop to look at this man by the wayside. But a Samaritan rides along. He stops, he dismounts, and seeing this poor fellow by the road side, he goes to him, and he says, "Why, you seem very much hurt." He takes some wine and washes out the wounds; then he takes some oil and pours it into the wounds so that they stop smarting, and then he lifts the man on his beast and walks by his side, holding him on, until he gets to a tavern. Then he says to the man who keeps the tavern, "Here, take charge of this man; he has been hurt; he has been assaulted by robbers; here is something to pay his board, and if it is not enough, send to me and I will pay the whole expense."

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND MILLION

Who is my neighbor? The picture—the Good Samaritan.

But God wants to show how sad it is for a soul that goes away from him, and how glad the Divine mercy is to receive Him back. How does He do this? He teaches it by a picture: A farm-house, a few sheep and oxen round about the farm-house, the full wardrobe, the elegant table, the discontented boy starting away from home. He gets amongst sharpers, loses his money, gets homesick, wants to get back, starts home. The old man runs out to meet him. He started with a crutch or a cane, but in his haste to reach the boy he drops the cane; he does not feel more than thirty years of age. He hastens on and meets the returning boy coming back from the wilderness. His hand torn of the husk has a ring; the foot inflamed and bleeding on the road has sandals; the bare shoulders showing through the tatters have a robe; the stomach gnawing with hunger has a platter with smoking food.

The family re-united sit at the table. The father looks at the son. The son has a voracious appetite; the father is not able to eat; he is too full of joy to have any appetite. The father sits looking at the returned child; the tears roll down the father's cheeks, rolling down from wrinkle to wrinkle until they reach a smile, and then they stop, the dew of the years melting into the morning.

No work done on the farm that day. God knows that when a son comes back from his wanderings that is enough for one day. They begin to be merry.

The Picture: A prodigal came home from the wilderness. All understand that. We all have been wandering away from God, and want to come back—want to come back to-night. Everybody can understand that picture.

Christ the bridegroom, the truth, a mustard seed, the preaching of the Gospel throwing out the seed, a useless man, a barren fig-tree. All the truths of God pictured in Providence, pictured in every-day life, pictured in the holy scriptures. Oh, how like a mother is God teaching by pictures!

2. But I go further in drawing out this analogy of my text and tell you that God is like a mother in His style of favoritism. Who is the father's favorite in the family? Perhaps it is the son who has a fine forehead and fine mental capacity, and is getting along well at school. The father says, "I will take him into my store, I will take him into my firm. I will give him the very best opportunity. He shall have an education if no other member of the family has an education." And it is sometimes the case; the father will put all the culture on one son, actually robbing the other members of the family of their culture—and that is an exceedingly wicked favoritism.

But look at

THE MOTHER'S FAVORITISM.

Who is her favorite in your family? It is the child that at two years of age had a severe fall: it has never been well since. Or the scarlet fever has muffled its hearing; or there is a curvature of the spine. The child is very sick, never knew a well day; that child coughs in the night, and if the mother is sound asleep it awakes her. She flies to relieve it. If she goes away from him an hour, her last charge is in regard to that sick child; if she goes away and comes back, the first question is in regard to that sick child. She thinks more of that child than of all the others of the family. The fact is that it is her favorite. All the children in the family know it is her favorite. They say, Here is your favorite, and you let him do just as he pleases; you give him a great many things you don't give us.

The mother smiles. She knows he is her favorite, and so he ought to be; for if any one should be it is an invalid child that starts on the journey of life worn out with the first smile, with aching head, weak side, and irritating lung. Oh, how like God that is!

Who are God's favorites? Those who fare sumptuously every day, those who are well and rosy, those who have all the mercy that life can furnish, those that are prosperous and have no trial? No, no; the Lord's favorites are those who are subject to sickness, the suffering ones, the broken-hearted ones, the tried ones and the tempted ones, the troubled and the offending ones—they are the Lord's favorites.

Oh, how like a mother that He should choose the weakest and the sickest and the most troubled and most tried. God nursed him when asleep in the chair, because he is so near. But God never falls asleep; God never slumbers nor sleeps. This very moment he is in every hospital of Brooklyn and New York, by every sick pillow. Wherever there is anybody with broken heart or in trouble the Lord is there, for He wants to stand by the pillow of His favorites. As one whom his mother comforteth, so God comforts them.

3. I go further in carrying out this analogy of my text and tell you that God is like a mother in the fact that he has so much capacity to appreciate small hurts and bruises. If a father see a child with a broken arm, he is shocked at that; or if some dreadful fever or diphtheria comes to a child, the father is shocked and appalled at that,

But the child comes in with a slight bruise. It don't seem to amount to much: just a little splinter in the finger. Father says, "Oh, that is nothing." Mother says, "Don't say so." She knows it's something, She pities that wound. It don't make any difference how small it is. If the child has a splinter in the finger, it never wants a father to take it out; it always wants a mother to take it out. In other words, the mother appreciates the small hurts and the small bruises of the child. That is like God.

Nothing is so insignificant in the way of annoyance or perplexity in our life but God pities it. Nothing with God is something. There are no ciphers in God's arithmetic. A mathematical point is defined to be something without parts and without magnitude. It is so small imagination cannot see it, cannot reach it. It is so small, yet it may be for the great eternity. God's surveyors carry a very long chain.

When Kitto the lad wounded his foot in the back streets of Plymouth, England, and he was crippled for life, God bound up that wound so well that Kitto became the best commentator of Christian ages: and the Lord knows how to bind up every wound. As the child rushes in from the street with the most insignificant bruise, and the mother kisses it, so God takes the most insignificant annoyance or sorrow of our soul and presses it to the lips of Divine sympathy. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."
